When a messenger of an express company is being carried by a railroad company pursuant to a contract between the companies, of which he has no knowledge, the railroad company's duty to him to carry him safely is not absolved by a clause in the contract whereby all the risks of such carriage are assumed by the express company. Brewer v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 124 N. Y. 59, 11 L. R. A. 483.

General language in a contract for the carriage of persons, releasing the carrier from any liability for damage to them, does not exempt the carrier from liability for the negligence of its servants.

judgment. 95 Iowa, 260 [28 L. R. A. 718]. The defendant sued out this writ of error.

By the law of this country, as declared by this court, in the absence of any statute controlling the subject, any contract by which a common carrier of goods or passengers undertakes to exempt himself from all responsibility for loss or damage arising from the negligence of himself or his servants is void as against public policy, as attempting to put off the essential duties resting upon every public carrier by virtue of his employment, and as tending to defeat the fundamental principle on which the law of common carriers was established—the securing of the utmost care and diligence in the performance of their important duties to the public. New York C. Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357 [21: 627]; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. [The Montana], 129 U. S. 397 [32: 788]; Compania de Navigacion la Flecha v. Brauer, 168 U. S. 104, 117 [ante, 398, 404]. In the leading case of New York C. Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, above cited, it was accordingly adjudged that an agreement in writing with a railroad company, by which a drover traveling with his cattle upon one of its trains, in consideration of his cattle being carried at less rates, stipulated to take all risk of injury to them and of personal injury to himself, did not exempt the company from all responsibility for injuries to him caused by the negligence of its servants. In Hart v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co. 112 U. S. 331 [28: 717], the general rule was affirmed; but a contract fairly made between a railroad company and the owner of goods, by which the latter was to pay a rate of freight based on the condition that the company assumed liability only to the extent of an agreed valuation of the goods, even in case of loss or damage by its negligence, was upheld as a just and reasonable mode of securing a due *proportion be- [136 tween the amount for which the company might be responsible and the compensation which it received, and of protecting itself against extravagant or fanciful valuations.

The statute of the state of Iowa, the validity of which is drawn in question in this case, affirms and extends, as applied to railroad corporations, the principle of the common law, Kenny v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 422.

A provision in the contract to the effect that the carrier will not be responsible for delay in the transit of the property will not relieve him from the consequences of delay occasioned by negligence; to constitute such an exception it must be expressly stated in the contract. Jennings v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 127 N. Y. 438.

The interpretation and validity of a contract for carriage over a railroad are to be governed by the law of the state where the contract is made. Davis v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 93 Wis. 470, 33 L. R. A. 654.

A carrier cannot by special contract limit its common-law liability for losses not occasioned by negligence where it does not afford the shipper an opportunity to contract for the service required without such restriction even if he makes the special contract without objection or demand for a different one. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cravens, 57 Ark. 112, 18 L. R. A. 527.

However broad or general may be the language of the contract which does not specifically and in express terms release the carrier from the consequences of his own negligence, it will not effect such release if the general words may operate without including such negligence. Morris v. Wier, 20 Misc. 586; Holsapple v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 275.

Contracts by which carriers of passengers seek to exempt themselves from liability for the result of negligence of agents or servants must be founded on a good consideration, and the fact that an employee of the carrier injured while traveling on a pass which contained a limited-liability clause, in the hands of his foreman, of which no notice to him is shown, had previously had passes to travel by himself, does not establish any such contract existing at the time of the injury. Pendergast v. Union R. Co. 10 App. Div. 207.

In Dorr v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. 11 N. Y. 485-487, the court, laying down some general rules, says: "The courts of this state have steadily adhered to the common-law rule, that a common carrier cannot screen himself from liability by notice, whether brought home to the owner or not. Since the very full and learned discussion of that question in Hollister v. Nowlen, 19 Wend. 234, 32 Am. Dec. 455, and Cole v. Goodwin, 19 Wend. 251, 32 Am. Dec. 470, it has been regarded as settled upon mature deliberation, and the conclusion arrived at in those cases has been uniformly acquiesced in and followed. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. v. Belknap, 21 Wend. 354; Clark v. Faxton, 21 Wend. 153; Alexander v. Greene, 3 Hill, 9, 7 Hill, 533; Powell v. Myers, 26 Wend. 594."

A contract providing that a common carrier shall not be liable to a drover for injury caused by its negligence is void as against public policy. Davis v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 93 Wis. 470, 33 L. R. A. 654.

While a carrier may restrict its liability to its own line by contract with the shipper it cannot do so by a mere stipulation in a bill of lading not signed by the shipper, without proof that the shipper accepted the same, consenting to the restriction. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Carter, 165 Ill. 570, 36 L. R. A. 527.

A contract exempting a carrier from liability for loss by fire from any cause whatsoever in transporting blasting powder is not void as unconscionable or unreasonable. California Powder Works v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 113 Cal. 329, 36 L. R. A. 648.

A contract on the back of a ticket on which an employee of the carrier was traveling as a passenger is invalid so far as it purports to exonerate the carrier from liability for its negligence or that of its servants. Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 166 Mass. 492, 33 L. R. A. 844.

Failure of a railroad company to provide suitable and safe facilities for loading and unloading stock, and also for watering and feeding them, while being carried over its line of road, is negligence against which a common carrier is not permitted to contract. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. American Exch. Bank, 92 Va. 496.

Provisions in a bill of lading restricting a carrier's liability do not bind the shipper unless he accepted the bill of lading and understood and assented to such provisions. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Davis, 159 Ill. 53.

A railroad company is liable for an injury to a groom in charge of horses belonging to his employer, caused by the company's negligence, although the contract under which the horses and groom were transported exempted the company from liability for negligence, where the contract was not made by the groom and he did not know of the exemption. Coppock v. Long Island R. Co. 89 Hun, 186.

by enacting that "no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any corporation engaged in transporting persons or property by railway from liability of a common carrier, or carrier of passengers, which would exist had no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation been made or entered into." Iowa Code of 1873, § 1308; Iowa Stat. 1866, chap. 113.

Under this statute, the courts of the state, in the case at bar, held that the stipulation in the contract under which the plaintiff and the cattle in his charge were carried by the defendant, that the defendant should "in no event be liable to the owner or person in charge of said stock in any amount exceeding the sum of $500," was void, and could not be enforced by the courts. The plaintiff having been accordingly permitted to recover a verdict and judgment for a larger sum, the question presented by this writ of error is whether the statute, as applied to a claim for an injury happening within the state, under a contract for interstate transportation, contravenes the provision of the Constitution of the United States empowering Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

This question is substantially answered by previous judgments of this court.

The question of the right of a railroad corporation to contract for exemption from liability for its own negligence is, indeed, like other questions affecting its liability as a common carrier of goods or passengers, one of those questions not of merely local law, but of commercial law or general jurisprudence, upon which this court, in the absence of express statute regulating the subject, will exercise its own judgment, uncontrolled by the decisions of the courts of the state in which the cause of action arises. But the law to be applied is none the less the law of the state, and may be changed by its legislature, except so far as restrained by the Constitution of the state 137] *or by the Constitution or laws of the United States. New York C. Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 368 [21: 627, 637]; Hough v. Texas & P. Railway Co. 100 U. S. 213, 226 [21: 612, 618]; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 33 [27: 359, 365]; Myrick v. Michigan Central Railroad Co. [Michigan C. R. Co. v. Myrick], 107 U. S. 102, 109 [26: 325, 327]; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 476, 478 [31: 508, 512, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804]; Lake Shore & M. S. Railway Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 106 [37: 97, 101]; Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368 [37: 772]; Paine v. Central Vermont Railroad Co. 118 U. S. 152, 161 [30: 193, 196].

Railroad corporations, like all other corporations and persons doing business within the territorial jurisdiction of a state, are subject to its law. It is in the law of the state that provisions are to be found concerning the rights and duties of common carriers of persons or of goods, and the measures by which injuries resulting from their failure to perform their obligations may be prevented or redressed. Persons traveling on interstate trains are as much entitled, while within a state, to the protection of that state, as those who travel on domestic trains. A carrier exercising his calling within a particular state, although engaged in the business of interstate commerce, is answerable, according to the law of the state, for acts of nonfeasance or of misfeasance committed within its limits. If he fails to deliver goods to the proper consignee at the right time and place, or if by negligence in transportation he inflicts injury upon the person of a passenger brought from another state, the right of action for the consequent damage is given by the local law. It is equally within the power of the state to prescribe the safeguards and precautions foreseen to be necessary and proper to prevent by anticipation those wrongs and injuries, which, after they have been inflicted, the state has the power to redress and to punish. The rules prescribed for the construction of railroads, and for their management and operation, designed to protect persons and property otherwise endangered by their use, are strictly within the scope of the local law. They are not, in themselves, regulations of interstate commerce, although they control, in some degree, the conduct and the liability of those engaged in such commerce. So long as Congress has not legislated upon the particular subject, *they are rather to be regarded [138 as legislation in aid of such commerce, and as a rightful exercise of the police power of the state to regulate the relative rights and duties of all persons and corporations within its limits.

Such are the grounds upon which it has been held to be within the power of the state to require the engineers and other persons engaged in the driving or management of all railroad trains passing through the state to submit to an examination by a local board as to their fitness for their positions; or to prescribe the mode of heating passenger cars in such trains. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465 [31: 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804]; Nashville, C. & St. L. Railway Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96 [32: 352, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 238]; New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628 [41: 853]. See also Western U. Teleg. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650 [40: 1105]; Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299 [41: 166]; Gladson v. Minnesota, 166 U. S. 427 [41: 1064].

The statute now in question, so far as it concerns liability for injuries happening within the state of Iowa—which is the only matter presented for decision in this case—clearly comes within the same principles. It is in no just sense a regulation of commerce. It does not undertake to impose any tax upon the company, or to restrict the persons or things to be carried, or to regulate the rate of tolls, fares, or freight. Its whole object and effect are to make it more sure that railroad companies shall perform the duty resting upon them by virtue of their employment as common carriers, to use the utmost care and diligence in the transportation of passengers and goods.

Judgment affirmed.

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY of New York.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 139-160.)

Exclusion of evidence—intention to defraud insurance company—when one who commits suicide is to be regarded as sane—intentional self-destruction, when a defense—public policy.

1. The exclusion of evidence which would, if admitted, have precluded judgment for the plaintiff, cannot be complained of by him.
2. An intention to defraud an insurance company by committing suicide is sufficiently proved to warrant a verdict for the company, where one who committed suicide, after declaring that he could only pay his debts with his life, had taken the insurance in question, which added about $8,000 to the annual premiums that he must pay, when he was already carrying life insurance on which he was required to pay annual premiums of about $12,000, while his income was inadequate to meet such burden.
3. One who commits suicide, understanding the consequences that will follow to himself, his character, his family, and others, and comprehending the wrongfulness of what he is about to do, as a sane man would, is to be regarded as sane.
4. Intentional self-destruction by the assured when of sound mind is itself a defense to an action on a life policy, even if the policy does not expressly declare that it shall be void in such a case.
5. A contract of life insurance expressly providing for payment if the assured in sound mind took his own life would be against public policy as tempting or encouraging suicide to make provision for those dependent upon the insured or to whom he was indebted.

Argued December 3, 6, 1897. Decided January 17, 1898.

ON A WRIT OF CERTIORARI to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of and for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania in favor of the defendant, the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, in an action brought by A. Howard Ritter, executor, etc., to recover the amount of six policies of life insurance issued upon the life of William M. Runk. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richard C. Dale, George Tucker Bispham, and John Hampton Barnes for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John G. Johnson, Edward Lyman Short, and Charles P. Sherman for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York on six policies of life insurance, each bearing date November 10, 1891, one for $20,000, one for $15,000, and four for $10,000 each. There was a verdict in its favor, upon which judgment was entered, and that judgment was affirmed in the circuit court of appeals. 28 U. S. App. 612.

*The policies were all alike except as to [141 the amount of insurance, and were in the following form:

"In consideration of the application for this policy, which is hereby made a part of this contract, the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York promises to pay at its home office in the city of New York, unto William M. Runk, of Philadelphia, in the county of Philadelphia, state of Pennsylvania, his executors, administrators, or assigns, twenty thousand dollars, upon acceptance of satisfactory proof at its home office of the death of the said William M. Runk during the continuance of this policy, upon the following condition, and subject to the provisions, requirements, and benefits stated on the back of this policy, which are hereby referred to and made part hereof. The annual premium of seven hundred and eighty-two dollars shall be paid in advance on the delivery of this policy and thereafter to the company, at its home office in the city of New York, on the tenth day of November in every year during the continuance of this contract. In witness whereof," etc. The "provisions, requirements, and benefits" thus made part of the policy will be referred to hereafter.

The assured died October 5, 1892, all premiums falling due previous to his death having been paid. It is not disputed that he took his own life.

In the affidavit of defense filed by the insurance company it is stated that at or about the time of the execution of the policies in suit Runk held policies upon his life to the extent of $315,000 issued to him by other companies; that during the year 1892 he effected additional insurance to a considerable amount, the total amount at or about the time of his death being $500,000; that prior to taking the additional insurance of $200,000, he was indebted in a very large amount by reason of the improper use of moneys intrusted to him in a fiduciary and in a quasi fiduciary capacity; that he was without resources of his own sufficient to meet the amount of that indebtedness; that he was confronted with the fear of being convicted of breach of trust, and was desirous to protect pecuniarily those whom he had injured; that he deliberately determined to commit suicide for the purpose of escaping the necessity *of meeting those whose confidence [142 had been betrayed, and with the intention, through moneys expected to be paid on his policies of insurance, to liquidate wholly or in part the debts owing by him; that he deliberately and intentionally took his life, being at the same time in sound mind and in the full possession of his mental faculties; and that his suicide was not the result of nor occasioned by mental unsoundness, but was the act of a man mentally and morally able to understand all the consequences thereof.

The affidavit of defense also contained the following statements:

"The policies of insurance sued upon contain a refereuce to the application therefor, which is made a part of the contract of insurance. A copy of this application is hereto attached, which, it is prayed, may be taken as a part of this affidavit. Under the advice of counsel the defendant avers that this application is a part of said contract, and that the contract of insurance was a contract made in the state of New York, and to be interpreted by, and in accordance with, the laws of that state.

"The policies of insurance sued upon were delivered to the said Runk upon the faith of an independent contract entered into by him, embodied in the said application, to the effect that if such policies should be granted, he, the said Runk, did, 'warrant and agree . . . that I will not die by my own act, whether sane or insane, during the said period of two years —said period of two years dating from the 6th day of November, 1891.

"The said Runk did, within the period of two years, commit a breach of said contract by killing himself, as has been before stated, in the way and manner above recited. By reason of the breach of said contract, and only by reason of such breach, the policy of insurance matured, and damages occasioned by such breach are equivalent in amount to that demanded under the policies."

Each of the applications for policies signed by the assured and attached to the affidavit of defense contained the following:

143] *"I hereby warrant and agree . . . not to engage in any specially hazardous occupation or employment during the next two years following the date of issue of the policy for which application is hereby made, and also not to engage in any military or naval service, in time of war, during the continuance of the policy, without first obtaining permission from this company; I also warrant and agree that I will not die by my own act, whether sane or insane, during the said period of two years."

At the trial below the defendant offered in evidence Runk's application for insurance. This was objected to on the ground that the application was not attached to the policy, and under an act of the general assembly of Pennsylvania approved May 11, 1881, could not, for that reason, be considered as part of the contract or be admitted in evidence. The defendant, by counsel, stated at the time that the paper was not offered for the purpose of making it as an "application" part of the contract, but to prove that an independent, collateral, contemporaneous agreement was entered into by which Runk stipulated that he would not die by his own act, whether sane or insane, during the period of two years The objection to this evidence was sustained, Judge Butler, who presided at the trial in the circuit court, observing: "The representation or statement or agreement, call it by whatever name you choose, is in my estimation a part of the application for insurance, and it constitutes a condition on which the policy was applied for and obtained, as much so as any representation contained in the paper itself, and it is therefore by the statute excluded by reason of the fact that a copy was not attached to the policy. . . . The statute intended that the policy shall exhibit on its face, or the policy in connection with whatever it refers to shall exhibit to the insured, the conditions on which he holds the policy. The object of this would be to limit the policy of insurance, to qualify it, to make it available only in case the party lived up to this contract."

The statute of Pennsylvania to which reference was made is in these words: "That all life and fire insurance policies upon the lives or property of persons within this commonwealth, *whether issued by companies organ- [144 ized under the laws of this state, or by foreign companies doing business therein, which contain any reference to the application of the insured, or the constitution, by laws, or other rules of the company, either as forming part of the policy or contract between the parties thereto, or having any bearing on said contract, shall contain, or have attached to said policies, correct copies of the application, as signed by the applicant, and the by-laws referred to; and, unless so attached and accompanying the policy, no such application, constitution, or by-laws shall be received in evidence, in any controversy between the parties to, or interested in, the said policy, nor shall such application or by-laws be considered a part of the policy or contract between such parties." Laws of Pa. 1881, p. 20.

Whether the circuit court erred in excluding the application which, by the terms of the contract, constituted the consideration of the company's promise to pay, is a question that need not be considered. If error was committed in this particular, it was one for the benefit of the plaintiff in the action; for, if the application had been admitted in evidence as part of the contract of insurance, the agreement and warranty of the assured not to die by his own act, whether sane or insane, within two years from the date of the policy, would have precluded any judgment against the insurance company. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 666 [32:308, 310]. Upon this writ of error, therefore, we must assume that the contract of insurance contained no such agreement or warranty by the assured, nor any express condition avoiding the policy in case of suicide. Besides, the defendant does not insist that this court should determine the right of the parties upon the basis that the application of Runk constituted part of the contract of insurance. It may be added that we do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the question whether the circuit court erred either in its construction of the Pennsylvania statute of 1881, or in applying that statute to the policies here in suit.

At the trial in the circuit court, the plaintiff submitted the following points:

*1. The evidence was not sufficient to [145

warrant the jury in finding that the deceased entered into the contracts of insurance evidenced by the policy sued upon with the intention of defrauding the company.

2. The evidence was not sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the deceased entered into the contracts of insurance with the intention of committing suicide.

3. The evidence upon the part of the defendant did not warrant any inference of fact constituting a defense in law to the plaintiff's right to recover the amount due upon the policies.

4. The mere fact that the insured committed suicide did not, standing alone, avoid the policies, there being no condition in them to that effect.

5. If one whose life is insured intentionally kills himself when his reasoning faculties are so far impaired by insanity that he is unable to understand the moral character of his act, even if he does understand its physical nature, consequence, and effect, such self-destruction will not of itself prevent recovery upon the policies.

The company submitted the following points as the basis of instructions to the jury:

1. There could be no recovery by the estate of a dead man of the amount of policies of insurance upon his life, if he takes his own life designedly, whilst of sound mind.

2. If the jury found that Runk committed suicide when he was of sound mind, being morally and mentally conscious of the act he was about to commit, of its consequences, and of its nature, with the deliberate intent to secure to his estate and to his creditors the amount of the policies sued upon, there could be no recovery.

3. If the jury found that Runk obtained the policies of insurance sued upon at a time when he was insolvent and an embezzler, with the intent thereby to secure, in case of his death, from the defendant, a fund with which to pay those to whom he was indebted, and whose property he had embezzled, and subsequently committed suicide, whilst of sound mind, with the deliberate intent to carry out this scheme, there could be no recovery.

146] *4. The defendant was entitled to set off the loss occasioned by the failure of Runk to keep his agreement not to die by his own hand within two years of the date thereof; and the amount of this loss cannot be less than that of the policies sued upon.

The court disaffirmed the plaintiff's first, second, and third points without comment. It disaffirmed the plaintiff's fourth point relating to the effect upon the rights of the assured of suicide standing alone, and affirmed the defendant's first point relating to the same matter.

The plaintiff's fifth point was affirmed, the court, however, accompanying its affirmance of that point with some observations to be presently referred to.

It will be observed that the plaintiff's first and second points assumed that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a finding that the assured entered into the contracts of insurance with the intention either to defraud the company or to commit suicide. The court rightly refused to so instruct the jury. When the last policies were taken out by Runk he was carrying insurance on his life for an amount large enough to require annual premiums of about $12,000. His income, so far as the record shows, was inadequate to meet such a burden. And yet, in 1891, he largely increased the insurance on his life, and added about $8,000 to the sum to be paid annually for premiums. Besides these facts, it appeared that on the day before his death he avowed that his debts must be paid, and that they could only be paid with his life. That avowal was in a letter written to his partner, in which he said that he had deceived the latter, and could only pay his debts with his life. That letter concluded: "This is a sad ending of a promising life, but I deserve all the punishment I may get, only I feel my debts must be paid. This sacrifice will do it, and only this. I was faithful until two years ago. Forgive me. Don't publish this." On the same day he wrote to his aunt to whom he was indebted in a large sum, saying, among other things: "Forgive me for the disgrace I bring upon you, but it is the only way I can pay my indebtedness to you." In addition he left for the guidance of his executor a memorandum *of his busi-[147 ness affairs, prepared just before his death, and which tended to show that he was at that time entirely at himself.

In view of these and other facts established by the evidence, the court did not err in disaffirming the first and second of plaintiff's points. We may add that, under the charge to the jury, it became unnecessary for them to inquire whether the policies were taken out with the intention of defrauding the insurance company or of committing suicide. The court said to the jury: "What constitutes insanity, in the sense in which we are using the term, has been described to you and need not be repeated. If this man understood the consequences and effect of what he was doing or contemplating, to himself and to others, if he understood the wrongfulness of it, as a sane man would, then he was sane, so far as we have occasion to consider the subject; otherwise he was not. Here the insured committed suicide, and, as the evidence shows, did it for the purpose, as expressed in his communication to the executor of his will, as well as in letters written to his aunt and his partner of enabling the executor to recover on the policy, and use the money to pay his obligations. I therefore charge you that if he was in a sane condition of mind at the time, as I have described, able to understand the moral character and consequences of this act, his suicide is a defense to this suit. The only question, therefore, for consideration is this question of sanity. There is nothing else in the case. That he committed suicide, and committed it with a view to the collection of this money from the insurance companies and having it applied to the payment of his own obligations, is not controverted and not controvertible. It is shown by his declaration, possibly not verbal, but written. The only question, therefore, is whether or not he was in a sane condition of mind, or whether his mind was so impaired that he would not, as I have described, properly comprehend and understand the character of the act he was about to commit. In the absence of evidence on the subject he must be presumed to have been sane. The presumption of sanity is not overthrown by the act of 148] committing suicide. Suicide *may be used as evidence of insanity, but standing alone it is insufficient to establish it. . . . If you find him to have been insane, as I have described, your verdict will be for the plaintiff. Otherwise it will be for the defendant."

It thus appears that the case was placed before the jury upon the single issue as to the alleged insanity of the assured at the time he committed suicide, and with a direction to find for the plaintiff if the assured was insane at that time, and for the company if he was then of sound mind.

Assuming that the jury obeyed the instruction of the court, their verdict must be taken as finding that the assured was not insane at the time he took his life. We must then inquire whether the observations of the trial court on the subject of insanity were liable to objection.

We have seen that the plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury that if the assured intentionally killed himself when his reasoning faculties were so far impaired by insanity that he was unable to understand the moral character of his act, even if he did understand its physical nature, consequence, and effect, such self-destruction would not of itself prevent recovery upon the policies.

This was the only instruction asked by the plaintiff which undertook to define insanity, and, as before stated, it was given by the court. But in giving it the court said: "We must understand what is meant and intended by the term 'moral character of his act.' It is a term which has been used by the courts, and is correctly inserted in the point; but it is a term which might be misunderstood. We are not to enter the domain of metaphysics in determining what constitutes insanity, so far as the subject is involved in this case. If Mr. Runk understood what he was doing, and the consequences of his act or acts, to himself as well as to others,—in other words, if he understood, as a man of sound mind would, the consequences to follow from his contemplated suicide, to himself, his character, his family, and others, and was able to comprehend the wrongfulness of what he was about to do, as a sane man would,—then he is to be regarded by you as sane. Otherwise, he is not." Substantially the 149] same observations *were made in that part of the charge, which is above given.

The plaintiff insists that the definition of insanity, as given by the trial court, was much narrower than was required or permitted by the decisions of this court. It is said that the impairment not only of the moral vision but also of the will, leaving the deceased in a condition of inability to resist the impulse of self-destruction, has been accepted by this court as describing a phase of insanity or mental unsoundness. One of the cases to which the plaintiff referred in support of this view is Davis v. United States, 165 U. S. 373, 378 [41:750,754], which was a prosecution for murder. It was there held that the accused was not prejudiced by the following instruction given to the jury: "The term 'insanity' as used in this defense means such a perverted and deranged condition of the mental and moral faculties as to render a person incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, or unconscious at the time of the nature of the act he is committing, or where, though conscious of it and able to distinguish between right and wrong, and know that the act is wrong, yet his will, by which I mean the governing power of his mind, has been otherwise than voluntarily so completely destroyed that his actions are not subject to it, but are beyond his control." This was substantially what had been held by this court in previous cases. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 580 [21:236]; Bigelow v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 93 U. S. 284 [23:918]; Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. v. Rodel, 95 U. S. 232 [24:433]; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Broughton, 109 U. S. 121 [27:878]; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Lathrop, 111 U. S. 612 [28:536]; Accident Ins. Co. of N. A. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527 [30:740].

In Terry's Case, above cited—which was an action upon a life policy declaring the policy void if the assured died by his own hand,—it became necessary to instruct the jury on the subject of insanity. The court said: "We hold the rule on the question before us to be this: If the assured, being in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, from anger, pride, jealousy, or a desire to escape from the ills of life, intentionally takes his own life, the proviso attaches, and there can be no recovery. If the death is caused by the *voluntary [150 act of the assured, he knowing and intending that his death shall be the result of his act, but when his reasoning faculties are so far impaired that he is not able to understand the moral character, the general nature, consequences, and effect of the act he is about to commit, or when he is impelled thereto by an insane impulse, which he has not the power to resist, such death is not within the contemplation of the parties to the contract, and the insurer is liable."

Recurring to the ruling of the court in the present case, it is not perceived that the plaintiff had any ground to complain that its definition of insanity was too strict or too narrow. His fifth point, in general terms, defined insanity as being a condition in which the reasoning faculties are so far impaired that the person alleged to be insane when committing self-destruction was unable to understand the moral nature of his act, even if he understood its physical nature. This definition was not rejected. On the contrary, it was accepted, the court at the time making some observations deemed necessary to show what, in law, was meant by the words "moral nature of his act." By those observations, the jury were informed that if the assured understood what he was doing, and the consequences of his act or acts to himself and to others,—that is, if he understood, as a man of sound mind would, the consequences to follow from his contemplated suicide, to himself, his character, his family, and others, and was able to comprehend the wrongfulness of what he was about to do, as a sane man would,—then he was to be regarded as sane; otherwise, not.

It is suggested that the attention of the jury should have been brought specifically or more directly to the fact that unsoundness of mind exists when there is an impulse to take life which weakened mental and moral powers cannot withstand—a condition in which there is no continued existence of a governing will strong enough to resist the tendency to self-destruction. But the words of the charge, although of a general character, substantially embodied these views. The court stated the principal elements of a condition of sanity as contrasted with insanity. What it said was certainly as specific as the instruction asked by 151] the plaintiff. If the plaintiff *desired a more extended definition of insanity than was given, his wishes, in that respect should have been made known. The court having affirmed his view of what was evidence of insanity, and such affirmance having been accompanied by observations that brought out with more distinctness and fullness what was meant by the words "moral character of his act," the plaintiff has no ground to complain; for nothing said by the court upon the question of insanity was erroneous in law or inconsistent with that which the plaintiff asked to be embodied in the charge.

No error of law having been committed in respect of the issue as to the insanity of the assured, it is to be taken as the result of the verdict that he was of sound mind when he took his life.

This brings us to the question whether the insurance company was liable—assuming that it was not a part of the contract enforceable in Pennsylvania, that the assured should "not die by his own act, whether sane or insane," within two years from the date of the policy.

It is contended that the court erred in saying to the jury, as in effect it did, that intentional self-destruction, the assured being of sound mind, is in itself a defense to an action upon a life policy, even if such policy does not in express words declare that it shall be void in the event of self-destruction when the assured is in sound mind. But is it not an implied condition of such a policy that the assured will not purposely, when in sound mind, take his own life, but will leave the event of his death to depend upon some use other than wilful, deliberate self-destruction? Looking at the nature and object of life insurance, can it be supposed to be within the contemplation of either party to the contract that the company shall be liable upon its promise to pay, where the assured, in sound mind, by destroying his own life, intentionally precipitates the event upon the happening of which such liability was to arise?

Life insurance imports a mutual agreement whereby the insurer, in consideration of the payment by the assured of a named sum annually or at certain times, stipulates to pay a 152]* larger sum at the death of the assured. The company takes into consideration, among other things, the age and health of the parents and relatives of the applicant for insurance, together with his own age, course of life, habits, and present physical condition; and the premium exacted from the assured is determined by the probable duration of his life, calculated upon the basis of past experience in the business of insurance. The results of that experience are disclosed by standard life and annuity tables showing at any age the probable duration of life. These tables are deemed of such value that they may be admitted in evidence for the purpose of assisting the jury in an action for personal injury, in which it is necessary to ascertain the compensation the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the loss of what he might have earned in his trade or profession but for such injury. Vicksburg & M. Railroad Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545, 554 [30: 257, 258]. If a person should apply for a policy expressly providing that the company should pay the sum named if or in the event the assured, at any time during the continuance of the contract, committed self-destruction, being at the time of sound mind, it is reasonably certain that the application would be instantly rejected. It is impossible to suppose that an application of that character would be granted. If experience justifies this view, it would follow that a policy stipulating generally for the payment of the sum named in it upon the death of the assured should not be interpreted as intended to cover the event of death caused directly and intentionally by self-destruction whilst the assured was in sound mind, but only death occurring in the ordinary course of his life.

That the parties to the contract did not contemplate insurance against death caused by deliberate, intentional self-destruction when the assured was in sound mind, is apparent from the "provisions, requirements, and benefits" referred to in and made part of the policy. They show that the policy was issued on the twenty year distribution plan, and was to be credited with its distributive share of surplus apportioned at the expiration of twenty years from the date of issue; that, after three full annual premiums were paid, the company would, *upon the legal surrender of the policy,[153 before default in the payment of any premium, or within six months thereafter, issue a non-participating policy for a paid-up insurance, payable as provided, for the amount required by the provisions of the New York statute of May 21, 1879 (Laws of New York, chap. 347); that the assured was entitled to surrender the policy at the end of the first period of twenty years "and the full reserve computed by the American table of mortality, and four per cent interest, and the surplus, as defined above, will be paid therefor in cash;" that if the assured surrendered the policy the total cash value at the option of the policy holder should be applied "to the purchase of an annuity for life, according to the published rates of the company at the time of surrender;" that after two years from the date of the policy the only conditions that should be binding on the holder of the policy were that "he shall pay the premiums at the time and place and in the manner stipulated in the policy, and that the requirements in the company as to age and military or naval service in time of war shall be observed;" that in all other respects, if the policy matured after the expiration of two years, the payment of the sum insured should not be disputed; and that the party whose life was insured should always wear a suitable truss. These provisions of the contract tend to show that the death referred to in the policy was a death occurring in the ordinary course of the life of the assured, and not by his own violent act designed to bring about that event.

In the case of fire insurance it is well settled that although a policy, in the usual form, indemnifying against loss by fire, may cover a loss attributable merely to the negligence or carelessness of the insured, unaffected by fraud or design, it will not cover a destruction of the property by the wilful act of the assured himself in setting fire to it, not for the purpose of avoiding a peril of a worse kind but with the intention of simply effecting its destruction. Much more should it be held that it is not contemplated by a policy taken out by the person whose life is insured and stipulating for the payment of a named sum to himself, his exec-154]utors, administrators, or assigns, *that the company should be liable, if his death was intentionally caused by himself when in sound mind. When the policy is silent as to suicide, it is to be taken that the subject of the insurance, that is, the life of the assured, shall not be intentionally and directly, with whatever motive, destroyed by him when in sound mind. To hold otherwise is to say that the occurrence of the event upon the happening of which the company undertook to pay was intended to be left to his option. That view is against the very essence of the contract.

There is another consideration supporting the contention that death intentionally caused by the act of the assured when in sound mind —the policy being silent as to suicide—is not to be deemed to have been within the contemplation of the parties; that is, that a different view would attribute to them a purpose to make a contract that could not be enforced without injury to the public. A contract, the tendency of which is to endanger the public interests or injuriously affect the public good, or which is subversive of sound morality, ought never to receive the sanction of a court of justice or be made the foundation of its judgment. If, therefore, a policy—taken out by the person whose life is insured, and in which the sum named is made payable to himself, his executors, administrators, or assigns —expressly provided for the payment of the sum stipulated when or if the assured, in sound mind, took his own life, the contract, even if not prohibited by statute, would be held to be against public policy, in that it tempted or encouraged the assured to commit suicide in order to make provision for those dependent upon him, or to whom he was indebted.

Is the case any different in principle if such policy is silent as to suicide, and the event insured against—the death of the assured—is brought about by his wilful, deliberate act when in sound mind? Light will be thrown on this question by some of the adjudged cases, having more or less bearing upon the precise point now before this court for determination.

The plaintiff insists that the question just stated is answered in the affirmative by the opinion in Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, above 155]*cited As before stated, that was an action upon a life policy, containing the condition that it should be void if the assured should "die by his own hand;" and the controlling question was whether the condition embraced the case of an assured who committed self-destruction at a time when his reasoning faculties were so far impaired that he was unable to comprehend the moral character, the general nature, consequences, and effect of the act he was about to commit, or when he was impelled thereto by an insane impulse which he had not the power to resist. There was no question in that case as to the effect upon the rights of the parties of intentional self-destruction, where the policy contained no provision as to suicide. In the course of the review of the adjudged cases reference was made in the opinion of this court to Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 Mann. & G. 639, and also to Hartman v. Keystone Ins. Co. 21 Pa. 466, 479. In the former case it appeared that the assured threw himself into the Thames and was drowned, and the jury found that he voluntarily threw himself into the water, knowing at the time that he should thereby destroy his life, and intending thereby to do so, but at the time of committing the act he was not capable of judging between right and wrong. The question was as to the liability of the insurance company on a policy issued to the assured containing a clause or proviso that the policy should be void if "the assured should die by his own hands, or by the hands of justice, or in consequence of a duel." Maule, Erskine, and Coltman, JJ., held that the company was not liable, while Tindal, C. J., was of the opinion that the proviso embraced cases of felonious suicide only, and not cases of self-destruction whilst the assured was under the influence of frenzy, delusion, or insanity. In the latter case it appeared that the assured committed self-destruction by taking arsenic. The supreme court of Pennsylvania held that there could be no recovery, Chief Justice Black saying: "The conditions of the policy are, that it shall be null and void 'if the assured shall die by his own hand, in or in consequence of a duel, or by the hands of justice,' etc. The plaintiff argues that the first clause here quoted *does not embrace a [156 suicide committed by swallowing arsenic. Where parties have put their contract in writing their rights are fixed by it. But the contract is what they meant it to be, and when we can ascertain their meaning from the words they have used, we must give it effect. One rule of interpretation is, that we must never attribute an absurd intent if a sensible one can be extracted from the writing. No absurdity could be greater than a stipulation against suicide in a duel. The words 'die by his own hand' must therefore be disconnected from those which follow. Standing alone, they mean any sort of suicide. Besides this, the court was very plainly right in charging that if no such condition had been inserted in the policy, a man who commits suicide is guilty of such a fraud upon the insurers of his life that his representatives cannot recover for that reason alone." Mr. Justice Hunt, delivering the opinion in Terry's Case, made an observation in relation to the two cases just cited which is supposed to be favorable to the plaintiff's contention. He said: "In Hartman v. Keystone Ins. Co. the doctrine of Borradaile v. Hunter was adopted, with the confessedly unsound addition that suicide would avoid a policy, although there were no condition to that effect in the policy." This observation of the learned justice was irrelevant to the case before the court and cannot be regarded as determining the point in judgment. If it was meant there could be a recovery by the personal representative of an assured who took out the policy, and who, in sound mind, took his own life,—the policy being silent in reference to suicide,—we cannot concur in that view.

In New York Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 600 [29: 997, 1000], which was an action by the assignee of a life policy, the defense, in part, being that the assignee murdered the assured in order to get the benefit of the policy, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for this court, said: "Independently of any proof of the motives of Hunter [the assignee] in obtaining the policy, and even assuming that they were just and proper, he forfeited all rights under it when, to secure its immediate payment, he murdered the assured. 157] It would be a reproach to *the jurisprudence of the country if one could recover insurance money payable on the death of a party whose life he had feloniously taken. As well might he recover insurance money upon a building that he had wilfully fired."

In Hatch, Admr., v. Mutual Life Insurance Co. 120 Mass. 550 [21 Am. Rep. 541], it appears that a policy of insurance on the life of a married woman provided that "if the said person whose life is hereby insured shall die by her own act or hand, whether sane or insane, . . . this policy should be null and void." It was in proof that the assured died by reason of a miscarriage produced by an illegal operation performed upon and voluntarily submitted to by her with intent to cause an abortion, and without any justifiable medical reason for such an operation. The court, observing that this voluntary act on the part of the assured was condemned alike by the laws of nature and by the laws of all civilized states, and was known by the assured to be dangerous to life, said: "We are of opinion that no recovery can be had in this case, because the act on the part of the assured causing death was of such a character that public policy would preclude the defendant from insuring her against its consequences; for we can have no question that a contract to insure a woman against the risk of her dying under or in consequence of an illegal operation for abortion would be contrary to public policy, and could not be enforced in the courts of this commonwealth." The report of the case shows that it was decided without reference to the questions raised by the special clauses of the policy.

The subject was considered by the supreme court of Alabama in Supreme Commandery, K. of G. R. v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 446 [46 Am. Rep. 332]. Chief Justice Brickell, delivering the unanimous judgment of that court, said:

"In all contracts of insurance there is an implied understanding or agreement that the risks insured against are such as the thing insured, whether it is property or health or life, is usually subject to, and the assured cannot voluntarily and intentionally vary them. Upon principles of public policy and morals, the fraud, or the criminal misconduct of the assured, is, in contracts of marine or fire insurance, 158] an *implied exception to the liability of the insurer. Waters v. Merchants' Louisville Ins. Co. 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 213 [9: 691]; Citizens' Ins. Co. v. Marsh, 41 Pa. 386; Chandler v. Worcestor Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 Cush. 328. Death, the risk of life insurance, the event upon which the insurance money is payable, is certain of occurrence; the uncertainty of the time of its occurrence is the material element and consideration of the contract. It cannot be in the contemplation of the parties that the assured, by his own criminal act, shall deprive the contract of its material element; shall vary and enlarge the risk, and hasten the day of payment of the insurance money. The doctrine asserted in Fauntleroy's Case, that death by the hands of public justice, the punishment for the commission of crime, avoids a contract of life insurance, though it is not so expressed in the contract, has not, so far as we have examined, been questioned, though the case itself may have led to the very general introduction of the exception into policies The same considerations and reasoning which support the doctrine seem to lead, of necessity, to the conclusion that voluntary criminal self destruction, suicide, as defined at common law, should be implied as an exception to the liability of the insurer, or, rather, as not within the risks contemplated by the parties, reluctant as the courts may be to introduce by construction or implication exceptions into such contracts, which usually contain special exceptions." Again: "The fair and just interpretation of a contract of life insurance, made with assured, is, that the risk is of death proceeding from other causes than the voluntary act of the assured, producing or intending to produce it;" and that "the extinction of life by disease, or by accident, not suicide, voluntary and intentional, by the assured, while in his senses, is the risk intended; and it is not intended that, without the hazard of loss, the assured may safely commit suicide."

In support of the general proposition that the law will not enforce contracts and agreements that are against the public good, and therefore are forbidden by public policy, reference is often made to the case of The Amicable Society etc. v. Bolland, 4 Bligh, N. R. 194, 211, known as Fauntleroy's Case. *That was an ac-[159 tion by assignees in bankruptcy to secure the amount due on a policy of insurance stipulating for the payment of a certain sum, upon the death of Fauntleroy, to his executors, administrators, or assigns. The assured was convicted of forgery, and for that offense was executed. The lord chancellor, after observing that the question was whether the parties representing and claiming under one who effects insurance upon his life, and afterwards commits a capital felony, for which he was tried and executed, could recover the amount named in the policy, said: "It appears to me that this resolves itself into a very plain and simple consideration. Suppose that in the policy itself this risk had been insured against; that is, that the party insuring had agreed to pay a sum of money year by year, upon condition that, in the event of his committing a capital felony, and being tried, convicted, and executed for that felony, his assignees shall receive a certain sum of money—is it possible that such a contract could be sustained? Is it not void upon the plainest principles of public policy? Would not such a contract (if available) take away one of those restraints operating on the minds of men against the commission of crimes—namely, the interest we have in the welfare and prosperity of our connections? Now, if a policy of that description, with such a form of condition inserted in it in express terms, cannot, on the grounds of public policy, be sustained, how is it to be contended that in a policy expressed in such terms as the present, and after the events which have happened, that we can sustain such a claim? Can we, considering the policy, give to it the effect of that insertion which, if expressed in terms, would have rendered the policy, as far as that condition went at least, altogether void?"

Referring to that case, Bunyon in his work on Life Insurance says: "It would render those natural affections which make every man desirous of providing for his family an inducement to crime; for the case may be well supposed of a person insuring his life for that purpose, with the intention of committing suicide. For a policy, moreover, to remain in force when death arose from any such cause would 160 be a fraud *upon the insurers, for a man's estate would thereby benefit by his own felonious act. Hence the rule of law when there is no condition whatever; but in that case, if the suicide or self destruction takes place when the assured is insane and not accountable for his acts, the rule arising from public policy does not apply, and his representatives are entitled to the policy money." 3d ed. p. 96.

In Moore v. Woolsey, 4 El. & Bl. 242, 254,—in which the question was as to the rights of an assignee under a policy providing that if the assured should die by dueling or by his own hand, or the hand of justice, it should be void as to the personal representative of the assured,—Lord Campbell, Ch. J., said that, "if a man insures his life for a year, and commits suicide within the year, his executors cannot recover on the policy, as the owner of a ship who insures her for a year cannot recover upon the policy if within the year he causes her to be sunk; a stipulation that, in either case upon such an event the policy should give a right of action, would be void."

For the reasons we have stated, it must be held that the death of the assured, William M. Runk, if directly and intentionally caused by himself, when in sound mind, was not a risk intended to be covered, or which could legally have been covered, by the policies in suit.

The case presents other questions, but they are of minor importance, and do not affect the substantial rights of the parties.

We perceive no error of law in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Peckham did not participate in the consideration or decision of this case.

HENRY W. BENJAMIN, Appt.,
v.
CITY OF NEW ORLEANS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 161-164.)

When judgments of circuit court of appeals are final—appeal to this court.

1. The judgments and decrees of the circuit court of appeals are final in all cases in which the jurisdiction is dependent entirely upon the opposite parties being aliens and citizens, or citizens of different states, under the judiciary act of 1891, § 6.

2. A case in which the jurisdiction of the circuit court was determined on appeal to depend solely upon diverse citizenship, and in which, after reversal, an amendment to show such jurisdiction by additional statements as to the citizenship of assignors of the claims was made, cannot be taken to this court by appeal from the decree of the circuit court of appeals affirming the decree of the circuit court dismissing the case for lack of jurisdiction.

Argued January 10, 1898. Decided January 31, 1898.

APPEAL from a decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirming the decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana dismissing for want of jurisdiction an action brought by Henry W. Benjamin, plaintiff, against the city of New Orleans to collect certain police warrants or certificates. Dismissed.

See same case below, 71 Fed. Rep. 758, 41 U. S. App. 178. Also see same case, 153 U. S. 411 [38: 764].

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs J. D. Rouse and William Grant, for appellant:

The decree upon the demurrer was that "said demurrer be maintained and the bill of complaint dismissed with costs."

The decree was an adjudication upon the merits of the complainant's case, and might be pleaded as res judicata to a new bill brought by the complainant for the same cause of action.

Aurora v. West, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 99 (19: 48); Bissell v. Spring Valley Twp. 124 U. S. 225 (31: 411); Lyon v. Perin & G. Mfg. Co. 125 U. S. 698 (31: 839).

Said circuit court of appeals erred in holding that, in order to give jurisdiction of complainant's bill to the circuit court, it was necessary for the complainant to aver that the citizenship of the assignors of the certificates on which he sues as assignee was such at the time the assignment was made as would have enabled them to sue in the circuit court if no assignment had been made.

Broughton v. Pensacola, 93 U. S. 266, 268 (23: 896, 897); Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S.

NOTE.—As to jurisdiction of United States circuit court depending on parties and residence, see note to Emory v. Greenough, 1: 640.

As to colorable conveyances to enable suit to be brought: motive of transfer, when no objection; coupons; residence of assignor,—see note to McDonald v. Smalley, 7: 237.

472, 527 (26: 197, 209); New Orleans v. Christmas (New Orleans v. Gaines's Admr.), 131 U. S. 191 (33: 99).

The complainant being an alien, and the defendant a citizen of the state of Louisiana, the case is within the jurisdiction of the circuit court by reason of the diverse citizenship of the parties, unless it is within one of the exceptions named in the judiciary act.

Bradley v. Hunt, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 393 (19: 467).

It has been held that if an alien should sue a citizen, and should omit to state the character of the parties in the bill, though the court could not exercise its jurisdiction while this defect in the bill remained, yet it might, as is every day's practice, be corrected at any time before the hearing, and the court would not hesitate to decree in the cause.

Conolly v. Taylor, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 565 (7: 521); Waters v. Barril, 131 U. S. lxxxiv Appx. (18: 878).

So it is not essential to the maintenance of the jurisdiction of the circuit court, in a case arising under the Constitution, that the pleadings should refer in words to the particular clause of the Constitution relied on, but it is sufficient to show that the suit is one of which the circuit court is entitled to take cognizance.

Hanford v. Davies, 163 U. S. 280 (41: 160).

It has been repeatedly held by this court that a suit cannot be properly dismissed by the circuit court of the United States, as not substantially involving a controversy within the jurisdiction of the court, unless the facts, when made to appear on the record, create a legal certainty of that conclusion.

Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U. S. 550 (29: 729); Deputron v. Young, 134 U. S. 252 (33: 929).

It follows from this that a case shown to be within the jurisdiction of the court, although the jurisdictional fact be defectively stated, cannot be rightfully dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Mr. Branch K. Miller, for appellee:

Where, in the circuit court, the jurisdiction is in issue and is denied, the plaintiff must elect whether he will bring the case to the Supreme Court on the question of jurisdiction alone, or carry it to the circuit court of appeals upon all the questions involved; the judgment of the court of appeals in such latter case can only be reviewed in this court upon a certificate from the former.

McLish v. Roff, 141 U. S. 661-668 (35: 893-895); Interior Constr. & I. Co. v. Gibney, 160 U. S. 219 (40: 401); Chappell v. United States, 160 U. S. 507 (40: 513); Warner v. New Orleans, 167 U. S. 474 (ante, 241); United States v. John, 155 U. S. 109 (39: 87).

No writ of error lies from this court to the court of appeals in any case where the judgment or decree of the latter is final, under § 6 of the act of 1891.

Aztec Min. Co. v. Ripley, 151 U. S. 80 (38: 81).

Such judgments or decrees are final in every case where Federal jurisdiction is founded on the diversity of citizenship of the parties.

Rouse v. Letcher, 156 U. S. 47 (39: 341); Gregory v. Van Ee, 160 U. S. 643 (40: 566); Carey v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 161 U. S. 116-133 (40: 639-644); Colorado C. Consol. Min. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S. 138-144 (37: 1030-1032); Borgmeyer v. Idler, 159 U. S. 408-415 (40: 199-201); Rouse v. Hornsby, 161 U. S. 588 (40: 817); Press Pub. Co. v. Monroe, 164 U. S. 105 (41: 367).

The averment of the bill setting out the citizenship of the parties should be clear and precise; it cannot be made inferentially. Where the jurisdiction depends upon the citizenship of one of the parties, plaintiff or defendant, the name of the state in which his citizenship is held must be set out; it is not sufficient to declare that he is a citizen of a state other than that of which the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, is a citizen.

This was a bill filed by Henry W. Benjamin, "an alien and a subject of the Kingdom of Great Britain," on February 9, 1891, in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana, "against the city of New Orleans, a municipal corporation created by the laws of the state of Louisiana, and a citizen of said state; the city of Kenner, also a municipal corporation created by the laws of and a citizen of said state; the police jury of the parish of Jefferson and *the police jury [162] of the parish of St. Bernard, political corporations created by the laws of and citizens of said state," seeking to collect, in the manner and on the grounds therein set forth, certain metropolitan police warrants or certificates. The defendants other than the city of New Orleans seem to have dropped out in the course of the proceedings.

The jurisdiction of the circuit court was attacked by defendant but was maintained, and a decree entered in favor of complainant, from which defendant appealed to the circuit court of appeals for the fifth circuit, whereupon that court certified certain questions to this court, by the answers to which it was determined that no such dispute or controversy arose in the case as gave jurisdiction to the circuit court without regard to the diverse citizenship of the parties, and that as the suit was, under the pleadings, a suit to recover the contents of choses in action within the meaning of the judiciary act of 1887 and 1888, by the assignee thereof, and it did not appear that it could have been brought in that court by the assignors, the jurisdiction of the circuit court could not be maintained on the ground of diverse citizenship. New Orleans v. Benjamin, 153 U. S. 411 [38: 764].

On receipt of the answers certified from this court, the circuit court of appeals reversed the decree of the circuit court and ordered that court to dismiss the bill, unless by amendment its jurisdiction could be made affirmatively to appear. Thereupon complainant amended the bill by inserting the following: "And your orator avers that each of said persons in whose favor said claims accrued and to whom said certificates were issued, are now, and were on the 9th day of February, 1891, citizens respectively of states other than the state of Louisiana, and competent as such citizens to maintain suit in this honorable court against the defendants for the recovery of said indebtedness, represented by said certificates, if no assignment or transfer thereof had been made."

The city of New Orleans demurred for the reason that the case was not one of equitable cognizance, and that the amendment was insufficient to show jurisdiction. The circuit court sustained the demurrer on both grounds and 163] dismissed the *bill (71 Fed. Rep. 758), whereupon the cause was taken to the circuit court of appeals, which affirmed the decree because the necessary diversity of citizenship was not affirmatively shown. 41 U. S. App. 178.

The case was not brought here directly from the circuit court of the United States on the question of the jurisdiction of that court as such, nor did the circuit court of appeals, when the case came before it for the second time, certify any question on which it desired our instruction.

On the contrary, this is an appeal from a judgment of the circuit court of appeals affirming the decree of the circuit court, and the inquiry at once presents itself as to our jurisdiction to entertain such appeal.

By the 6th section of the judiciary act of March 3, 1891, the judgments or decrees of the circuit courts of appeals are made final in certain classes of cases, and, among others, "in all cases in which the jurisdiction is dependent entirely upon the opposite parties to the suit or controversy being aliens and citizens of the United States, or citizens of different states." This case confessedly did not belong to either of the other classes, and if it fell within the class just mentioned, this appeal will not lie.

The judicial power extends to controversies between citizens of different states; and between citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of foreign states; but from the judiciary act of 1789 to the act of August 13, 1888, it has been provided, in substance (the differences being immaterial here), that no circuit court shall "have cognizance of any suit, except upon foreign bills of exchange, to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of any assignee, or of any subsequent holder if such instrument be payable to bearer and be not made by any corporation, unless such suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment or transfer had been made." And, to avoid the operation of this limitation, it is necessary in such cases that the record should show that the suit could have been maintained in the circuit court in the name of the assignor. Parker v. Ormsby, 141 U. S. 81 [35: 654].

164] *As this suit stood, after it had been determined that the jurisdiction of the circuit court could not be invoked on the ground that the cause of action arose under the Constitution or laws of the United States, the jurisdiction rested on the fact that the complainant was an alien and the defendant a citizen of Louisiana, although, by reason of the restriction, it was also essential that it should appear that complainant's assignors might have brought suit in the circuit court if they had not assigned their claims.

But the jurisdiction was none the less dependent on diverse citizenship as between complainant and defendant because it might be defeated if complainant did not bring himself within the restriction. The diverse citizenship of the assignors of the claims was not another ground of jurisdiction than the diverse citizenship of complainant and defendant, and the 6th section, in referring to cases in which the jurisdiction is dependent entirely on diverse citizenship between the opposite parties to the suit or controversy, refers to cases where no other distinct ground of jurisdiction is relied on. It frequently happens that more than one ground is set up as between the same parties, and also separate and different grounds in respect of one or more of several parties. We think the case, within the intent and meaning of that section, clearly belongs to the class in which the judgments and decrees of the circuit court of appeals are made final.

Appeal dismissed.

UNITED STATES et al.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 165-189.)

Mexican grant—power of town council—repudiation of grant—treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo—duty of nation—conditions of grant.

1. A grant by the ayuntamiento of El Paso, under the Mexican national colonization law of January 4, 1823, of land outside the limits of the town, which was made subject to the approval of the government, and which was disapproved by the provincial deputation, is not a valid final grant.
2. Under the said Mexican colonization law, the ayuntamiento or town council had no power, without the approval or direction of the government, to make a grant of land outside of the 4 leagues belonging to the town.
3. The disavowal and repudiation of such grant and the expulsion of the grantee from the country, by the Mexican government, preclude the grantee from claiming the validity of the grant as against the United States, after the cession of the territory to this government.
4. Under the treaty of Gaudalupe Hidalgo this government will not recognize as valid any grants which were not at the time of the treaty of cession recognized by the Mexican government as valid, or any whose conditions had not been performed.
5. It is the duty of a nation receiving a cession of territory to respect all rights of property as those rights were recognized by the nation making the cession, but it is no part of its duty to right the wrongs which the grantor nation may have theretofore committed.

NOTE.—That dominion acquired over conquered or ceded territory does not devest the vested rights of individuals to property: former laws continue until altered by the new sovereign,—see note to Delassus v. United States, 9: 71.

As to Missouri private land claims, see note to Les Bois v. Bramell, 11: 1051.

4. Under the terms of the act creating the court of private land claims, even if there were no other objections to the proceedings, the admitted fact that the conditions and requirements of this grant were never performed is sufficient to justify the ruling of the court in dismissing the petition.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Private Land Claims dismissing the claim of the plaintiffs J. B. Cessna et al. against the United States, that their title to a tract of land in the territory of New Mexico and near the city of El Paso, Texas, be confirmed. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

On January 9, 1893, the appellants as plaintiffs filed their petition in the court of private land claims, praying that their title to a tract of land in the territory of New Mexico, and near to the city of El Paso, Texas, be confirmed. The plaintiffs named as defendants, besides the United States, the unknown owners of the Dona Ana Bend colony, Mesilla colony, and Bracito grants. The United States as well as certain individuals representing themselves to be the owners of these grants appeared and answered. Thereafter a trial was had, and on June 26, 1895, the court entered a decree, finding that the plaintiffs' claim of a land grant had not been sustained by satisfactory proof, and dismissing the petition. From such decree the plaintiffs have brought this appeal.

The facts disclosed by the record, and about which there is little dispute, are substantially as follows: In April, 1823, one Doctor John Heath, or Juan Gid, as his name is written in the Spanish, petitioned the ayuntamiento or general council of El Paso for a grant of a tract of land, which petition was acted upon by the ayuntamiento, and a tract 5 leagues square was granted to him. This petition was in these words:

Doctor Don Juan Gid, citizen of the United States of North America, in the best legal form allowed by law, appears before your honorable body and states: That, not having received up to date any answer to the communication of December last of last year, which 166] I presented to the former *ayuntamiento, the predecessor of your honorable body, which (communication), approved in all its parts, was forwarded to His Imperial Majesty by the same, for which reason and because of the increase (ampleacion) of the power which is given to your honorable body by the law of colonization which was issued by the National Instituent Assembly (Junta) of the Empire on the 3d of January of the present year. For these reasons I again have recourse through this, repeating my request to your honorable body, adding that I offer to bring for the settlement of the land of El Bracito, which I ask may be given to me, thirty families of Christian Catholics, and among them blacksmiths, gunsmiths, silversmiths, carpenters, tailors, shoemakers, saddlers, architects, mathematicians, chemists, mineralogists, surgeons, doctors of medicine, and to establish a hospital with its corresponding drug store and proper stock therein, with the necessary instruments for all operations; also to build a warehouse supplied with all kinds of merchandise for wholesale; the necessary machines for the manufacture of cotton and cloth goods, another for the manufacture of gunpowder, offering until payment of the expense of transportation, to furnish the amount of this article all this jurisdiction may need at the very low price of one dollar per pound; it being first class for the use of arms; with the understanding that in all the said trades there shall be admitted for instruction the youths whose parents may see fit to dedicate them thereto; the children of this country (suelo) having the preference thereto.

In view of what has been said, and because, for establishing the said machinery, utilizing the farms, grazing stock, and for the other field interests, it is indispensable that it have the extension which is necessary therefor, it behooves me to demonstrate to your honorable body that the land which may be assigned to me, limiting me to the smallest amount, be at least enough for (sea lo menos para) an hacienda, and that said designation be made for me on both sides, that is to say, that it be on both sides of El Bracito, because the said land being broken it is necessary to leave out various portions of it. I also propose to your honorable body that, until time *permits whatever else may be desirable, [167 this settlement be attached to the parish of this jurisdiction; likewise that the pasture and woodlands be common, with the same privilege as other people of this locality: recommending that it be without prejudice to those farms (sementeras), and that the petitioner be the person to whom is intrusted the distribution of said lands, he being considered the legitimate justice of said families.

Candor of mind being what I most appreciate, and to join myself with my brethren, the faithful inhabitants of this Empire, living always in the simple peace, in order to dispel all rumors of hatred, I ask your honors that, you being pleased, and in order that the said law of colonization be executed in all its parts, notice of this, my petition, be given to the individuals of this jurisdiction, in order that all these gentlemen who like may better or equal it with a view to the right or preference, in which act your honorable body, to whom is intrusted the power of father of this country (patria), will weigh at their true value the incalculable benefits that result from my petition whereupon, far from seeking means to deprive it thereof, it would be encouraged in every way to procure their increase.

Wherefore, I ask and petition your honorable body to be pleased to accede to what I petition, being pleased to pardon the fault that this my petition is not upon paper of the proper seal, for there is none in this place, I being ready to pay the fees that belong to the national treasury. I protest that I do not act in bad faith, and the necessary, etc.

Paso, April 7th, 1823.

Juan Gid.

Certain proceedings were had upon this petition, which it is unnecessary to mention in detail.

On April 22 this order was made by the ayuntamiento:

This ayuntamiento having on this day received that which by its order was to be executed by the commission appointed from its midst to do the surveying that was to be done in the land of El Bracito, this being 5 leagues in 168] each direction, *the whole of it composing an 'hacienda,' according to article 5 of the colonization plan, which land was granted by this ayuntamiento to Don Juan Gid for the purpose of settlement as stated afterwards, and he, being satisfied with what was done in all its parts by the said commission, it was entered as a minute in due witness thereof, the president and other members of which that is composed signing it before me, the secretary, to which I certify. José Ygnacio Rascon, José Morales, José Maria Belarde, José Francisco Carbajal, Juan Maria Barela, Antonio Prudencio, José Maria Garcia, Saturnino Aguiar, José Manuel Garcia, Lorenzo Provencio, José Albares.

Juan Maria Ponce De Leon, Secretary.

And on the 25th the following:

The present expediente in which there has been granted to Don Juan Gid, Anglo-American of the United States, the lands of El Bracito for settlement, being considered by this ayuntamiento as closed, proceed to what is to be done, under the tariff in force in this ayuntamiento and by its secretary that Juan Gid may know what fees he is to pay for what has been done therein placing the original in the archives as a perpetual testimony, but nevertheless to this shall be sent, together with a certified copy, by the first mail or safe-conduct of the governor of this province for his superior information; another of the same kind being given to the party in interest for his protection. And by the present order the president and members of this corporation so determined and signed it, before me, the secretary, to which I certify. José Ygnacio Rascon, José Morales, José Maria Belarde, José Francisco Carbajal, Saturnino Aguiar, José Manuel García, Lorenzo Provencio.

Juan Maria Ponce De Leon, Secretary.

It is a copy of the original expediente which on petition of Don Juan Gid was made in order to grant to him for settlement the land of El Bracito, in accordance with the colonization plan, together with what is afterward stated: which original remains accordingly in the archive, to which I certify.

Juan Maria Ponce De Leon, Secretary. [Rubric.]

169] *A copy of these proceedings was sent to the governor of the province, and the following action was taken by the provincial deputation:

In the session of the 17th of the present month the acting governor of this province, Captain José Antonio Vizcarra, presented to this deputation the reports which your honorable body makes to him in an undated official communication which said chief received; and he also presented another official letter, dated the 26th of last April, accompanied by a copy of the proceedings had by your honorable body in giving to the foreigner Mr. John Heath, at the Bracito, possession of land belonging to the people of that jurisdiction.

The deputation in the same session resolved to express to your honorable body the surprise it felt at the violent and mistaken procedure with which you conducted yourselves in giving land to foreigners, not only with prejudice to the inhabitants of that jurisdiction, but also in violation of the same law of which your honorable body availed itself in order to carry into effect the possession referred to, thus opening the door to the continual complaints of its people; this deputation refraining from making other observations to your honorable body, on account of the colonization law, which was the moving cause in the concession of the Bracito land to the said Heath having been repealed; but proceeding to direct your honorable body that, in order not to make itself responsible for damages which the foreigner might claim if he should introduce into this province the families that he offers to bring, it should notify the said Heath, through the plenipotentiary of the United States resident in New Mexico, or in some other manner which it may deem more prompt and effective, that the possession which has been given to him at the Bracito, belonging to that jurisdiction of El Paso, was through a mistaken opinion and wrong understanding in relation to the colonization law already repealed.

And I communicate it to you by direction of the said deputation, with the understanding that I shall communicate to you the decision that may be arrived at when the petition of *Mr. Albo and the other persons of that [170 town shall have been discussed, your honorable body notifying me of the receipt of and compliance with these instructions.

God preserve your honorable body many years.

Deputy Secretary.

It does not appear that notice of this action of the provincial deputation was at the time communicated to Heath, for soon after the final order of the ayuntamiento he returned to this country and to the state of Missouri, of which state he had theretofore been a citizen, made a disposition of his property, and collected a body of colonists, with whom, in the year 1824, he proceeded to El Paso, with a view of taking possession of this tract of land. Instead of being permitted to occupy the tract he was banished from the country, forced to abandon the property that he had brought with him, and sent back to the United States a bankrupt. He returned to Missouri, where he lived until he died, in the year 1851. Petitioners claim under him.

The national colonization law of January 4, 1823, under which these proceedings were had, is, so far as it can have any application to the present case, translated by Rockwell (Rockwell's Spanish Laws, p. 617) as follows:

"Art. 1. The government of the Mexican nation will protect the liberty, property, and civil rights of all foreigners who profess the Roman Catholic apostolic religion, the established religion of the empire.

"Art. 2. To facilitate their establishment, the executive will distribute lands to them, under the conditions and terms herein expressed.

"Art. 3. The empresarios, by whom is understood those who introduce at least two hundred families, shall previously contract with the executive, and inform it what branch of industry they propose to follow, the proper-171]ty or resources they *intend to introduce for that purpose; and any other particulars they may deem necessary, in order that with this necessary information, the executive may designate the province to which they must direct themselves; the lands which they can occupy with the right of property; and the other circumstances which may be considered necessary.

"Art. 4. Families who emigrate, not included in the contract, shall immediately present themselves to the ayuntamiento of the place where they wish to settle, in order that this body, in conformity with the instructions of the executive, may designate the lands corresponding to them, agreeably to the industry which they may establish.

"Art. 5. The measurement of land shall be the following: Establishing the vara at three geometrical feet, a straight line of five thousand varas shall be a league; as quare, each of whose sides shall be one league, shall be called a sitio; and this shall be the unity of counting one, two, or more sitios; five sitios shall compose one hacienda."

"Art. 7. One labor shall be composed of one million square varas, that is to say, one thousand varas on each side, which measurement shall be the unity for counting one, two, or more labors. These labors can be divided into halves and quarters, but not less.

"Art. 8. To the colonists, whose occupation is farming, there cannot be given less than one labor, and to those whose occupation is stock raising, there cannot be given less than one sitio.

"Art. 9. The government of itself or by means of the authorities authorized for that purpose, can augment said portions of land as may be deemed proper, agreeably to the conditions and circumstances of the colonists.

"Art. 10. Establishments made under the former government which are now pending, shall be regulated by this law in all matters that may occur, but those that are finished shall remain in that state.

"Art. 11. As one of the principal objects of laws in free governments ought to be to approximate, so far as is possible, to an equal distribu-172] tion of property, the *government, taking into consideration the provisions of this law, will adopt measures for dividing out the lands, which may have accumulated in large portions, in the hands of individuals or corporations, and which are not cultivated, indemnifying the proprietors for the just price of such lands to be fixed by appraisers."

"Art. 19. To each empresario, who introduces and establishes families in any of the provinces designated for colonization, there shall be granted at the rate of three haciendas and two labors, for each two hundred families so introduced by him, but he will lose the right of property over said lands should he not have populated and cultivated them in twelve years from the date of the concession. The premium cannot exceed nine haciendas and six labors, whatever may be the number of families he introduces.

"Art. 20. At the end of twenty years the proprietors of the lands, acquired in virtue of the foregoing articles, must alienate two-thirds part of said lands, either by sale, donation, or in any other manner he pleases. The law authorizes him to hold in full property and dominion one-third part.

"Art. 21. The two foregoing articles are to be understood as governing the contracts made within six months, as, after that time, counting from the day of the promulgation of this law, the executive can diminish the premium as it may deem proper, giving an account thereof to Congress, with such information as may be deemed necessary.

"Art. 22. The date of the concessions for lands constitutes an inviolable law for the right of property and legal ownership; should anyone through error, or by subsequent concession, occupy land belonging to another, he shall have no right to it, further than a preference in case of sale, at the current price.

"Art. 23. If, after two years from the date of concession, the colonist should not have cultivated his land, the right of property shall be considered as renounced, in which case the respective ayuntamiento can grant it to another.

"Art. 24. During the first six years from the date of the concession the colonist shall not pay tithes, duties on their produce, nor any contribution under whatever name it may be called.

*"Art. 25. The next six years from the[173 same date they shall pay half tithes, and the half of the contributions, whether direct or indirect, that are paid by the other citizens of the empire. After this time they shall, in all things relating to taxes and contributions, be placed on the same footing with the other citizens."

"Art. 29. Every person shall be free to leave the empire, and can alienate the lands over which he may have acquired the right of property, agreeably to the tenor of this law, and he can likewise take away from the country all his property, by paying the duties established by law."

There is a dispute as to the proper translation of § 4, the original of which is:

"Art. 4. Las familias que por si mismas vengan á establecerse, se presentarán immediatamente al respectivo Ayuntamiento del lugar en que quieran radicarse, para que conforme á las órdenes con que se hallen del Gobierno se les designe por aquel cuerpo el terreno que les corresponda segun la industria que van á plantear;"

—and a translation thereof, as furnished by Mr.

Tipton, a special agent and Spanish expert of the department of justice in the office of the United States attorney for the court of private land claims, is:

"Art. 4. The families who come of themselves to settle shall present themselves immediately to the respective ayuntamiento of the place at which they desire to establish themselves in order that, in conformity with the orders which they have from the executive, there be designated to them by that body the lands to which they are entitled according to the industry which they are going to undertake."

At the time of the enactment of this colonization law Iturbide was the Emperor of Mexico. Soon thereafter a revolution followed. He abdicated on March 20, 1823, and his banishment was ordered by a decree of the Constituent Congress of Mexico, April 23, in these words:

"The Sovereign Constituent Congress of Mexico, in the session of yesterday, decreed the following:

"1. That the coronation of Agustin de [174] Iturbide being an *act of violence and of force, and void in law, there is no occasion to discuss the abdication he makes of the Crown.

"2. Consequently, it also declares as void the hereditary succession and the titles that have emanated from the cornation; and that all the acts of the late government, from the 19th of May to the 29th of March last, are illegal, but subject to revision by the present Congress for their conformation or revocation.

"3. The supreme executive authority will cause the prompt departure of Agustin de Iturbide from the territory of the nation."

Article 10 of the original draft of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, as agreed upon between the commissioners representing this government and Mexico, was as follows:

"Art. 10. All grants of land made by the Mexican government, or by the competent authorities in territories previously appertaining to Mexico, and remaining for the future within the limits of the United States, shall be respected as valid to the same extent that the same grants would be valid if the same territories had remained within the limits of Mexico. But the grantees of land in Texas, put in possession thereof, who, by reason of the circumstances of the country since the beginning of the troubles between Texas and the Mexican government, may have been prevented from fulfilling all the conditions of their grants, shall be under the obligation to fulfil the said conditions within the periods limited within the same, respectively; such periods to be now counted from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty; in default of which the said grants shall not be obligatory upon the state of Texas in virtue of the stipulations contained in this article. The foregoing stipulation in regard to grantees of land in Texas is extended to all grantees of land in the territories aforesaid elsewhere than in Texas, put in possession under such grants; and in default of the fulfilment of the conditions of any such grant within the new period, which, as above stipulated, begins with the day of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, the same shall be null and void." Message of the President of the United States, transmitting papers relative to the treaty *of Guada- [175] lupe Hidalgo, Feb. 8, 1849, Ex. Doc. 50, H. R. 30th Cong., 2d Sess. p. 17.

That article, however, was stricken out by the Senate of the United States, and in the message of President Polk the reasons for its rejection are stated in the following language (Ibid. 32):

"The objection to the tenth article of the original treaty was not that it protected legitimate titles, which our laws would have equally protected without it, but that it most unjustly attempted to resuscitate grants which had become mere nullities, by allowing the grantees the same period after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, to which they had been originally entitled after the date of their grants, for the purpose of performing the conditions on which they had been made. In submitting the treaty to the Senate I had recommended the rejection of this article. That portion of it in regard to lands in Texas did not receive a single vote in the Senate. This information was communicated by the letter of the Secretary of State to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Mexico, and was in possession of the Mexican government during the whole period the treaty was before the Mexican Congress, and the article itself was reprobated in that letter in the strongest terms. Besides, our commissioners to Mexico had been instructed 'that neither the President nor the Senate of the United States can ever consent to ratify any treaty containing the tenth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in favor of grantees of land in Texas or elsewhere.' And again, 'should the Mexican government persist in retaining this article, then all prospect of immediate peace is ended, and of this you may give them an absolute assurance.'"

And in the treaty as ratified were left the following provisions which guarantee only the rights of Mexicans to property belonging to them in the territory (9 Stat. at L. 929, art. 8):

"Mexicans now established in territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove *at any time to the Mexican [176] Republic, retaining the property which they possess in the said territories, or disposing thereof, and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without their being subjected, on this account, to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever. . . . In the said territories, property of every kind now belonging to Mexicans not established there shall be inviolably respected. The present owners, the heirs of these, and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract, shall enjoy with respect to it guaranties equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States."

The act creating the court of private land claims provides in § 13 (26 Stat. at L. 860, chap. 539):

"First. No claim shall be allowed that shall not appear to be upon a title lawfully and regularly derived from the government of Spain or Mexico, or from any of the states of the Republic of Mexico having lawful authority to make grants of land, and one that if not then complete and perfect at the date of the acquisition of the territory by the United States, the claimant would have had a lawful right to make perfect had the territory not been acquired by the United States, and that the United States are bound, upon the principles of public law or by the provisions of the treaty of cession, to respect and permit to become complete and perfect if the same was not at said date already complete and perfect."

The 8th subdivision of the same section also contains this limitation:

"No concession, grant, or other authority to acquire land made upon any condition or requirement, either antecedent or subsequent, shall be admitted or confirmed, unless it shall appear that every such condition and requirement was performed within the time and in the manner stated in any such concession, grant, or other authority to acquire land."

Messrs. Robert Rae, J. B. Cessna, and T. B. Catron for appellants.

Messrs. John K. Richards, Solicitor General, Matthew G. Reynolds, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, and Frank Springer for appellees.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

The court of private land claims was of the opinion that the ayuntamiento or town council had no power to make a grant such as this of a tract entirely outside the 4 square leagues supposed to belong to the town; and, secondly, that even if it had such power the conditions of the alleged grant were never performed by Heath, and therefore he acquired no title to the property.

The colonization law of January 4, 1823, was in force only a short time, having been suspended by the decree of April 11, 1823, and superseded by the law of August 18, 1824. Few proceedings were had under it, and therefore its true meaning cannot be considered as determined by any settled usage of the Mexican authorities. Indeed, counsel for appellants, with all their industry, have been able to find but one other grant made or attempted to be made under its authority. It is, to say the least, difficult to discern in this law any warrant for an original grant by the ayuntamiento. Article 2 provides that "the executive will distribute lands." This is in accord with the settled policy of the old Spanish law, which reserved to the King the power of granting lands. Doubtless this power was often exercised under the directions of the King by subordinate officials, but full control was retained by him. So, here, the executive retains the control of the distribution of lands. It is true the article provides that such distribution shall be "under the conditions and terms herein expressed," but that simply means the conditions and terms under which the executive will act. Article 3 refers to grants to empresarios, and that specifically declares that they "shall previously contract with the executive," who will "designate the province to which they must direct themselves; the lands which they can occupy." It is said that Heath does not come *within the terms [178 of this article because he did not propose to introduce at least two hundred families, and this contention is doubtless correct. Article 4, upon which the plaintiffs specially rely, makes provision for families who emigrate "not included in a contract," evidently referring thereby to the empresario contracts specified in the preceding section. Such families are directed to "present themselves to the ayuntamiento of the place where they wish to settle, in order that this body, in conformity with the instructions of the executive, may designate the lands corresponding to them, agreeably to the industry which they may establish." Accepting the contention of plaintiffs that Heath comes within the scope of this article, we note these limitations: The emigrating families are to present themselves to the ayuntamiento of the "place where they wish to settle," not the ayuntamiento of the town nearest to the land upon which they wish to settle. The natural meaning of this is that when families desire to settle within the limits of a town they shall present themselves to the ayuntamiento of that town for a designation of the lands they may occupy. It would be strange to find that a town council was empowered to grant lands outside the limits of the town and anywhere within the territory or department in which it was situated, while it is not strange to find that council authorized to locate emigrants upon those vacant lands not exceeding 4 leagues square which, according to Spanish and Mexican custom, were ordinarily appurtenant and subject to the jurisdiction of the town. We do not mean to intimate that El Paso in fact possessed a territory of 4 square leagues over which it had jurisdiction, although that seems to have been the opinion of the court of private land claims, for it said: "El Paso, like other Spanish towns, is presumed to have had a grant of 4 square leagues of land, and the ayuntamiento had the power to make allotments of land within the 4 leagues so granted."

This matter was considered in United States v. Santa Fé, 165 U. S. 675, 699 [41: 874, 883], and the conclusion was reached after full examination that it was not true under the Spanish law that every town was entitled to a grant of 4 leagues square, the *court saying: [179 "The inference to be deduced from all these documents supports the theory that under the Spanish laws, as found in the Recopilacion, all towns were not entitled by operation of law to 4 square leagues, but that at a late date the Spanish officials had adopted the theory that 4 square leagues was the normal quantity which might be designated as the limits of the new pueblos to be thereafter created."

Still it was undoubtedly true that by special grant or contract many towns did not have such an area of contiguous and dependent territory, and it would seem that this article gave the ayuntamiento authority to designate such portion of those lands as it deemed suitable to the industry which the emigrating families proposed to undertake.

We notice another limitation in this article, and that is that the designation by the ayuntamiento is to be made "in conformity with the instructions of the executive." This contemplates, as preliminary to the action of the ayuntamiento, some instructions from the executive, either general or special. Within the letter of this provision the executive might, in a given case, authorize the ayuntamiento of a particular town to designate lands outside of the town lands proper for emigrating families; but surely in this article there is no general grant of power to every town council to give away lands anywhere within the territory or department without any previous instructions or directions from the executive. Neither is the power contended for to be found in article 28, which simply authorizes the ayuntamiento, in case any colonist shall fail to cultivate the land which has been given him, to regrant the same tract to another. It might well be that the ayuntamiento shall have power after the lapse of a grant to regrant the same tract to another party. But it does not follow there from that the power to regrant lapsed lands implies a power to make an original grant.

Neither is the plaintiffs' case helped by the assertion that the fact of a grant presumes the power to make it. Counsel quote from United States v. Peralta, 60 U. S. 19 How. 343, 347 [15: 678, 680]: "The presumption arising from [180] the grant itself makes it prima *facie evidence of the power of the officer making it, and throws the burden of proof on the party denying it."

Whatever may be the scope of this proposition, we find in these proceedings a distinct declaration that the town council regarded its action as only preliminary, and requiring for finality the approval of the government. In the first resolution passed by the ayuntamiento on the petition of Dr. Heath it is recited:

"1st. That, saving the superior determination of the government to which this shall be given, his proposals and petition are admitted, and when he presents himself, the land he asks for shall be assigned to him in these terms: The head (toma) of the Bracito shall be the central point of the square of said 'hacienda;' that is to say, two and a half leagues in a straight line up the river, and two and a half leagues down the river, the same being observed in the sides that form the square."

And in the letter transmitting the proceedings to the governor it is said:

"The imitative circumstances of the new settlers and the fact that this corporation has no municipal ordinances regulating the distribution of land that may be useful and beneficial in promoting settlement, agriculture, arts, etc., place this corporation under the necessity of making known to your superiority the resolution, that your excellency may be pleased to dictate whatever may be your pleasure in the matter, whether it be by yourself or after consulting the most excellent provincial deputation."

And again—

"In order to avoid jealousies among private individuals and interests of some breeders of stock who generally are prejudicial to these in the development of agriculture and arts, it is observed that this jurisdiction is just beginning, and at the same time gets poorer and poorer if it is not given or provided with industries and arts, and in order to have them in its territory a means therefor is that adopted by virtue of article 4, inasmuch as to reject it difficulties would hereafter arise both because of the scarcity in the national exchequer and the poverty of these residents, for whom this ayuntamiento, *to which it very closely belongs [181] to look out for their happiness, has, without delay, put in operation the franchise of the law, this corporation stating, nevertheless, that if it has erred in anything, the concession has been made subject to the superior determination.

"This ayuntamiento has found it convenient and worthy of public confidence to bring all of the foregoing before your excellency and the most excellent provincial deputation, that you may, in view thereof, order what may be just and convenient to remove uncertainties and to proceed with certainty in every matter, which is what is desired."

So that the ayuntamiento assuming to act declared specifically that it did so "subject to the superior determination," and submitted its action to the governor of the province.

Further, on the receipt of this communication by the acting governor, it was presented to the provincial deputation, which expressly disapproved the proposed grant, and directed that notice of its disapproval should be promptly communicated to Dr. Heath. The language of the resolution passed by the provincial deputation is clear. It declares that the action taken by the ayuntamiento was not only with prejudice to the inhabitants of that jurisdiction, but also in violation of law. It is true that it does not point out wherein the violation of law consists, and refrains from further observations on account of the repeal of the colonization law, but it does direct the ayuntamiento to give notice to Heath, through the United States minister, or in some other manner, that the possession given to him was "through a mistaken opinion and wrong understanding in relation to the colonization law already repealed," and that this notice should be given in order to prevent any claim for damages in case Dr. Heath should introduce into the province the families that he had offered to bring. Even if the disapproval had been based solely on the fact that the colonization law of 1823 had been repealed, that would have been sufficient, for whatever might be adjudged the power of the ayuntamiento, and although it might have made a grant without reference to the provincial deputation *or the governor of the [182] province, yet, for reasons which to it were satisfactory, it expressly declared that the grant was subject to their approval, and in case that approval was withheld, of course the grant never became operative.

The other case to which counsel refer, in which the ayuntamiento assumed to act under the law of 1823, instead of supporting the contention that it had absolute power in the matter, tends in the other direction, and supports the opposite contention, for in that, as in this, it referred its action for approval to the governor of the province. That case was of a grant of a tract on the left side of the Rio Grande, made to Don José Lerma by this same ayuntamiento of El Paso, the proceedings in respect to which were introduced in evidence. They show that upon the petition of Lerma, on August 23, 1823, the ayuntamiento passed a resolution declaring that it deemed it proper to make the grant, but adding: "Let all that has been done be brought to the knowledge of the most excellent deputation of Chihuahua in order that it may approve this grant, if it be its superior pleasure."

In pursuance of this resolution the application was presented to the deputation of Chihuahua, which on October 10, 1823, approved the proposed grant in the following words:

"Agreeably to the resolution of the enlightened council of the town of El Paso, this most excellent deputation have deemed it proper to approve the grant of all the lands, woods, and 'sierras' applied for by the resident Don José Lerma, it being of advantage to the nation to open fields and to form settlements resulting in public utility, that enlightened council being ordered to appoint a commission that shall proceed to survey these lands and to give possession to the party interested, in the name of the supreme powers of the nation, of the lands, 'sierras,' woods, and pasturages applied for by him on the left side of the Rio Bravo del Norte."

On the receipt of such approval on October 30, 1823, the ayuntamiento proceeded to pass this resolution:

"Having received the foregoing application and approbation of the most excellent provincial deputation of Chihuahua to granting and putting the resident Don José Lerma in posses-183 sion *of the unimproved lands, woods, pasturages, and 'sierras' for which he made application for the purpose of settling on the line of the Rio Bravo del Norte and on the left side from opposite the 'Ojo del Toro,' or be it the 'Sierra de todos Sanos,' to the 'Sierra Blanca,' the enlightened council of this town, in compliance with the order of said most excellent deputation, resolved to appoint a commission of respectable and honorable persons who shall proceed to survey and delineate those lands and to put said Don José Lerma in possession thereof."

It also appointed a commission to set off the tract to Lerma. On December 12, 1823, on the report of that commission, it entered the following order:

"The land grant applied for by the resident Don José Lerma, being approved by the united council and by the most excellent provincial deputation of the city of Chihuahua, as is evidenced by the foregoing proceedings carried on by the president of the appointed commission, who is also the president of this corporation, let this record be referred to its secretary for taxation of the per diem and writing therein, according to the tariff in force in this council, in order that the party interested may be informed of the fees he must pay."

Even this action did not seem to resolve all doubts as to the validity of this grant, for, in a petition presented by Lerma to the constitutional governor of the state of Chihuahua in 1828, he set forth the action of the ayuntamiento and the provincial deputation in 1823, and the delivery to him of the tract, and then, after alleging that the subsequent ayuntamiento refused to acknowledge the validity of the grant, added:

"In these terms he appeals to your excellency, praying that he be recognized in his rights of ownership of the lands which belong to him, confirming him in his said property which was granted to him in order that a settlement be formed in said lands, and that the council of the town of El Paso be notified accordingly. I pray for justice and make the necessary protestation at Paso del Norte, May 12, 1828."

Upon such petition the following action was taken:

To the President of the Council of the Town of El Paso del Norte:

*The decree or title of possession or- [184
dered to be given by the provincial deputation and the council of El Paso del Norte in the year 1823, whereby fifty leagues of land on the left side of the Rio Bravo were granted to Don José Lerma, has been ratified and confirmed by the second constitutional congress of this state in consideration of distinguished military services rendered to the Republic by the retired lieutenant, José Lerma:

Therefore, this government considers that the land transferred by the granted bounty as an exclusive property of the said Lerma, ratifying it in all its parts. The council of El Paso del Norte will act accordingly. God and liberty.

Chihuahua, June 30, 1828.

This order of the governor, as will be seen, did not rest the validity of the grant upon the action of the ayuntamiento, or even upon its action as approved by the provincial deputation, but recited that the title had been ratified and confirmed by the second constitutional congress of the state. So that the only other case in which, as said by counsel, action was taken under this law of 1823 by any ayuntamiento clearly shows that it did not understand that it had absolute power, but that its proceedings required approval by the provincial deputation, or some higher authority. The court of private land claims was right in its conclusions that no final grant had ever been made to Doctor Heath of the tract in controversy.

But it is unnecessary to rest the case upon this alone, for even if the ayuntamiento had full and final jurisdiction in the premises, and had made an absolute and unconditional grant, —one beyond the power of any superior authority to disapprove and annul,—still we think the judgment of the court of private land claims was right, because, as indisputably appears from the evidence, when Doctor Heath came with his colonists to take possession of the tract the Mexican authorities repudiated the alleged grant, denied his rights, and practically drove him from the country. Not only that, but, as the record shows, the Mexican government thereafter granted to other parties large portions of the same tract. The disavowal, repudiation, expulsion, and subsequent grants were in no respects the irregular acts of a mere mob or other unauthorized parties. They *were the deliberate official proceed- [185 ings of the duly constituted authorities of the Mexican government. This repudiation commenced in 1824 and continued until the cession of territory to the United States, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. During all those years, so far as the record shows, no action was taken by Doctor Heath to enforce his claim or recover damages from the government of Mexico for the alleged wrongs done him. Neither were any proceedings taken by him, or those claiming under him, from the treaty of cession until the presentation of this petition before the court of private land claims. In other words, for seventy years (more than twenty of which the land was within the dominion of the government of Mexico) this claim was permitted to lie dormant. Other people have passed into possession of parts, at least, of the tract, and are occupying it under subsequent grants from that government. Twice during this lapse of time was provision made for an adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States against the government of Mexico. On April 11, 1839, a convention was entered into between the two nations referring to four commissioners all claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico which had been presented to this government for consideration. 8 Stat. at L. 526. And again, in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, there was a further provision of like nature. 9 Stat. at L. 922. Article 14 of that treaty released the Mexican government in these words:

"The United States do furthermore discharge the Mexican Republic from all claims of citizens of the United States, not heretofore decided against the Mexican government, which may have arisen previously to the date of the signature of this treaty; which discharge shall be final and perpetual, whether the said claims be rejected or be allowed by the board of commissioners provided for in the following article, and whatever shall be the total amount of those allowed."

The 15th article, which created the commission, directed that it should be guided and governed by the principles and rules of decisions prescribed by the 1st and 5th articles of a prior unratified convention, and in the 1st of those articles it was provided:

186] *"The said commissioners thus appointed shall, in the presence of each other, take an oath to examine and decide impartially the claims submitted to them, and which may lawfully be considered, according to the proofs which shall be presented, the principles of right and justice, the law of nations, and the treaties between the two Republics."

So that if Doctor Heath had any claim against the Mexican government on account of being deprived of this alleged grant he could, by a presentation of it under one or other of these treaties, have received full compensation. The fact that he made no claim is persuasive evidence that he did not understand that what had taken place amounted to a complete grant.

Further, when the United States received this territory under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo they refused to recognize as still valid and enforceable all grants which had been assumed to be made prior thereto by the Mexican authorities. Article 10 as proposed by the commissioners was rejected by this government and stricken out from the treaty. That article not only contemplated binding this government to respect all grants which would have been recognized as valid by the government of Mexico if no cession had been made, but also proposed to give to grantees who had failed to perform the conditions of their grants, and whose failure to perform might be deemed to have avoided the grants, further time to perform the conditions. By the rejection of this article this government distinctly declared that it did not propose to recognize any grants which were not at the time of the treaty of cession recognized by the Mexican government as valid, or any whose conditions, either precedent or subsequent, had not been fully performed.

In this respect the action taken was in harmony with the general rule of international law. It is the duty of a nation receiving a cession of territory to respect all rights of property as those rights were recognized by the nation making the cession, but it is no part of its duty to right the wrongs which the grantor nation may have theretofore committed upon every individual. There may be an exception when the dispossession *and wrong of the[187 grantor nation were so recently before the cession that the individual may not have had time to appeal to the courts or authorities of that nation for redress. In such a case perhaps the duty will rest upon the grantee nation, but such possible exception has no application to the present case and in no manner abridges the general rule that among the burdens assumed by the nation receiving the cession is not the obligation to right wrongs which have for many years theretofore been persisted in by the grantor nation. Because Mexico had more than twenty years before the cession forcibly taken from Doctor Heath land that was rightfully his and given part or all of it to other persons it does not follow that when the United States accepted the cession they came under obligations to do that which Mexico had failed to do, place Doctor Heath in possession and restore to him the land of which he had been thus wrongfully deprived. Such action if taken might well expose this government to just claims for compensation in behalf of the subsequent grantees of Mexico, who apparently took no personal part in the wrongs done to Heath. Doctor Heath may have had a claim against Mexico for those wrongs, but he failed to prosecute his claim in the way prescribed, and he cannot now make his failure to pursue such prescribed way a reason for enforcing a title which that nation had refused to recognize. So long as Mexico repudiated his claim to this tract his only recourse was by direct appeal or through the intervention of this government to seek compensation for the property of which he had been deprived. When this government accepted the cession of the territory it did not thereby assume an obligation to satisfy any pecuniary demands which he as an individual may have had against the Mexican government. In other words, it took that territory bound to respect all rights of property which the Mexican government respected, but under no obligations to right the wrongs which that government had theretofore committed.

But even if there were an obligation on the part of this government, either under the general rules of international law or the terms of the treaty of cession, to recognize plaintiff's 188] *claim to this particular tract, yet the time, manner, and conditions of enforcing it would depend upon the will of Congress. And in creating the court of private land claims Congress has prescribed the character of claims which that court may determine and the conditions which must attach to any claim which it may enforce. This claim, even if the grant in its inception was valid, was not one which it was within the province of the court of private land claims to approve and confirm. The 8th clause of § 13 forbids the confirmation of a grant made upon any condition or requirement, either antecedent or subsequent, unless it appears that such condition and requirement had been performed within the time and in the manner stated in the grant. That certain conditions or requirements were attached to this grant is evident from a perusal of the application and the order. That they were not performed is admitted by plaintiffs. Their contention is that performance was prevented by the Mexican authorities, and having been prevented it should be considered that performance was waived and the title had become absolute. Whatever may be said as to the duty of this government to treat a condition whose performance was prevented by the Mexican authorities as a condition performed does not detract from the proposition that the court of private land claims is not vested with such power. It is a mere creature of statute with prescribed and limited powers. It has no general equity jurisdiction. It can confirm a grant made upon condition only when such condition was performed. It is not under the statute at liberty to treat anything as equivalent to performance. Cases in which there was no performance of the conditions of the grant are cases which must be considered as reserved by Congress for further action on its part. So that under the terms of the act creating the court of private land claims, even if there were no other objections to the proceedings, the admitted fact that the conditions and requirements of this grant were never performed is sufficient to justify the ruling of the court in dismissing the petition.

Of course, the observations above made may 189]not be applicable *to a case in which the Mexican government had, subsequently to the original grant and prior to the cession, waived the performance of the conditions. For as it had power in the first instance to make the grant without conditions, its action in subsequently waiving or removing such conditions was equivalent to an original grant without conditions.

We have not deemed it necessary to consider the matter of limitations and laches. That this is an old claim is evident, seventy years having elapsed between its inception and its prosecution. Whether it must also be adjudged a stale claim and beyond judicial recognition need not be determined. The other reasons presented for its rejection are sufficient.

We see no error in the proceedings, and the judgment is affirmed.

HORACE S. CUMMINGS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 189-209.)

Statute of limitations in equity cases—suit to set aside sale for fraud—laches.

1. Courts of equity, in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, are bound by the statute of limitations which govern actions at law.
2. A suit in equity to set aside for fraud a sale by one partner in a law firm to another of his interest in fees to be earned in certain cases will be dismissed where the plaintiff, with full knowledge of the fraud for more than three years, has chosen to remain silent and permit his partner to go on and expend time and labor in prosecuting the claims as if they were his own, and thereby put himself in a better position than he would have occupied if he had asserted his rights in due season.
3. Equitable powers will not be exercised to discover whether one has been wronged, when, with full knowledge of the alleged wrong, he has allowed the bar of the statute of limitations to arise, and has slept upon his rights until such a situation has arisen as to render it inequitable to afford him relief.

That neither time nor statute of limitations runs against the state, see note to Gibson v. Chouteau 20: 534.

Courts of equity adopt and apply the statutes of limitations in cases of concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law.

Courts of equity, although not in all cases bound by the statute of limitations, unless expressly brought within its provisions, have nevertheless acted in this respect, in analogy to courts of law, and given effect to the statute in all cases of concurrent jurisdiction. Bruen v. Hone, 2 Barb. 586; Phares v. Walters, 6 Iowa, 106; Young v. Mackall, 3 Md. Ch. 398; Teackle v. Gibson, 8 Md. 70; Hertle v. Schwartze, 3 Md. 366; Knight v. Brawner, 14 Md. 1; Wilson v. Although strictly these statutes do not extend to suits in equity, yet the courts acknowledge their obligation; and where the statute takes away the right of entry, or would bar an ejectment in twenty years, it will, by analogy, bar relief in equity, although the time within which a writ of right or other real action might be brought had not expired. Statement by Mr. Justice White:

This suit was commenced by appellee Cum 190]mings on*February 1, 1890, by a bill filed on the equity side of the supreme court of the District of Columbia against Baker, the appellant. In substance, the bill set forth the formation about the year 1874 of a partnership between Cummings and Baker for the practice of law in the city of Washington; that the expenses were to be borne and the profits shared equally between the partners; that the firm some years thereafter became attorneys for the collection of claims against the United States in favor of certain inspectors of customs for arrears of pay claimed to be due them. It alleged that on September 6, 1886, Cummings sold to Baker all his interest in the fees earned but not then divided, and those yet to be earned from such claims, and that there was consequently a dissolution of the partnership as to these matters, but that it continued as to all other business until September, 1889, when the partnership was dissolved. The object of the bill was to procure a cancelation and annulment of the sale of the fees in inspector cases made as above stated and of the written instrument of assignment by which it was evidenced, on the ground of false representations claimed to have been made by Baker to Cummings in the negotiations for the sale, which representations were averred to have brought about the consent to the sale and the execution of the assignment to carry out the same. The fraud specified was, in substance, this: That Baker had misrepresented the amount of the fees then actually earned by the firm and undivided between the partners on the inspectors' claims, for which appropriations had then been made by Congress, by stating to Cummings that the then earned fees only equaled about $20,000, when in truth and in fact they were, to the knowledge of Baker, about $32,000; that as to the future claims then in the hands of the firm but not then allowed by the Treasury Department or appropriated for by Congress, Baker had knowingly largely understated the amount thereof by representing them to be only $80,000, when in fact they then amounted to about $275,000. The relief prayed was an annulment of the sale; a full settlement of the partnership affairs, treating the fees in the inspector cases as being a part of the partnership assets; and Effect will be given to the statute of limitations in equity as well as at law in proper cases. Lewis v. Marshall, 1 McLean, 16; Bank of United States v. Daniel, 37 U. A court of equity will, in analogy to the statute, presume a settlement and payment from the lapse of the same time, if the presumption be not rebutted by evidence which satisfactorily accounts for the delay, and the case does not come within the exceptions of the statute. A court of equity will give effect to the statute in all cases where the plaintiff could have brought an action at law for the same matter. Godden v. Kimmell, 99 U. S. 201 (25: 431); Mann v. Fairchild, 2 Keyes, 106; Roosevelt v. Mark, 6 Johns. Ch. 266; Clark v. Ford, 3 Keyes, 370; Stafford v. Bryan, 3 Wend. 532; McCrea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 460, 33 Am. Dec. 103; Spoor v. Wells, 3 Barb. Regardless of the question whether the statute is applied in express terms to courts of equity, it is, in all cases, except where relief is sought on the ground of fraud, bound thereby, when the statute has conferred absolute rights upon a person, or when its jurisdiction over the subject-matter is only concurrent with that of courts of law. Phalen v. Clark, 19 Conn. 421, 50 Am. Dec. 253; Coulson v. Walton, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 62 (9: 51); Miller v. M'Intyre, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 61 (8: 320).

Twenty years' adverse possession succeeding an actual or virtual disseisin bars a suit in equity as well as at law. Gates v. Jacob, 1 B. Mon. 306; Dexter v. Arnold, 3 Sumn. 152; Miller v. Where an actual adverse possession has continued for twenty years, it constitutes a complete bar in equity, wherever the same possession would 191]in aid of the final settlement which *was asked, there was also a prayer that Baker be enjoined from prosecuting an action instituted by him against Cummings, in December, 1889, to recover $2,712.81, and interest, it being averred that Baker's right to this amount was involved in a settlement of the entire partnership affairs.

The answer of Baker denied that there had been any fraud practised upon Cummings in the purchase of his interest in the fees in the inspector cases, and the alleged misrepresentations as to both classes of fees, whether earned or to be earned, was expressly denied. The averment that the complainant had sold his interest in the fees on a basis of his ownership of one half therein was directly traversed, and, on the contrary, it was alleged that the assignment resulted from the following circumstances and had been made upon these conditions: That the existence of claims by inspectors of customs against the government had been discovered by Baker, and that he had procured the business of prosecuting them for the firm for a compensation, in most cases, of 25 per cent of the sum collected, and had substantially by his own labors pressed them to a successful issue, and that the result of his exertions had been to earn for the partnership a considerable sum of money, which had been, prior to 1886, divided between the partners equally; that during the course of the business Cummings had given little or no attention to the inspectors' claims, but, on the contrary, had neglected, not only these claims, but the partnership affairs generally; that, in consequence of these facts, for months prior to September, 1886, Baker had determined to put an end to the partnership, and had so informed Cummings; that for the purpose of preventing this dissolution and securing a continued association with him (Baker) in business, which Cummings desired, an agreement had been entered into between the partners that Cummings, instead of taking an equal interest in the earnings of the firm from the inspectors' cases, should dispose of his rights therein on the basis of his having only a one-third instead of a one-half interest; that on this agreement, as to the proportion in which the partners should be entitled to the fees, and Cummings's judgment of the future result of claims unallowed and unappropriated *for, which were in their very[192 nature largely conjectural, the sale was made for a consideration of $15,000 cash to be paid by Baker to Cummings, the latter to retain in addition the full amount of all fees due to him for his services as assignee of an insolvent banking firm, which latter amount, without the release, it was averred, would have been an asset of the partnership, and was estimated to equal $10,000, of which Baker's share would have been one half.

The answer, moreover, averred that at the time of the sale Cummings had full information of the condition of the business in the inspector cases and dealt with his eyes open; that as a partner he was not only familiar with the general manner in which the business was conducted, but also, about two weeks prior to

Unless courts of equity acted in analogy to these statutes in cases where a party has a choice of forms, the result would be that the effect and real end of the statute would be eluded. Roosevelt v. Marks, 6 Johns. Ch. 266; Troup v. Smith, 20 Johns. 33; Elmendorf v. Taylor, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 152 (6: 289).

Although statutes of limitation strictly do not bind courts of equity, they will use the analogy of the statute and recognize rights acquired thereunder. Bartlett v. Ambrose, 42 U. S. App. 381, 78 Fed. Rep. 839, 24 C. C. A. 397.

Courts of equity having concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law will generally refer to the statute of limitations as applied in the latter courts to determine when the bar will be complete in equity. Boone v. Colehour, 165 Ill. 305.

Lapse of time is as complete a bar to a constructive or implied trust in equity as at law, unless there has been a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action. Hayden v. Thompson, 36 U. S. App. 361, 71 Fed. Rep. 60, 17 C. C. A. 592.

When the complainant has a concurrent remedy in a court of equity and in a court of common law, time is as absolute a bar in equity as it is at law, and in such cases the limitation, as to actions at law, applies. Re Nellley, 95 N. Y. 332; Borst v. Corey, 15 N. Y. 505; Rundle v. Allison, 34 N. Y. 182.

The statutory limitation of ten years applies to a right of action in equity, where the equitable remedy is not a mere incident of the right attainable at law. Hoyt v. Tuthill, 33 Hun, 196.

Where relief by action at law would result in multiplicity of suits, or otherwise be imperfect as a remedy, the statutory limitation of ten years will apply to the time within which an action for equitable relief may be brought. Borst v. Corey, 15 N. Y. 505; Rundle v. Allison, 34 N. Y. 180.

When there is an adequate remedy at law, the election by the plaintiff to ask equitable relief does not avoid the limitation which would have governed had he sought legal redress. Hann v. Culver, 73 Hun, 109.

The statute of limitations is applied in equity in matters of account, to actions to remove a cloud upon a title, to actions to foreclose mortgages, or title bonds, or for the specific performance of contracts; and generally courts of equity will adopt the statute in analogy to the nature of the claim sought to be enforced. Mann v. Fairchild, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 152; Hubbell v. Sibley, 50 N. Y. 468; Atwater v. Fowler, 1 Edw. Ch. 417; Hogden v. Guttery, 58 Ill. 431; Cleveland Ins. Co. v. Reed, 1 Biss. 180; Anderson v. Baxter, 4 Or. 105; Hall v. Denckla, 28 Ark. 506; Day v. Baldwin, 34 Iowa, 380.

The statute has been held applicable in equity in the following instances: In proceeding to set aside a judgment on account of fraud (Moon v. Baum, 58 Ind. 194); an action to enforce a mortgage (Eubanks v. Leveridge, 4 Sawy. 274); to redeem from a mortgagee (Smith v. Foster, 44 Iowa, 442); to vacate a judgment on the ground of fraud (Rock Rapids Independent School Dist. v. Schreiner, 46 Iowa, 172); to impeach the validity of a decree for a divorce à mensa et thoro (Bourlon v. Waggaman, 28 La. Ann. 481); to annul a mortgage on the ground of fraud (Renshaw v. Herbert, 29 La. Ann. 285); to annul a contract on the ground of lesion (Blake v. Nelson, 29 La. Ann. 545); to restore a record in a suit to enforce a contract (Wyatt v. Luton, 10 Heisk. 458); to reopen an account (Spurill v. Sanderson, 79 N. C. 466); to enforce the liability of stockholders for the debts of a corporation (Godfrey v. Terry, 97 U. S. 171 (24: 944)), or for the division of lands and profits thereof (Harlow v. Lake Superior Iron Co. 41 Mich. 583); or to recover for lands taken under legislative authority (Sommer v. Pacific R. Co. 4 Mo. App. 586); or to recover in any instance where the complainant has or ever had a remedy at law (Cleveland v. Williamson, 57 Ala. 402; Brennan v. Ford, 46 Cal. 7).

the sale, he received from Baker papers and documents which fully informed him of the exact condition of the claims, his interest in which it was proposed to sell, the papers and documents in question having been handed to Cummings during the pendency of the negotiations in order that he might ascertain the precise situation.

In addition, the answer averred that immediately after the sale, and before Cummings had cashed a check for $15,000, given him by Baker in payment of the amount of the purchase price, Cummings was put in possession of papers and documents which were acted upon by him, and which, if any fraudulent representation had been made in relation to the sale, fully informed him of the fact in ample time to have protected his interest; and although this full information was given him, before the purchase price was collected, Cummings made no pretense of any deceit practised upon him, or made any complaint as to the contract, but continued in the partnership as a member of the firm as to other business, and that the first complaint which was made by him of any unfairness in the transaction was nearly three years after the sale, and then only after Baker had insisted upon payment to him by Cummings of a sum which Baker claimed was due him, and had moreover expressed his unalterable intention to dissolve the partnership. The defense of the bar of the statute of limitations was specially pleaded.

193] *At the hearing a decree was entered for complainant, and a reference was made to an auditor to state the accounts between the parties. Pending the hearing on such reference, an appeal from the interlocutory decree was prosecuted in the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, where a judgment of affirmance was rendered. 4 App. D. C. 230. Subsequently, on confirmation of the report of the auditor, a final decree was entered in favor of the complainant for the sum of $32,772.14, with interest thereon from the 1st day of July, 1895, until paid, in which sum embraced a credit to Baker of the items claimed by him in his action at law against Cummings. From this final decree an appeal was taken to the court of appeals for the district, by which it was affirmed. 8 App. D. C. 515. This appeal was then taken.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

Before approaching a discussion of the issues which we deem it necessary to pass upon in order to conclude the controversy which the record presents, it will subserve the purpose of clearness of statement to give a brief outline of the proof as to matters about which there is no substantial controversy, and to point to the controverted question, thus eliminating from view irrelevant contentions, and concentrating the attention on the material issues.

1. The existence of the partnership was established as alleged, and the fact that the claims of the inspectors had been unearthed by Baker, and had been mainly secured by him for the firm on a contingent fee of 25 per cent, and had been almost exclusively prosecuted by him, was established beyond question. That Cummings had not given any great attention to the business for several years, and that Baker was dissatisfied therewith and had threatened to dissolve *the partnership many[194 months before September, 1886, though not explicitly admitted by Cummings, was also conclusively established.

2. The sale of Cummings's interest in the inspector fees, both earned and unearned, for a consideration which embraced a cash payment of $15,000, was also established beyond dispute. That in the negotiations which preceded the sale, Cummings contemplated something besides a mere division between himself and Baker in equal proportions of the rights of each in and to the fees, were also indisputably proved. This is testified to by Cummings himself as follows:

"I said, 'Mr. Baker, I make you this proposition: I will take one half fees in all the cases in which we have powers of attorney and contracts prior to the 1st of January, 1886, or I will take one third of all the fees in all the cases (leaving him two thirds), or I will take $15,000, as you offer, according to what you think is the best for me.' "

Undoubtedly, also, the proof establishes that when the sale was made the fees for cases allowed and appropriated for then undivided amounted to about $32,000, and that the claims subsequently allowed and appropriated for largely exceeded $80,000. From these conceded facts there arises a grave contention; Cummings claiming that, as he was entitled to an equal share of the fees, he was led, by the misrepresentations of Baker, into making a seeming sale of his interest, receiving as a consideration virtually nothing but his own money; Baker, on the other hand, contending that the transaction between the parties did not contemplate a mere division of their interest, but a sale by Cummings of his rights on the basis of his being entitled only to one-third interest in the fees, in order to obtain a continuance of the partnership as to other matters, and that the sum of $15,000 and the right of Cummings to retain the assignee's fees before referred to, was fixed by Cummings, from his knowledge of the business and his investigations made at the time, as a fair equivalent for his agreed one-third right as above stated.

3. Nor does any real dispute exist as to the fact that when the active negotiations for the sale began, papers were handed *Cummings[195 by Baker, from which an understanding of the state of the whole business could have been derived; that these papers were taken home by Cummings and retained for several weeks until just before the sale was consummated. Whilst as to these facts there is no conflict in the proof, there is a controversy as to whether it was established that Cummings examined the papers carefully so as to put himself in possession of the information which might have been obtained from them; Cummings claiming that the papers were of such a confused nature that he could have arrived at an accurate knowledge only by inquiry, labor, and investigation, which he did not make, as he preferred to rely upon Baker's special acquaintance with the status of the claims. Baker, on the other hand, claiming that he had no greater information than was accessible to Cummings, and that the latter dealt on the faith of his own knowledge and estimate, and not upon information derived from or representations made by Baker personally.

4. The proof also establishes, and there is no contention on the subject, that on the evening of the sale or the morning of the day following Baker left the city of Washington for the state of New Hampshire; that he left Cummings in the office, and before going placed in his hands a document known in the record as Exhibit H. M. B., No. 3, to enable Cummings to look after any matters in the inspector cases which might require attention during his (Baker's) absence; that at the same time Baker left with Cummings the bank deposit book of Baker, with his check book containing signed and unfilled checks to be used as occasion required in the making of remittances or payments in the inspector cases; that Cummings acted upon this authority and made deposits of drafts collected from the government, drew checks for amounts due claimants, and made entries indicating these latter facts upon the schedule in question; that at the time of Baker's departure Cummings had not cashed the check given him by Baker as the consideration for the sale, and that Cummings canceled it, and on different occasions filled up three of the signed checks left by Baker, for [196] the sum of $5,000 each, and *collected the same, thus acquiring the consideration referred to. The proof further established that Baker remained absent for nearly a month, and on his return found Cummings in the office as usual; that they continued thereafter to occupy the same office, and that no complaint was made by Cummings as to the fairness of the sale until nearly three years thereafter, at which time Baker was pressing a claim against Cummings, and had told him that he was going to dissolve the partnership.

The controverted issue arising from the foregoing unquestioned facts is this: Cummings claims that he did not derive knowledge of the fraud he complains of from the matters just stated; whilst Baker asserts that if the fraud in the purchase complained of by Cummings had existed, full knowledge thereof was conveyed to Cummings by the facts above stated, and that the silence of the latter and his inaction for years, and until Baker had made claim for money and stated his intention to dissolve partnership, not only establishes the want of foundation for Cummings's assertion that there was misrepresentation and fraud in the sale, but also makes clear the fact that the right to make such claim was barred, both by limitations and laches, when the demand of Cummings was actually preferred.

It results from the foregoing that the facts as to the controverted matters are embraced in a narrow compass, and that the whole case really resolves itself into two issues: 1st. Does the proof establish that the purchase and sale in question was as claimed by Cummings, or as asserted by Baker? In that question is necessarily embraced the further one of whether Cummings, at the time of the sale, had actual knowledge of the fraudulent representations claimed to have been made by Baker. This is, in terms, included, because it would be impossible in reason to declare that one had been deluded or deceived by misrepresentations into entering into a contract if he had actual knowledge when the contract was made that the alleged inducing representations were false. 2d. Conceding that Cummings was misled by the fraudulent representations of Baker as alleged, did he immediately after the *sale, and [197] before the collection by him of the cash consideration of the sale, discover that the representations were untrue, and thereby become aware that he had been grossly deceived and defrauded, and did he, with such knowledge, say nothing about the matter, collect the cash consideration, remain silent, and continue in partnership with Baker, occupying the same office for years, and only assert that he had been deceived when a dissolution of the partnership was threatened and he was pressed to pay a sum which Baker claimed Cummings owed him? This latter inquiry assumes a twofold aspect, for although in the bill, in the opinions below, and in the argument at bar, the efficient misrepresentation, which it is asserted rendered the assignment void, was the fraudulent statement as to the sum of the fees on the claims then allowed and appropriated for, nevertheless it is also, as we have seen, asserted in the bill and contended in argument that there was a misrepresentation as to the pending claims not yet acted upon by the department, and which were then unappropriated for by Congress.

We will defer an examination of the testimony as to the existence of the fraud and misrepresentation complained of until we have passed on the charge that, if there was fraud and misrepresentation, Cummings had full knowledge thereof immediately after the sale. We adopt this order of consideration because if it be found that such was the case, the question whether the fraud originally existed will become immaterial, in view of the defenses of limitation and laches. Moreover, in reviewing the question of knowledge, we will do so in the order stated, that is, first, discovery of the alleged fraud and misrepresentation as to the amount of fees collected and in process of collection from claims appropriated for at the time of the sale; and, second, discovery of the misrepresentation as to the amount of pending claims for which further fees were expected. Here, also, it is to be premised that if the first proposition be found to be well taken, an examination of the second will be wholly unnecessary. This, obviously, is the case, for as the statute of limitations began to run from the time when suit might have been brought to annul the sale, it *results that the discovery of [198] the falsity of any material and fraudulent representation by which the sale had been induced, gave rise to the right to commence an action to rescind, and therefore fixed the period when the statute of limitations commenced its course.

I.—Did the schedules left with Cummings the day after the sale, when Baker went off to New Hampshire, and which remained in the custody of Cummings and were practically under his control, convey to Cummings full knowledge that he had been grossly deceived as to the amount of fees collected, as alleged by him, if his statement that such false representation had been made was true, and did he remain silent for three years thereafter?

In entering upon an analysis of the evidence upon this particular subject, we shall be governed by the principle determined by this court in numerous cases—of which Stuart v. Hayden, 169 U. S. 1 [ante, 639], decided at the present term, is the last expression—that when two courts have reached the same conclusion on a question of fact, their finding will not be disturbed unless it be clear that their conclusion was erroneous.

To determine whether Cummings knew immediately after the sale and before he had collected the price thereof whether misrepresentations had been made to him and fraud practised upon him as to fees from cases then appropriated for, it is, of course, essential to see clearly what were the misrepresentations asserted to have been made, and what was the fraud claimed to have been perpetrated. They were, as alleged in the bill, that Baker, with a knowledge that the fees from the claims allowed and appropriated for were $32,000, had concealed the fact from Cummings, and represented that such fees were only equal to $20,000 or thereabouts. It is obvious then that the fraudulent representation alleged was not as to the amount of the claims allowed and appropriated for upon which the fee of 25 per cent was to be calculated, but as to the sum of the fees to arise from the calculation. And this is unmistakably established by the testimony of Cummings in his examination on the 29th of February, 1892, where he said, in describing the representation made by Baker to him:

199] *"I asked Mr. Baker how many fees there were that were due us in cases that had been adjudicated and for which appropriation had been made, and which were then in the process of collection, and he said about $20,000, or not more than $22,000. I was somewhat surprised at that, and I so expressed my surprise to him; he said that our fees in some of those cases were not as much as usual; some only about 10, 15, or 20 per cent."

It is not reasonable to infer that surprise could have arisen as to the amount of fees if there had been no antecedent knowledge of the sum of the claims on which the fees were to be calculated. The fact that Cummings had approximate general knowledge of the amount of the claims is not only shown by the particular statement just cited, but by his declaration that he observed when appropriations were made, knew at the time that the appropriation of August, 1886, had been made, and also knew that practically all of the inspector cases were controlled by his firm. As all the fees earned which were embraced in the sale arose from claims covered by the appropriation made in August, 1886, it follows that these statements by Cummings and his admitted knowledge of the August appropriation taken together leave no doubt that Cummings was fully informed as to the sum of the claims from which the earned fees arose. Indeed, the possibility of any other view of the testimony is removed by a statement of Cummings subsequently made, and to which we shall hereafter more fully refer, in which he plainly says that he knew that the gross amount coming in on the basis of the usual compensation was $32,000, and supposed that the reduced amount arose from charges against it.

Now, then, the issue of fact to be determined is this: Could it have been possible for Cummings to have received the schedule in question on the morning after the sale, to have dealt with it, to have made entries on it at various times, without being informed that the fees of the firm were not less than 25 per cent in a sufficient number of cases to have justified any belief whatever that the sum of the fees was reduced from $32,000 to $20,000? The schedule left in his hands by *Baker contained [200 seven sheets. In one column was the name of the claimant, in another the total allowance, in a third the fee, in a fourth the amount of the remittance to the claimant, in a fifth the date of the remittance, in a sixth whether remitted by check, in a seventh the number of the check, and in an eighth column the date of the check. The amount of the aggregate fees appearing on each sheet was added up and stated at the bottom of the column. With such total stated, the only act required to ascertain the aggregate amount of all the fees was to sum the footings of the sheets. And yet the want of knowledge by Cummings of the fraud is predicated upon the proposition that although these sheets were in his hands for nearly a month while he was dealing with them, making entries on them, he was so careless as never even to make the addition which would have conveyed to him absolute knowledge of the fact that the fraud had been committed. But even the addition was not necessary, for if the fraudulent misrepresentation was made, it was not, as we have seen, as to the gross amount, but as to the net fees to be realized from the gross amount, that is, that the diminished amount arose from the fact that in the cases on the schedule the firm was getting less than 25 per cent. But on the sheets, in the column of fees immediately next to the column of amount allowed, the sum of the fee in each case was stated, and no eye could even casually look at the schedule without observing that nearly all the fees were stated therein at the rate of 25 per cent, and not at a diminished rate. However, to hold that Cummings did not derive knowledge from the schedule, the reasoning must go yet further. Out of 106 names on the schedule, there were only five where the fees stated were less than 25 per cent, and in four of these five cases the fact that the fee was a reduced percentage was made evident by the statement expressed in figures immediately opposite the name of the claimant, giving the exact percentage upon which the fee was calculated. The mind, then, is driven to the conclusion that the testimony beyond doubt establishes that Cummings knew immediately after the sale and before he collected the price that Baker had made to him a gross and wilful misrepresentation, if the *statement [201 was made by Baker to which Cummings testifies, and which he asserts operated to induce him to part with his interest.

Overwhelming as is the proof that the schedule conveyed to Cummings the knowledge of the fraud if it had been perpetrated, such fact is unquestionably shown by Cummings's further testimony. At a subsequent stage of his examination when he was questioned on the subject and his possession of the schedule had been developed, he frankly admitted that his possession of the schedule and his dealings with it had informed him that Baker's representation which he swore had been made about the diminished percentage was untrue, but that he had on such discovery lulled himself into security by the belief that there must have been another reason for Baker's statement of the reduction in the amount of fees, that is, the large sums which Baker might have had to pay out to other attorneys, and presumably under this belief he remained silent. We extract a question and answer bearing on this subject:

"Q. Now, then, your check was paid in that way. When did you first obtain any knowledge as to the amount of claims which had been collected by Baker upon the first class of cases—I allude to the class of cases in which he said there were from $20,000 to $22,000 in fees, the cases in which appropriation had already been made; and you may also state at the same time when you first discovered in regard to the other class of cases in which no appropriation had been made—when you first discovered the amount?

"A. The amount of the claims that had been adjudicated and which were in the process of collection I discovered, of course, within a day or two after Mr. Baker had delivered me the schedules, and I continued the collections, because these schedules contained the name, the amount, the fee, and all the data pertaining to each case, and it was hard for me to reconcile the amount of fees that he said and the amount of fees that were on the schedule, and I know often we had to pay out a large amount of our fees to other attorneys, as I frequently had paid one half of a 202] fee to a local attorney to work *up the evidence, and I had supposed the great diminution of these fees from what I supposed, viz., $32 000, in the vicinity of $30,000 was owing to the division with other lawyers. It has been my habit in a number of cases—I write down my ideas of things, and on that occasion I sat down and I made a private memorandum for myself, giving my impressions of the matter, wondering as to whether I had done the best or not and wondering if the facts were———"

However unreasonable may be this explanation, and however natural is the inference that, if Cummings had discovered that his partner had made a gross misstatement to him and defrauded him, he would not have completed the sale by collecting the consideration, but would have called his attention to the facts when the partner returned a month after, need not be discussed since the reason given by Cummings for the conduct is rendered wholly nugatory by another consideration, which is this: The seventh of the sheets left in the custody of Cummings contained a statement of the sums to be paid to other attorneys by the firm on the claims mentioned in the schedule. The form of this sheet was slightly different from that of the others. It showed the name of the attorney to whom the fee was due, in the next column in what case the fee was due, in the third column the date of the remittance of the fee, in the fourth column whether remitted by check, and in the fifth the date of the check. Now, if, as demonstrated by the proof and as admitted by Cummings himself in his second statement, his dealings with and relations to the schedule conveyed to him knowledge that there was no truth in Baker's supposed representation as to reduced percentages coming to the firm, how in reason can it be denied that knowledge that the amount could not have been materially reduced by fees paid to other attorneys must have also been conveyed to him when the schedule plainly showed the fact as to the amounts to be paid other attorneys and that they aggregated less than $1,500. Indeed, it is justly to be inferred from the testimony that, as the facts shown by the schedule were developed and Cummings's memory was refreshed by the examination thereof, his mental condition changed, and he reached the *conclusion that he had been previously [203 mistaken in saying that, although the schedule had informed him of the amount, he had been lulled into security, since he subsequently swore that the schedules gave him no information whatever, because he did not look at them at all. His statement to this effect is as follows:

"When Mr. Baker handed me that paper and called my attention to the fact that all had not been collected, and that quite a number of payments were still to be made, I simply put it in my desk; I paid no attention to it, because I considered the trade was made. I had nothing to do with it, but simply took that paper, and when a power of attorney would come in with power to cash the draft I would make the proper entry, but it never came into my head that there was anything wrong about it. I considered that I had sold out to Mr. Baker for a fair consideration. I had no idea that I was being paid with my own money."

"So, also, on cross-examination in rebuttal, the following question was asked and answer given by complainant:

"Q. Mr. Cummings, you have stated that Exhibit H. M. B., No. 3 (the schedule we have been referring to), in answer to a question by Mr. Claughton, was in your possession, and that you paid no attention to it and put it aside. You did not take enough interest in it to go over it and see what it was?

"A. The transaction was closed, as I supposed."

Again, after being cross-examined at some length and called upon to explain his delay in instituting the present proceedings, and after he had stated that in 1886 he knew of the fact of the appropriation in August of that year by Congress, he was asked to state if he had discovered any facts in 1888 in relation to the appropriation of 1886 which he did not have in 1886. The reply was:

"A. I knew no more about the standing of the appropriations of 1886 for these cases and of the settlements thereunder for two years after those settlements were made; in other words, I had no knowledge of the appropriation of 1886 until my suspicions were aroused in 1888. I supposed it was all fair and square. 204] "I don't know that I learned anything in 1888 of consequence about the appropriation of 1886, but it was only when the three appropriations, amounting to about $240,000 in 1888, instead of the $80,000 as was represented to me, that I began to inquire into the matter, and my knowledge of the appropriation of 1886 and of the fees thereunder was gained by taking the appropriation of 1886 and going into the First Auditor's Office and seeing what drafts were delivered to Mr. Baker or Cummings, or Cummings and Baker, under the appropriation of 1886. When I had gotten the list of those drafts I got the correct amount of them.

"I think it was in the fall or winter of 1888 or 1889 when I got the list. I did not get a list; I made a list and I went back to my office and I took the Treasury executive document containing the allowances of those cases, and I estimated, as far as I could, and I believe that I am correct, that Mr. Baker received $135,000 on the claims of 1886.

"I don't remember now that I knew anything about the appropriation of 1886, intervening between 1886 and 1888, though I may have done so, but I do not remember it."

But the "list" referred to did not give him as much information as was contained in the schedule which was handed to him immediately after the sale, and which he had in his sole custody for more than three weeks. Nor can the statement of the witness that the schedule was not looked at, overcome the inherent probabilities as to the knowledge which must have been conveyed, in view of their contents, of the length of time they were in Cummings's possession, of his entries thereon and dealings therewith, and, above all, his previous sworn statement. In other words, the last statement that knowledge was not conveyed by the schedule cannot be taken as true without repudiating the previous declaration that the schedule had given the knowledge, but that it so doing did not excite suspicion, for a reason which the schedules themselves show could not have existed.

From the record we infer that this result must have produced an impression upon the mind of Cummings, for later on in his examination, when his attention was called to the fact that if 205] he had been deceived by Baker as to the sum of the fees when the sale was made, he could not have escaped discovering it when the schedules were handed to him after the sale, he again changed his position and declared that he did not then take any action because the discovery of the misrepresentation as to the amount of the fees earned had not excited his suspicions, because of the immateriality of such misrepresentations.

"A. I am not going to give ideas, but simply facts. My whole idea as to whether I had made a poor trade or not had nothing to do with the amount of fees received in 1886, but solely and entirely on account of the future business that would come in; when Mr. Baker had told me that there was only $75,000 or $80,000 more of cases, out of which there would be a possible $20,000 of fees, I did not know whether that was correct or not, and, as I stated, I could not tell, but time alone would tell."

The situation, then, is this: Looking at the case, as made by the testimony of Cummings, it is impossible to avoid reaching two conclusions; 1st, that Cummings knew the exact condition of the earned fees shortly after the sale, and knew also that he had been grossly deceived if his statement of the transaction was the true one, and that with this full information he collected the price of the sale and remained quiescent for three years without complaining and without attempting to have the wrong rectified; 2d, that this conduct on his part is first attributed to one cause and then to another and conflicting one. When both of these explanations are shown by the proof to be untrue, then the matter is finally explained by him by the statement that on the discovery of the facts he so acted, because he attached no importance whatever to the amount of the fees earned at the time of the sale, and considered that he had not been defrauded by the untrue representations which he asserted had been made in reference thereto. But the bill of complaint, as we have seen, proceeds and the judgments below rested upon the theory that the representation as to the amount of the earned fees at the time of the sale was the most material ground for rescinding the contract.

*Our conclusion is, that the evidence [206 not only clearly but beyond all question or dispute overwhelmingly shows that if the false representations as to the earned fees were made as alleged, there was entire knowledge thereof by Cummings. And, for reasons heretofore stated, this conclusion renders unnecessary any inquiry into the question of when Cummings discovered the falsity of the alleged representations as to the amount of pending claims.

The question which arises is, Can Cummings invoke the aid of a court of equity to afford him the relief which he seeks? A negative answer is compelled by a consideration of the most elementary principles.

As said in Metropolitan National Bank v. St. Louis Despatch Co. 149 U. S. 448 [37: 799]: "Courts of equity in cases of concurrent jurisdiction consider themselves bound by the statutes of limitation which govern actions at law." That Cummings might at his election have pursued a remedy for the alleged fraud in a court of law is obvious. And it is equally clear that such remedy at law, by action on the case predicated on the facts as to deceit and fraud, which are alleged in the bill now before us, would have been barred in three years from the discovery of the fraud under the Statutes of Limitation of Maryland of 1715, chap. 23, § 2, in force in the District of Columbia. 1 Kilty's Statutes, 111; Comp. Laws Dist. Col. chap. 42, § 6, p. 360. It hence follows, irrespective of the equitable doctrine of laches, that the relief which the bill seeks to obtain ought not to be allowed by a court of equity.

Apart, however, from the bar of the statute of limitations, the facts as to the full knowledge of the fraud, if any existed, by Cummings more than three years before the filing of his bill, and his conduct after he obtained it, his permitting Baker to go on and prosecute the claims as if they were his own, debars Cummings from invoking a court of conscience to put him in a much better position than he could possibly have occupied if he had spoken and asserted his rights in due season.

There cannot be a doubt that the right existed in Baker to have dissolved the partnership at any time. If this right on his part had been exercised, Cummings would not have been in 207] *a position to have availed himself of the labors of Baker in prosecuting the future claims to a successful culmination, and would not therefore have been a participant in the profits arising therefrom. If with a full knowledge of the fraud Cummings chose to remain silent, to permit Baker to go on with the prosecution of the claims, to incur the expenditure of time and labor not only in the cases in which he was successful but in the cases in which he failed, Cummings cannot in conscience be allowed to reap the rewards which he could not possibly have obtained had he spoken with reasonable promptness, when the knowledge of the fraud if it existed was brought home to him in the most pointed and unequivocal way.

These broad considerations of equity and justice were not applied below because it was deemed that the occasion for their enforcement had not arisen, for two reasons: First, because it was thought that even if Cummings discovered the fraud in ample time to have availed himself of his rights, he was lulled into not doing so by his faith and confidence in Baker and his disinclination to believe that Baker had perpetrated so gross a fraud upon him. Second, because it was said as Cummings's share of the earned fees, upon the theory of a half and half division, was equal to the price which he received, there was no consideration for the sale, and the transaction was wholly void, hence there was no room for the application either of the statute of limitations or the doctrine of laches. In other words, that the partnership continued as to the inspector claims just as if no sale had been made. And the doctrine was carried to its logical outcome, since the judgment below awarded to Cummings a share in the fees earned by Baker, from contracts not under the control of the firm at the time of the sale of the interest in the inspector cases, but which were acquired by Baker thereafter.

But neither of these views meets our approbation. The first is completely answered by the fact that the analysis of the evidence which we have made conclusively establishes that if the fraud was perpetrated as alleged, the fullest knowledge was conveyed to Cummings more than three years before he brought his suit. 208]Under this state of facts the *reasoning comes then to this, that there is no doctrine, either of limitation or of laches, applicable to a case of alleged fraud even although the party obtains almost at once full knowledge thereof, if he choose without due reason to affirm that he did not act because he was unwilling to believe his own senses. Reduced to its ultimate deduction, the proposition maintains this doctrine, that if one against whom a fraud has been perpetrated, and who thereafter is in all respects fully informed of its nature and extent, chooses not to act, his so electing may continue indefinitely, provided only he declares, not that he did not know, but that knowing he did not believe.

The second proposition, conceding arguendo the facts are as it assumed them to be, that is, that the price was paid Cummings from his own money, leads in reason to an equally impossible result, since its consequence is substantially to affirm that neither limitation nor laches can be applied in equity when from a given view of the proof it is considered that a fraud has been committed of such a nature as to avoid a contract. That this is the logical outcome of the proposition is shown by its application to the case under consideration. Whether or not Cummings was paid by his own money depends upon an analysis of the facts and a finding as to their preponderance. If the theory of Baker be true that the contract contemplated a division between the partners as to the claims in question, not upon the basis of one half each, but upon the basis of two thirds to Baker and one third to Cummings, because the claims had been largely realized by the efforts of Baker, and because, as a consideration for so dividing, Baker agreed as to other business to continue the partnership with Cummings when otherwise he would have dissolved, there can be no pretense for the claim that Cummings was paid with his own money. To say, then, that Cummings was paid by his own money necessitates deciding that the fraud was established as alleged by Cummings. But the principle by which the bar of the statute of limitations is enforced by a court of equity, and upon which the doctrine of laches rests, is that equitable powers will not be exercised to discover whether one has been wronged when, with full *knowledge of the alleged wrong, he[209 has allowed the bar of the statute of limitations to arise, and has slept upon his rights until such a situation has arisen as to render it inequitable to afford him relief. By the effect of the proposition referred to these principles are subverted, and a new doctrine arises which may be thus stated: A court of equity will not grant relief against fraud where the one against whom the fraud has been committed has, after its discovery, allowed the bar of the statute of limitations to be accomplished, unless there has been fraud, and if there has been such fraud neither laches nor limitation can ever apply.

Because we rest our conclusions upon the application of the bar of the statute and the laches of Cummings, we must not be considered as intimating that we conclude that there was either clear and convincing proof, or even a preponderance of proof, that the sale was as claimed by Cummings.

It follows that the decree of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia must be reversed, and the cause be remanded to that court, with directions to set aside the decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and to remand the cause to that court with instructions to dismiss the bill. And it is so ordered.

UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
JOHN F. KLUMPP et al.

Tariff act of 1894.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 209-217.)

Worsted dress goods are "manufactures of wool" within the meaning of the act of Congress of August 27, 1894, ¶ 297, providing that the reduction of rates of duty on manufactures of wool shall not take effect until January 1, 1895.

Argued January 20, 1898. Decided February 21, 1898.

ON A WRIT OF CERTIORARI to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a decision of that court affirming the decision of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, which reversed the decision of the board of general appraisers overruling a protest of importers John F. Klumpp et al. as to duties assessed by the collector upon imported merchandise. Judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed; judgment of the Circuit Court also reversed, and cause remanded with directions to affirm the decision of the Board of General Appraisers.

See same case below, G. A. 2769, 68 Fed. Rep. 908, 38 U. S. App. 467.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

210] *On the 30th day of August, A. D. 1894, John F. Klumpp and others, doing business as a partnership under the name of Alexander Murphy & Co., imported into New York certain merchandise consisting of women's and children's dress goods composed of worsted. The collector classified this merchandise and assessed it for duty under paragraph 395 of the tariff act of October 1, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 567, chap. 1244), at 12 cents per square yard and 50 per cent ad valorem. The importers protested, claiming the goods to be dutiable under paragraph 283 of the tariff act of August 27, 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 509, chap. 349), at 40 per cent or 50 per cent ad valorem, according to the value per pound.

The board of general appraisers overruled the protest (G. A. 2769), and the importers carried the matter to the circuit court, which reversed the decision of the board of general appraisers. 68 Fed. Rep. 908. On an appeal to the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit, the decision of the circuit court was affirmed. 38 U. S. App. 467. The case was then brought here on certiorari.

It was admitted below "that the classification of the merchandise by the collector was worsted dress goods, at twelve cents per square yard and fifty per cent ad valorem under schedule K, paragraph 395 of the tariff act of October 1, 1890."

And "that the merchandise in controversy is worsted dress goods, made from the fleece of the sheep, which has been combed and spun into worsted yarn, and is not composed of the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animal than sheep."

Paragraph 395 of Schedule K of the act of October 1, 1890, entitled "Wool and Manufactures of Wool," reads: "On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloth, bunting, and goods of similar description or character composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals, and not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be twelve cents per square yard, and in addition thereto fifty per centum ad valorem: Provided, That on all such goods weighing over four ounces per square yard the duty per pound shall be four times the duty imposed *by this act[211 on a pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto fifty per centum ad valorem."

Paragraph 283 of Schedule K of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled "Wool and Manufactures of Wool," provided: "On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloth, bunting, or goods of similar description or character, and on all manufactures composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals, including such as have India rubber as a component material, and not specially provided for in this act, valued at not over fifty cents per pound, forty per centum ad valorem; valued at more than fifty cents per pound, fifty per centum ad valorem."

Paragraphs 280 to 286, inclusive, under this schedule, provided for duties on articles made, or composed, "wholly or in part of wool, worsted, or the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals," except that paragraph 282, which referred to blankets, etc., omitted the word "worsted."

Paragraphs 287 to 296, inclusive, related to carpets, mats, etc., and the concluding paragraph of the schedule read: "297. The reduction of the rates of duty herein provided for manufactures of wool shall take effect January first, eighteen hundred and ninety-five."

Paragraph 685, one of the paragraphs of the free list, was as follows: "685. All wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and all wool and hair on the skin, noils, yarn waste, card waste, bur waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, and all waste, or rags composed wholly or in part of wool, all the foregoing not otherwise herein provided for."

Mr. John K. Richards, Solicitor General, for appellant.

Messrs. W. Wickham Smith and Charles Curie for appellees.

NOTE.—As to lien of United States for duties, see note to United States v. 350 Chests of Tea, 6: 702.

As to action to recover back duties paid under protest; protest, how made, and its effect,—see note to Greely v. Thompson, 13: 397.

As to recovery for goods sold to smugglers, see note to Graves v. Johnson (Mass.) 15 L. R. A. 834.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

Women's and children's dress goods "com-212]posed wholly or *in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals," were dutiable under paragraph 395 of the act of October 1, 1890, at 12 cents per square yard and 50 per cent ad valorem; under paragraph 283 of the act of August 27, 1894, at 40 or 50 per cent ad valorem, according to value. But by paragraph 297, the reduction of the rates of duty on "manufactures of wool" was not to take effect until January 1, 1895. And if that paragraph applied to worsted dress goods for women and children, then the collector was right, and the judgment must be reversed.

Was it intended that the words "manufactures of wool," as used in this paragraph, should include or exclude worsted goods?

Worsted goods are made out of wool, and are necessarily a manufacture of wool. The Century Dictionary defines "worsted" as a noun: "A variety of woolen yarn or thread, spun from long staple wool which has been combed, and in the spinning is twisted harder than is usual;" and as an adjective: "Consisting of worsted; made of worsted yarn: as, worsted stockings."

"Worsted is but wool, spun and twisted in a particular manner," said Mr. Justice Story, in Whiting v. Brancroft, 1 Story, 560. And in Cohn v. Seeberger, 30 Fed. Rep. 425, it was found by Judge Blodgett that "worsted is made by combing the long fibered wools so that the fibers shall lie or be arranged alongside of each other; while wool is treated by carding, so as to interlock the fibers with each other."

As between worsted yarns and woolen yarns the Encyclopedia Britannica says that the fundamental distinction "rests in the crossing and interlacing of the fibers in preparing woolen yarn,—an operation confined to this alone among all textiles, while for worsted yarn the fibers are treated, as in the case of all other textile materials, by processes designed to bring them into a smooth parallel relationship to each other." Vol. 24, p. 658.

Although through the introduction of improved processes of manufacture, it gradually became possible to comb shorter and finer varieties of wool, and thus to manufacture worsted 213] *goods of higher grade and better quality, approximating worsted to woolen goods, and removing the reason for any distinction between them in the matter of duties, the tariff laws prior to May 9, 1890, made a distinction in that respect between woolen and worsted goods, resting on the difference in the process of manufacture; but the raw material was, of course, always the same, namely, wool.

By the tariff acts of April 27, 1816 (3 Stat. at L. 310, chap. 107); of May 22, 1824 (4 Stat. at L. 25, chap. 136); May 19, 1828 (4 Stat. at L. 270, chap. 55); July 14, 1832 (4 Stat. at L. 583, chap. 277); August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. at L. 548, chap. 270), worsted stuff goods were recognized as manufactures of wool.

By the acts of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. at L. 42, chap. 74); March 2, 1861 (12 Stat. at L. 252, res. 15); July 14, 1862 (12 Stat. at L. 543, chap. 168); June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 202, chap. 171); March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. at L. 559, chap. 197); March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. at L. 488, chap. 121), "manufactures of wool not otherwise provided for," were separated from "manufactures of worsteds not otherwise provided for," and distinct duties levied on each, while from 1861 distinct duties were levied on articles specifically described, whether manufactured of wool or worsted.

In Seeberger v. Cohn, 137 U. S. 95 [34: 599], it was held that cloths popularly known as diagonals, and in trade as worsteds, were subject to duty under the act of March 3, 1883, as manufactures of worsted and not as manufactures of wool, the ground of decision being thus stated by Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the opinion of the court:

"In the interpretation of the customs acts, nothing is better settled than that words are to receive their commercial meaning; and that when goods of a particular kind, which would otherwise be comprehended in a class, are subjected to a distinct rate of duty from that imposed upon the class generally, they are taken out of that class for the purpose of the assessment of duties.

"Of the two successive paragraphs in the customs act of 1883, upon which the parties respectively rely, the first imposes a certain scale of duties on 'all manufactures of wool of every description, made wholly or in part of wool, not specially *enumerated or [214 provided for in this act;' and the second imposes a lower scale of duties on 'all manufactures of every description, composed wholly or in part of worsted.' . . .

"Though worsted is doubtless a product of wool, and might in some aspects be considered a manufacture of wool, yet manufactures of worsted being subjected by the second paragraph to different duties from those imposed by the first paragraph on manufactures of wool, it necessarily follows that a manufacture of worsted cannot be considered as a manufacture of wool, within the meaning of this statute."

This decision was announced November 17, 1890, but the controversy had been pending for a long time in the courts, and on May 9, 1890, an act was passed, "providing for the classification of worsted cloths as woolens," by enacting "that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to classify as woolen cloths all imports of worsted cloth, whether known under the name of worsted cloth or under the names of worsteds, or diagonals, or otherwise." 26 Stat. at L. 105, chap. 200.

And since that date no distinction for customs purposes between woolens and worsteds has been recognized by Congress.

By the act of October 1, 1890, the same duties were levied upon worsted and woolen goods. Paragraphs 375 to 387 divided all wools, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals into three classes, and levied certain duties on each class. Paragraphs 391 to 398 provided for certain duties on described articles, whether made wholly or in part of "wool, worsted, the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals."

By the act of August 27, 1894, wool was put on the free list (¶ 685), and the paragraphs of the act of October 1, 1890, classifying wools and levying duties on the different classes, were omitted. Paragraphs 280 to 286, inclusive, of Schedule K of this act prescribed duties on certain enumerated articles, whether composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animal.

There was no distinction made by either of 215]these acts between *manufactures of wool and manufactures of worsted for the purposes of duty, and the word "worsted" seems to have been used out of abundant caution and as conducive to greater certainty.

The act of July 24, 1897, commonly known as the Dingley act, omits the repetition of the words "wool, worsted, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other animals," and uses the single word "wool." Paragraph 383 provides: "Whenever, in any schedule of this act, the word 'wool' is used in connection with a manufactured article of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool or hair of the sheep, camel, goat, alpaca, or other animal, whether manufactured by the woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process." 30 Stat. at L. 151, chap. 11.

Manifestly the distinction on which the decision in Seeberger v. Cahn turned was done away with by the acts of October 1, 1890, and August 27, 1894, as well as by that of May 9, 1890, and there certainly is no imperative ground for its reinstatement by technical construction.

The reason for the postponing of the taking effect of the reduction of duties obviously had nothing to do with the process of manufacture, but related to the material of which the goods were composed, which material had been relieved from duty by paragraph 685 of the act.

Congress undoubtedly concluded that the manufacturers of goods from wool had laid in a large stock of material, which equitably they should be allowed a reasonable time to work off, and that there was probably on hand a large stock of goods, to dispose of which reasonable time should be allowed, rather than that the large dealers should be induced to bring in foreign goods at a cost which involved ruinous competition; while at the same time the wool growers ought to have their original market until they could adjust themselves to the new condition of things.

The specific rate was compensatory, and, when stricken out, and the duty on raw material abolished, a postponement was provided for in order to avoid injustice.

But the reason for postponing the reduction 216]on manufactures *of wool, which, on the face of the act, we think properly imputable to Congress, is as applicable to worsted goods as to any other goods fabricated from wool.

It will be perceived that the acts of 1890 and 1894 did not levy a duty on "worsted dress goods," eo nomine, nor on worsted dress goods by commercial designation, nor on worsted dress goods as distinguished from woolen dress goods; but a duty on dress goods, whether made of "wool, worsted, the hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals." The description is addressed to the quality and material of the goods, namely, women's and children's dress goods, made of wool, worsted, etc.

The principle, then, that the special designation of an article by its commercial meaning should prevail over general terms used in the same or a later act has no application.

In Barber v. Schell, 107 U. S. 617 [27: 490], the words "cotton laces, cotton insertings," etc., used in the act of 1846, were held to be designations of articles by special description of quality and material, and the general provision of 1857, transferring to Schedule C "all manufactures composed wholly of cotton, which are bleached, printed, painted, or dyed," whereby a different duty was imposed on such goods, was held to apply. Mr. Justice Blatchford said: "The designations qualified by the word 'cotton,' in the act of 1846, are designations of articles by special description, as contradistinguished from designations by a commercial name or a name of trade. They are designations of quality and material." Cadwalader v. Zeh, 151 U. S. 171, 178 [38: 115, 118].

It is argued that the same reasoning which brings worsted goods within the words "manufactures of wool," would also compel the inclusion of goods composed of the hair of the camel and other animals, confessedly not covered by the phrase.

Doubtless wool considered as the sheep's coat might be said to be the sheep's hair, and fleeces of the hair of the Angora goat, the Llama, the Alpaca, and other like animals, might be called their wool. In the Encyclopædia Britannica (9th ed. vol. 24, p. 653) under the title of "Wool and Woolen Manufactures," *it is said: [217 "Wool is a modified form of hair, distinguished by its slender, soft, and wavy or curly structure, and by the highly imbricated or serrated surface of its filaments. The numerous varieties of the sheep are the most characteristic, as they are also by far the most important, producers of wool; but the sheep is by no means the only animal which yields wool, employed for industrial purposes. The alpaca and other allied fibers obtained from the alpaca and its congeners in South America, the mohair yielded by the Angora goat, and the soft woolly hair of the camel are all wools of much industrial importance, while the most costly wool in the world is that yielded by the Cashmere goat of the Himalayan Mountains. At what point, indeed, it can be said that an animal fiber ceases to be hair and becomes wool it is impossible to determine, because in every characteristic the one class by imperceptible gradations merges into the other, so that a continuous chain can be formed from the finest and softest merino to the rigid bristles of the wild boar." G. A. 2834; Lyon v. United States, 8 U. S. App. 409, 413.

But the acts of 1890 and 1894, as well as prior tariff acts, distinguished the wool of the sheep from the hair of the camel, goat, and other like animals, as raw materials. And there is nothing in this record from which to conclude that Congress felt obliged to make concessions by way of alleviating the effect of the act of 1894 on the production of the hair of the camel, the goat, the alpaca, and so on, in this country, or on manufactures thereof.

We think that the words "manufactures of wool," in paragraph 297, had relation to the raw material out of which the articles were made, and that as the material of worsted dress goods was wool, such goods fell within the paragraph.

Judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed; judgment of the Circuit Court also reversed, and the cause remanded to that court with a direction to affirm the decision of the board of general appraisers.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina to review a judgment of conviction of Charles P. Barrett for conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States. Affirmed.

See same case below, 65 Fed. Rep. 62.

Statement by Mr. Justice Fuller:

Barrett was indicted, with others, as stated in the caption of the transcript of the record, "at a circuit court of the United States for the fourth circuit in and for the district of South Carolina, begun and holden at Columbia in the district aforesaid, on the 4th Monday in November, 1894, before the Honorable Wm. H. Brawley, United States judge for the district of South Carolina, holding said circuit court according to the form of the act of Congress in such cases made and provided," for conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States, under §§ 5440 and 5480 of the Revised Statutes, and, having been duly tried, was found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment and fine.

To review this judgment, this writ of error was prosecuted.

The indictment commenced as follows:

United States of America, } To wit: In the District of South Carolina. } Circuit Court.

At a stated term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina, begun and holden at Columbia, within and for the district aforesaid, on the fourth Monday of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four, the jurors of the United States of America within and for the district aforesaid upon their *oaths respectively do present that [219 Charles P. Barrett [and others, naming them], together with divers other evil-disposed persons to the jurors aforesaid unknown, late of the district aforesaid, on the first day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, at Spartanburg, in the state of South Carolina aforesaid, in the district aforesaid and within the jurisdiction of this court, being persons of evil minds and dispositions, wickedly devising and intending to commit the offense against the United States hereinafter set forth, fraudulently, maliciously, and unlawfully did combine, conspire, confederate, and agree together between and among themselves to commit against the United States this offense—etc., etc.

Certain exceptions were taken to the action of the court in refusing to sustain a challenge to the array of both grand and petit jurors on the ground that they were drawn from both the eastern and western districts of South Carolina, when the alleged offense was charged in the indictment to have been committed in the county of Spartanburg in the western district of said state; to the order of the court overruling defendant's demurrer to the indictment on the ground that the offense was charged to have been committed in the county of Spartanburg, in the state of South Carolina, the same being in the western district of said state, although the indictment was found in the city of Columbia in the county of Richland in the eastern district thereof; to the refusal of the court to sustain defendant's plea to the jurisdiction on the ground that, although the alleged offense was charged to have been committed in the county of Spartanburg, the same being in the western district of South Carolina, the trial was sought to be had in the city of Columbia in the county of Richland, in the eastern district of said state; to the denial by the court of defendant's motion that the district attorney be required to elect on which one of several conspiracies disclosed by the evidence to have been committed, if any, he would ask for a conviction; and to the refusal of the court to arrest judgment because the grand jurors who found the indictment and the petit jurors who found the verdict were drawn from the western *and eastern districts of South Carolina, [220 although the offense was alleged to have been committed in the county of Spartanburg in the western district; because the indictment was found in the county of Richland in the eastern district at a time not authorized by law for the sitting of the United States court for the western district, and because the trial was had in the county of Richland in the eastern district for an offense committed in the western district.

Mr. Charles C. Lancaster for plaintiff in error.

Mr. James E. Boyd, Assistant Attorney General, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

As to the action of the court overruling defendant's motion on the evidence to compel the district attorney to elect, the bill of exceptions does not contain the evidence, and it is impossible for this court to know the ground on which the circuit court proceeded. The exception in that regard need not therefore be considered.

In respect of the other exceptions, they all present the same objection in different forms, namely, that the state of South Carolina was divided into two judicial districts, and that an indictment could not be lawfully found in the circuit court of the United States held in the eastern district, or a trial be therein had, for a criminal offense committed in the western district.

The Constitution provides that the trial of crimes shall be had in the state "where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any state, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed,"—art. 3, § 2, cl. 3; and by Amendment 6, that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the 221]crime shall have been committed, *which district shall have been previously ascertained by law."

This indictment was found December 3; the trial had December 6 to 11; and the defendant sentenced December 12, 1894, in the circuit court in session at Columbia. Were there at that time two judicial districts in South Carolina within the intent and meaning of the Constitution and the acts of Congress in that behalf?

The circuit court of each judicial district sits within and for that district; and its jurisdiction as a general rule is bounded by its local limits. Toland v. Sprague, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 300, 328 [9: 1093, 1104]; Devoe Manufacturing Company, Petitioner, 108 U. S. 401 [27: 764]. At the same time courts may be required to be held at different places in a judicial district, and prosecutions for offenses committed in certain counties may be required to be tried, and writs and recognizances to be returned at each place, but this does not affect the power of the grand jury sitting at either place to present indictments for offenses committed anywhere within the district. Logan v. United States, 144 U. S. 263 [36: 429]. As to where trials shall be had in a judicial district depends entirely on the legislation upon the subject. Rosecrans v. United States, 165 U. S. 257 [41: 708]; Post v. United States, 161 U. S. 583 [40: 816].

By the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, the then United States were divided into thirteen districts, of which New Hampshire, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Georgia, and South Carolina each constituted one district, called by the name of the state, as, for instance, "South Carolina district;" while a part of the state of Massachusetts was erected into a district "called Maine district," and a part of the state of Virginia into a district "called Kentucky district," the remaining part of the state of Massachusetts being made a district "called Massachusetts district," and the state of Virginia, except so much thereof as was thereby made the district of Kentucky, a district "called Virginia district." 1 Stat. at L. 73, chap. 20.

The plan was to make each of the states a judicial district, and to direct the appointment of a judge, a clerk to be *appointed by him, [222 a district attorney, and a marshal, for each district. But that part of Massachusetts now constituting the state of Maine, and that part of the state of Virginia now forming the state of Kentucky, were erected into independent districts under the names of "Maine district" and "Kentucky district," and the district court established in each was invested with the powers of a circuit court.

By the 4th section these districts, "except those of Maine and Kentucky," were divided into three circuits, called the eastern, the middle, and the southern circuits; and it was provided that circuit courts should be held "in each district of said circuits," by two of the justices of the Supreme Court and "the district judge of such districts."

North Carolina having ratified the Constitution November 21, 1789, Congress by the act of June 4, 1790 (1 Stat. at L. 126, chap. 17), gave effect to the judiciary act of 1789 in that state, erecting it into a district to be called "North Carolina district," establishing a district court with one judge, and annexing the district to the southern circuit. Rhode Island having ratified the Constitution May 29, 1790, a similar act to give effect to the judiciary act was passed June 23, 1790 (1 Stat. at L. 128, chap. 21), by which Rhode Island was annexed to the eastern circuit.

From the first, then, district courts have been, in exceptional instances, vested with circuit-court jurisdiction.

On February 21, 1823, an act was passed entitled "An Act to Divide the State of South Carolina into Two Judicial Districts," as follows: "That the State of South Carolina be, and the same is hereby divided into two districts, in manner following, that is to say: the districts of Lancaster, Chester, York, Union, Spartanburg, Greenville, Pendleton, Abbeville, Edgefield, Newberry, Laurens, and Fairfield shall compose one district, to be called the western district; and the residue of the state shall form one other district, to be called the eastern district. And the terms of the said district court for the eastern district shall be held in Charleston, at such times as they are now by law directed to be holden. And for the trial of all such criminal and civil causes as are by law *cognizable in the district [223 courts of the United States which may hereafter arise or be prosecuted, or sued, within the said western district, there shall be one annual session of the said district court holden at Laurens court-house, to begin on the second Monday in May in each year; to be holden by the district judge of the United States of the state of South Carolina; and he is hereby authorized and directed to hold such other special sessions as may be necessary for the despatch of the causes in the said court, at such time or times as he may deem expedient, and may adjourn such special sessions to any other time previous to a stated session." 3 Stat. at L. 726, chap. 11.

By an act approved May 25, 1824, entitled "An Act to Alter the Times of Holding the Circuit and District Courts of the United States for the District of South Carolina" (4 Stat. at L. 34, chap. 145), it was provided that the circuit court "for the district of South Carolina" should annually be held "at Charleston on the second Tuesday of April, and at Columbia on the third Tuesday of November," etc.; and that "the times of holding the district court of the United States at Laurens court-house, South Carolina, shall be so altered that the said court shall hereafter convene on the Tuesday next ensuing, after the adjournment of the circuit court of the United States at Columbia."

On March 3, 1825, this act was amended by providing that "the circuit court for the district of South Carolina, at Columbia, South Carolina, shall commence on the fourth Tuesday in November, annually." 4 Stat. at L. 124, chap. 78.

By an act of May 4, 1826, the sessions of the circuit court "for the district of South Carolina" were again changed (4 Stat. at L. 160, chap. 37) and again February 24, 1829 (4 Stat. at L. 335, chap. 19).

By the act of March 1, 1845 (5 Stat. at L. 730, chap. 39), it was provided, referring to the circuit court, "that the spring term of said court shall be held in and for the district of South Carolina at Charleston, on the Wednesday preceding the fourth Monday in March."

By an act approved August 16, 1856, entitled [224] "An *Act to Alter the Time for Holding the District Court in South Carolina, and for Other Purposes" (11 Stat. at L. 43, chap. 119), it was provided that so much of the act of May 25, 1824, as provided "for holding the district court of the United States at Laurens court-house, South Carolina, on the Tuesday next ensuing after the adjournment of the circuit court of the United States at Columbia, be and the same is hereby repealed; and that in place thereof the said court shall be held at Greenville court-house, South Carolina, on the first Monday in August in each year." And it was further provided that the jurors for said court, grand as well as petit, should be drawn "from the inhabitants of Greenville district, South Carolina," except that the jurors for the first term of the court should be drawn at "the term of the district court to be holden in the city of Charleston;" and further, that "the said district court for Greenville, in addition to the ordinary jurisdiction and powers of a district court of the United States, shall have jurisdiction of all causes (except appeals and writs of error) which now are or may be hereafter made cognizable in a circuit court of the United States, and shall proceed in the same manner as a circuit court."

The act of July 15, 1862 (12 Stat. at L. 576, chap. 178), provided that "the districts of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida shall constitute the fifth circuit;" and repealed the act or acts which vested circuit-court powers in the district courts for the districts of Texas, Florida, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and Kansas; while by the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. at L. 794, chap. 100), the districts of California and Oregon were constituted the tenth circuit; and so much of any act or acts as vested in the district courts for California and Oregon the power and jurisdiction of circuit courts was repealed.

By the act of July 23, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 210), it was provided that "the districts of Maryland, West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina shall constitute the fourth circuit."

The act of April 10, 1869 (16 Stat. at L. 44, chap. 22), authorized the appointment of a circuit judge "for each of the nine existing judicial circuits;" but that act, by the act of July 1, 1870, *was not to be construed "to re- [225] quire a circuit court to be held in any judicial district in which a circuit court was not required to be held by previously existing law." 16 Stat. at L. 179, chap. 186.

In the Ku Klux Cases, tried in the circuit court at Columbia, in the fall of 1871, before Circuit Judge Bond and District Judge Bryan, Mr. Reverdy Johnson objected to the issue of a venire to summon additional grand and petit jurors "from the body of the district" embracing the whole state, though he admitted that "it is true that the circuit court has jurisdiction, as a court, over the entire district of South Carolina." The court ruled that so far as the circuit court was concerned there was but one district in South Carolina. South Carolina Ku Klux Trials, pp. 8, 9, 10.

The Revised Statutes were adopted June 22, 1874 (the second edition being published in 1878), and contain the following sections:

"Sec. 530. The United States shall be divided into judicial districts as follows:—

"Sec. 531. The states of California, Connecticut, Delaware, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont, and West Virginia, each, constitute one judicial district."

"Sec. 546. The state of South Carolina is divided into two districts, which shall be called the eastern and western districts of the district of South Carolina. The western district includes the counties of Lancaster, Chester, York, Union, Spartanburg, Greenville, Pendleton, Abbeville, Edgefield, Newberry, Laurens, and Fairfield, as they existed February 21, 1823. The eastern district includes the residue of said state."

"Sec. 551. A district judge shall be appointed for each district, except in the cases hereinafter provided. Every such judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, . . .

"Sec. 552. There shall be appointed in each of the states of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Tennessee, one district judge, who shall be district judge for each of the districts included in the state for which he is appointed, and shall reside within some one of the said districts. . . ."

*"Sec. 571. The district courts for the [226] western district of Arkansas, the eastern district of Arkansas at Helena, the northern district of Mississippi, the western district of South Carolina, and the district of West Virginia, shall have, in addition to the ordinary jurisdiction of district courts, jurisdiction of all causes, except appeals and writs of error, which are cognizable in a circuit court, and shall proceed therein in the same manner as a circuit court.

"Sec. 572. The regular terms of the district courts shall be held at the times and places following: . . . In the eastern district of South Carolina, at Charleston, on the first Monday in January, May, July, and October. In the western district, at Greenville, on the first Monday in August."

"Sec. 604. The judicial districts of the United States are divided into nine circuits as follows: . . . Fourth. The fourth circuit includes the districts of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina. . . ."

"Sec. 608. Circuit courts are established as follows: One for the three districts of Alabama, one for the eastern district of Arkansas, one for the southern district of Mississippi, and one for each district in the states not herein named; and shall be called the circuit courts for the districts for which they are established."

"Sec. 658. The regular terms of the circuit courts shall be held in each year, at the times and places following . . .: In the district of South Carolina, at Charleston, on the first Monday in April; and at Columbia on the fourth Monday in November."

"Sec. 767. There shall be appointed in each district, except in the middle district of Alabama, and the northern district of Georgia, and the western district of South Carolina, a person learned in the law, to act as attorney for the United States in such district. . . . The district attorney of the eastern district of South Carolina shall perform the duties of district attorney for the western district of said state."

Section 776 makes similar provision as to United States marshals for said districts.

"Sec. 563. The district courts shall have jurisdiction as follows:

227] *"First. Of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, committed within their respective districts, the punishment of which is not capital. . . ."

"Sec. 629. The circuit courts shall have original jurisdiction as follows: . . . Exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where it is or may be otherwise provided by law, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of crimes and offenses cognizable therein."

The Revised Statutes were compiled under an act of June 27, 1866, providing "for the revision and consolidation of the statute laws of the United States" (14 Stat. at L. 74, chap. 140), the appointment of three commissioners being thereby authorized to accomplish the work. These commissioners were directed to arrange the statutes and parts of statutes "under titles, chapters, and sections, or other suitable divisions and subdivisions, with headnotes briefly expressive of the matter contained in such divisions; also with side notes, so drawn as to point to the contents of the text, and with references to the original text from which each section is compiled."

By the act of March 2, 1877 (19 Stat. at L. 268, chap. 82), the preparation and publication of a new edition of the Revised Statutes was provided for, the work to be done by a single commissioner, who was required to add to the marginal references made in the previous revision.

In United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 626 [33:1080, 1082], we said: "If there be any ambiguity in § 5467, inasmuch as it is a section of the Revised Statutes, which are merely a compilation of the statutes of the United States, revised, simplified, arranged, and consolidated, resort may be had to the original statute from which this section was taken to ascertain what, if any, change of phraseology there is, and whether such change should be construed as changing the law. United States v. Bowen, 100 U. S. 508, 513 [25: 631, 632]; United States v. Hirsch, 100 U. S. 33 [25: 539]; Myer v. Car Company [Meyer v. Western Car Co.], 102 U. S. 1, 11 [26: 59, 60]. And it is said that this is especially so where the act authorizing the revision directs marginal references, *as is the case here. 19 Stat. at L. [228 268, chap. 82, § 2; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 51."

Section 546 appears under "Title 13. The Judiciary. Chapter 1. Judicial Districts;" and the cross-reference in the margin is to the act of "21 Feb. 1823, chap. 11, § 1, vol. 3, p. 726."

When, then, Congress enacted this section it seems to have construed the act of 1823, not as dividing the state into two judicial districts, as indicated in the title of the act, but into two districts in the sense of geographical divisions, which is in harmony with the language used in the body of the act. At all events, the phraseology of § 546 is only consistent with the conclusion that the state constituted but one judicial district, containing two divisions, which were "called the eastern and western districts of the district of South Carolina."

And it should be remembered that there was, during all this time (and this has prevailed from thence hitherto), but one judge, one attorney, and one marshal for the district of South Carolina.

It is said that in the first draft of the commission to revise the statutes, the commissioners recommended the adoption of a section corresponding to § 546, in this language: "The district of South Carolina is divided into two divisions, which will be called the eastern and western divisions of the district of South Carolina. The western division includes the counties of Lancaster, etc., as they existed February 21, 1823. The eastern division includes the residue of said state." And it is argued that because § 546 was couched in its present language, notwithstanding the recommendation, that it therefore follows that Congress intended to divide the state into two judicial districts. We cannot concur in that view. While the use of the word "division" might have been more felicitous, yet we think the meaning of the statute was sufficiently plain, and that it would be inadmissible to recur to the draft of the commissioners to create a doubt where none existed. Moreover, it would be a much greater stretch of construction to say that because Congress did not see fit to use the word "division," therefore it should be held that the 229]*words actually employed, "of the district of South Carolina," were inadvertently inserted, and should be rejected altogether.

It should be noted that by § 608 circuit courts were established for each district in the states not therein named, the states specified being Alabama, Arkansas, and Mississippi, and yet that by § 571 certain district courts, including that for the western district of South Carolina, retained circuit-court powers.

Nevertheless, it was held by Chief Justice Waite, sitting with Judge Bond in the circuit court in 1877: "As to the question of the jurisdiction of this court throughout the entire state of South Carolina, we decide, for the purposes of this trial, in favor of the jurisdiction. This is in accordance with the uniform practice of the court, without objection from any quarter, for nearly half a century." United States v. Butler, 1 Hughes, 457, 463.

And in 1886 it was said by Simonton, J., holding the circuit court: "All parts of the state of South Carolina are within the jurisdiction of this court. Its process runs all through the state. It does not know, in the sense which affects its jurisdiction, either the eastern or western district." Young v. Merchants' Ins. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 273, 275.

However we are relieved from considering the effect upon the jurisdiction of a circuit court having jurisdiction throughout a state, constituting a single judicial district, of a part of the district being subjected to the jurisdiction of the circuit court clothed with circuit-court powers, as the act of February 6, 1889 (25 Stat. at L. 655, chap. 113), in terms "established a circuit court of the United States in and for the western district of Arkansas, for the northern district of Mississippi, and for the western district of South Carolina, respectively, as the said districts are now constituted by law;" and withdrew circuit-court powers from said district courts.

By the act of April 26, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 71, chap. 165), it was provided that there should be "four regular terms of the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina in each year, as follows: In the 230] city of Greenville, on the *first Monday in February and on the first Monday in August; in the city of Charleston, on the first Monday in April; and in the city of Columbia, on the fourth Monday in November;" and that "the office of the clerk of said court shall be kept in the cities of Charleston and of Greenville, and the clerk shall reside in one of the said cities and shall have a deputy in the other." And although the act then went on to prescribe terms "of the district courts in the eastern district of South Carolina;" and "of the district court in the western district of South Carolina," we think the operation of the prior sections was not thereby affected.

It may be added that in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act of May 28, 1896, appropriations were made for the salaries (among others) of the United States district attorney "for the eastern and western districts of the district of South Carolina," and of the United States marshal "for the eastern and western districts of the district of South Carolina." 29 Stat. at L. 140, chap. 252, §§ 7, 9.

From this review of the statutes we are unable to arrive at any other conclusion than that in 1894, when these proceedings were had, there were not two judicial districts in the state of South Carolina, to the territorial limits of each of which the jurisdiction of the circuit court was confined; and that the exceptions in this regard must be held not to have been well taken.

It is also suggested in the brief for plaintiff in error that error supervened in that the record does not affirmatively show the issue of the venire for the grand and petit juries; nor that the defendant was arraigned; nor that he was personally present when the verdict was rendered and sentence pronounced.

But the record does show that the indictment was duly returned; that motions to quash the indictment and the venire of grand and petit juries were made and overruled; that the defendant pleaded "not guilty" to said indictment; that the trial came on on that issue, and a petit jury was duly impaneled and sworn; that trial was had and a verdict of guilty returned, and sentence thereon entered; and that no exceptions were *saved to any of these proceedings other[231 than the exceptions before mentioned.

The result is that the judgment must be affirmed.

UNITED STATES (No. 2).

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 231-233.)

Judicial district of South Carolina.

The state of South Carolina constitutes but one judicial district, and an indictment found in the circuit court of the United States held in the eastern district of that state may be properly remitted for trial to the district court for the western district of that state.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of South Carolina to review a judgment convicting Charles P. Barrett of conspiracy under § 5440 of the Revised Statutes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles C. Lancaster for plaintiff in error.

Mr. James E. Boyd, Assistant Attorney General, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an indictment for conspiracy under § 5440 of the Revised Statutes, found by the grand jury "in the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina begun and holden at Columbia within and for the district aforesaid, on the fourth Monday of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety four," and on motion of the "United States attorney for the district of South Carolina," was by the circuit court, January 30, 1895, by order entered on its minutes, "remitted from the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina to the district court of the United States for the western district of South Carolina."

232] *At the February term, 1895, of the district court held at Greenville, in the western district, the district judge presiding, the defendant pleaded not guilty; the cause was tried, defendant was found guilty, and, thereupon was sentenced to imprisonment and fine. From this judgment a writ of error was prosecuted to this court.

On the trial defendant raised certain objections presented by exceptions, which are enumerated in a bill of exceptions: by demurrer that the indictment was found in the eastern district of South Carolina, although the crime was charged to have been committed in the western district; by preliminary plea, "that the jurors of the grand jury by whom the indictment was found were drawn, summoned, and impaneled from both the eastern and western districts of South Carolina, instead of from the western district of said state alone;" that the indictment was found in the circuit court of the United States for South Carolina, held in the city of Columbia, in the eastern district of said state, and was remitted to the district court for the western district of said state; by motion on the close of the testimony for the United States, "that the attorney for the United States be required to elect on which one of the conspiracies he would ask for a conviction," that is, of several distinct conspiracies, which the evidence tended to show; by motion in arrest that the grand jurors, who found the indictment, were drawn, summoned, and impaneled from both the districts when the crime was charged to have been committed in one of them; that the indictment was found in the eastern district at a time when there was no law authorizing the "holding any court of the United States for the western district of South Carolina;" because the indictment was remitted, "not to the district court of the United States for the eastern district of South Carolina, but to the district court of the western district of said state."

The court overruled all these objections, in whatever form presented, and defendant excepted.

Sections 817, 1037, and 1038 of the Revised Statutes are as follows:

"Sec. 817. The grand and petit jurors for the 233]district *court, sitting in the western district of South Carolina, shall be drawn from the inhabitants of said district who are liable, according to the laws of said state, to do jury duty in the courts thereof; and all jurors shall be drawn during the sitting of the court for the next succeeding term."

"Sec. 1037. Whenever the district attorney deems it necessary, any circuit court may, by order entered on its minutes, remit any indictment pending therein to the next session of the district court of the same district, where the offense charged in the indictment is cognizable by the said district court. And in like manner any district court may remit to the next session of the circuit court of the same district any indictment pending in the said district court.

"Sec. 1038. Any district court may, by order entered on its minutes, remit any indictment pending therein to the next session of the circuit court for the same district, when, in the opinion of such district court, difficult and important questions of law are involved in the case; and thereupon the proceedings in such case shall be the same in the circuit court as if such indictment had been originally found and presented therein."

No objection was raised that the petit jury by which defendant was tried was not, and it was conceded at the bar that it was, in fact, drawn from the inhabitants of the western district of the district of South Carolina, and no complaint is preferred in that regard.

We have just decided that the state of South Carolina constitutes but one judicial district, and, this being so, the indictment was properly remitted, in accordance with § 1037, to the next session of the district court of that district, begun and holden on the 1st Monday of February, 1895, in the western district of the district.

All other questions have been disposed of adversely to plaintiff in error in the preceding case.

Judgment affirmed.

Oral agreement to hold land as trustee.

Where a mortgagee purchased the mortgaged premises at a foreclosure sale, and the mortgagor remained in possession for about a year after the sale, and then removed upon notice from the mortgagee, who has ever since remained in possession, and the mortgagor did not claim any interest in the land for fifteen years, nor pay any interest or taxes, very positive and satisfactory evidence is required to sustain an oral agreement of the mortgagee, alleged to have been made at the time of the mortgage sale, to hold the land indefinitely as a trustee for the sole and exclusive benefit of the mortgagor.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry E. Davis and H. B. Moulton for appellant.

Mr. J. Holdsworth Gordon for appellees.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill in equity, filed by the mortgagor of land in the District of Columbia, more than fifteen years after the sale and conveyance of the land under a power in the mortgage, to redeem the land and to enforce a trust therein.

The supreme court of the District of Columbia, after a hearing upon pleadings and proofs, dismissed the bill; and its decree was affirmed by the court of appeals. 8 App. D. C. 230. The plaintiff appealed to this court.

The following facts were either admitted or clearly proved: Philip Levis, being the owner of the land, on October 29, 1875, made a first mortgage thereof to trustees to secure the payment of his note to one Clokey for $2,000, payable in three years with interest at the annual rate of 10 per cent; and on May 13, 1876, made a second mortgage to one Weaver, as trustee, to secure the payment of a promissory note to Charles R. Kengla and George M. Kengla for $300, payable in one year, with like interest. Under this second mortgage, default having been made in the payment of the $300 note, the land was advertised for sale "subject to a prior trust of $2,000;" and on October 29, 1877, was accordingly sold by auction, and was bought by the two Kenglas for [235] the sum of $1,000, subject to the first mortgage for $2,000. The plaintiff remained in possession of the land for about a year after the sale, and then removed upon notice from the Kenglas to quit, and they have ever since remained in possession. On January 17, 1878, Weaver, as trustee under the second mortgage, conveyed the land to the Kenglas, in accordance with the terms of the sale, and received from them the price of $1,000. On May 26, 1879, the Kenglas, with the knowledge of Levis, sold and conveyed part of the land to one Hume for the sum of $2,756.89. Levis never claimed any interest in the land, after the conveyance to the Kenglas on January 17, 1878, until he filed the original bill in this case against them on March 29, 1893.

In the bill, the plaintiff alleged that, when the land was put up for sale by auction on October 29, 1877, there being present no bidders nor any persons interested in the purchase of the property except the defendants, the threatened sale was objected to by the plaintiff, and was only permitted to be made, without protest, upon an oral statement by the defendants that they only desired to obtain out of the property the amount of the encumbrances thereon, and that, if he would permit them to go through the form of a sale, they would take and hold the property for his benefit, and would reconvey it to him, or so much thereof as was left after sufficient had been sold to satisfy their claim, together with the costs of the sale; whereupon, relying upon their promise, he suffered an informal sale of the property to be made to them by the trustee.

The defendants, answering under oath, denied that at any time before the sale to them there was any understanding, agreement, or suggestion, of any kind whatsoever, between them and the plaintiff, to impeach or qualify the absolute purchase of the property by them for their own use and benefit; and alleged that, after that sale, the plaintiff informed them that he believed he could obtain a purchaser for the property at a greater price; that, wishing the plaintiff to obtain as much as possible out of the property, they informed him that if he could obtain such purchaser within two weeks from the day of sale, [236] they would convey the property to such purchaser, and turn over to the plaintiff the increased price obtained; that the plaintiff endeavored to obtain such purchaser, but finally came to them and informed them that he had failed to find a purchaser; whereupon they obtained a deed from the trustee.

Upon a careful consideration of the conflicting testimony introduced at the hearing, this court fully concurs in one of the positions taken by the court of appeals, and stated in its opinion as follows: "The complainant has not established his case by any such preponderance of testimony as is required by the rules of law to overthrow the title of the defendants. On the contrary, the preponderance of testimony is wholly against him. It is unreasonable to suppose that the defendants, having a good security as it stood, would have converted themselves into permanent trustees for an indefinite period for the sole and exclusive benefit of the complainant, the latter never at any time concerning himself with the payment of interest or taxes, or the care of the property in any way, for fifteen years. To establish such an arrangement as this very positive and satisfactory evidence would be required; and without going into any examination of the testimony, it is sufficient for us here to say that, in our opinion, the testimony wholly fails to establish any such arrangement, or any arrangement whatever upon which a court of equity would be justified in acting. It would seem to be a conclusive answer to the complainant's pretensions that when, within a year after the sale, and when they deemed their indulgence to him to have reached its legitimate limit, they gave him notice to quit the premises, and thereby plainly intimated to him that they regarded any interest which he might have had in the premises as at an end, he submitted to the notice without protest and acquiesced in his exclusion from the property. This conduct, coupled with his utter disregard thereafter of any liability either in regard to the property or in regard to the indebtedness, is wholly inconsistent with the existence of any such trust arrangement as that which he claims to have been made between him and the defendants." 8 App. D. C. 237.

This view being decisive of the case, it [237] becomes unnecessary to consider the defense of laches, or that of the statute of frauds; and a discussion of the testimony in detail could be of no value as a precedent, and would serve no useful purpose. Harrell v. Beall, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 590 [21: 692]; Tyler v. Campbell, 106 U. S. 322 [27: 162].

Laches in action to recover land—public interests.

A delay of over forty years after a land warrant issued to a soldier has been sold by the guardian of his heirs and a patent issued to the purchaser for the land, and thirty years after the youngest heir has come of age, in bringing an action by the heirs to impeach the sale and recover the land, constitutes such laches as will defeat the action, where the warrant was sold for its full value and the proceeds were applied to the use of the heirs, and the land was platted and sold to innocent purchasers, and has increased in value from $100 or $200 to over $1,000,000, and is partly covered by houses and business blocks.

The interests of public order and tranquillity demand that parties shall acquaint themselves with their rights within a reasonable time; and although this time may be extended by their actual ignorance or want of means, it is by no means illimitable.

APPEAL from a decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit affirming the decree of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Minnesota dismissing a suit in equity brought by Elizabeth Wetzel et al., plaintiffs, against the Minnesota Railway Transfer Company et al., to establish title to land in the city of St. Paul. Affirmed.

See same case below, 56 Fed. Rep. 919, 27 U. S. App. 594.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was a bill in equity filed in the United States circuit court for the district of Minnesota, by the widow (since remarried) and heirs at law of George W. Remsen against the Minnesota Railway Transfer Company, and over two hundred other defendants, to establish title to 160 acres of land situate within the corporate limits of the city of St. Paul, which the complainants contended was held in trust for them by the defendants. The land was estimated to be of the value of over $1,000,000.

The facts of the case are substantially as follows: George W. Remsen was a private in Company K, Third Regiment, United States Infantry, and served in the Mexican war. By virtue of his enlistment as a soldier he became entitled, under § 9 of the act of Congress of February 11, 1847 (9 Stat. at L. 123, chap. 8), to locate a quarter section of government land, subject to private entry, under the regulations and restrictions established by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. This section further provided that in case of the death of the *soldier his right under the act should [238 descend to his widow and minor children; and, further, that in the event of the issuance of a land warrant to the minor children of a deceased soldier "then the legally constituted guardian of such minor children shall, in conjunction with such of the children, if any, as may be of full age, upon being duly authorized by the orphans' or other court having probate jurisdiction, have power to sell and dispose of such certificate or warrant for the benefit of those interested."

Remsen died in the military service in October, 1847, and thereafter a land warrant was issued on September 30, 1848, to "Elizabeth Remsen, widow, Harriet A. Remsen, Mary Ann Remsen, John W. Remsen, Elizabeth Remsen, and George W. A. Remsen, children, heirs at law, of George W. Remsen, deceased." On October 6, 1848, Mrs. Remsen qualified as guardian of all the minor children of Remsen (except Harriet A., who was then seventeen years of age), before the orphans' court for the county of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

The land warrant issued to the widow and minor children of Remsen was never located by any or either of them, but was sold and assigned on October 11, 1848, to one Nathan C. D. Taylor, of St. Croix county, territory of Minnesota, who subsequently located it upon the land in controversy and to whom a patent was issued by the government on March 20, 1850, and from whom all the defendants in this case, directly or indirectly, claim title.

The sale and assignment of the warrant were made without an order authorizing or confirming it, so far as appears, of the orphans' court appointing Mrs. Remsen as guardian, and was consummated by Mrs. Remsen, acting in her own right and as the guardian of the minor children, with whom was joined Harriet A. Remsen.

It was contended by the complainants in the circuit court, as well as in the circuit court of appeals, that the sale and assignment of the land warrant to Taylor was utterly void as to the interest of all the minor children of George W. Remsen, other that Harriet A., who joined in the assignment, because the sale and assignment made by the mother as *guardian [239 was not authorized by any order or decree of the orphans' court of the county of Philadelphia.

The circuit court dismissed the bill on the ground of laches. 56 Fed. Rep. 919. Upon appeal that decree was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit. 27 U. S. App. 594. Whereupon the complainants appealed to this court.

Messrs. Ernest Howard Hunter, John W. Hinsdale, and William C. Mayne, for appellants:

The complainant's right to relief is not barred by laches or acquiescence.

Sebig v. Abitol, 4 Maule & S. 463; Massie v. Heiskell, 80 Va. 805; Bryan v. Kales, 134 U. S. 126 (33: 829).

Whether laches is to be imputed to a party seeking the aid of a court of equity depends upon the circumstances of the particular case.

Griswold v. Hazard, 141 U. S. 260 (35: 678).

The question of laches does not depend upon the fact that a certain definite time has elapsed since the cause of action accrued, but upon whether, under all the circumstances of the particular case, the plaintiff is chargeable with a want of due diligence in failing to institute proceedings earlier.

Townsend v. Vanderwerker, 160 U. S. 171 (40: 383).

Length of time alone is not the test of the staleness of a demand, but the question must be determined by the facts and circumstances of each case and according to right and justice.

Marcotte v. Hartman, 46 Minn. 202.

When a party has equitable rights a court will not refuse relief, although the claim has been outstanding for a long time, if the reason for delay is such as not to defeat the party's right to its enforcement upon the ground of laches or acquiescence.

Lunn v. Johnson, 3 Ired. Eq. 70; Mason v. Crosby, 2 Ware (Daveis) 303; Kimball v. Ives, 17 Vt. 430; Bancroft v. Andrews, 6 Cush. 493.

It is a rule founded in justice and reason that equity will not refuse relief where there has been a reasonable excuse for the delay.

Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 285.

The fact that a party has delayed the enforcement of his right for the statutory period is prima facie evidence, but even this is not decisive, as, if there is a sufficient cause for delay, the court will enforce the right.

Preston v. Preston, 95 U. S. 200 (24: 494); Neely's Appeal, 85 Pa. 387; Reed v West, 47 Tex. 240; Rogan v. Walker, 1 Wis. 631; Lawrence v. Rokes, 61 Me. 38; McKnight v. Taylor, 42 U. S. 1 How. 161 (11: 86).

The poverty of the vendor, added to the other circumstances, is also a material ingredient in such a case.

Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 285.

Absence of complainant from the state, and late discovery of the fraud, are excuses for delay.

Hallett v. Collins, 51 U. S. 10 How. 174 (13: 376); Scherer v. Ingerman, 110 Ind. 428; State, Sleeth, v. Gordon, 87 Ind. 171; Earle v. Earle, 91 Ind. 27; Johnston v. Standard Min. Co. 148 U. S. 360 (37: 480).

There can be no laches in failing to assert the rights of which a party is wholly ignorant, and whose existence he had no reason to apprehend.

Halstead v. Grinnan, 152 U. S. 412 (38: 495).

Parties ignorant of their rights cannot be charged with laches.

Hannon v. Hounihan, 85 Va. 429.

Acquiescence imports full knowledge (Life Asso. of Scotland v. Siddal, 3 De G. F. & J. 74); therefore a party will not be held to acquiesce in acts which he did not know he had any right to dispute.

Marquis Cholmondeley v. Lord Clinton, 2 Meriv. 171, 361; Charter v. Trevelyan, 11 Clark & F. 714; Bennett v. Colley, 1 Myl. & K. 225.

Where fraud is relied on in cases of trust, there can be no laches by reason of anything done or neglected, where the party seeking relief has, without any fault of his own, remained in ignorance of his rights.

Rolfe v. Gregory, 13 Week. Rep. 355; Savery v. King, 5 H. L. Cas. 626, 665; Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd, L. R. 5 P. C. 221.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

The circuit court dismissed this bill on the ground of laches, and the circuit court of appeals affirmed its action. There can be no doubt whatever of the correctness of this conclusion. Indeed, a stronger case for the application of the doctrine of laches can scarcely be imagined. The warrant, which was issued in 1848, entitled the widow and minor children of Remsen to a grant of 160 acres of public lands. This warrant was never located by the persons to whom it was issued, who appeared to have lived in Philadelphia, and to have been in straitened circumstances.

The warrant was sold by them in 1848 to Nathan C. D. Taylor, and there is nothing to show that it did not realize for the widow and heirs its market value. Indeed, the court of appeals found that it was sold for its full value and the widow testified that the proceeds were applied to the support of herself and the minor children of the deceased soldier. No fraud in the transaction was alleged or proved. Nothing appears to impeach the validity of the sale except the fact that the widow, who had been appointed guardian of all the minor children, except the eldest, did not procure the consent of the orphans' court in Philadelphia to [240] make the sale, as required by *the statute. This was doubtless a technical defect; but it did not show that the warrant was not actually transferred by the widow, acting for herself and her children (except one who consented in her own behalf), or that they did not receive full consideration for such transfer.

It is true that the locator and his grantees in possession may have been in law chargeable with the knowledge that an order of the orphans' court was never obtained; but in view of the fact that the widow and heirs of Remsen lived in Philadelphia, a thousand miles from St. Paul, it is scarcely a matter of surprise that they did not investigate this subject with that care which they probably would have exercised had that court been more accessible. Particularly is this so, when it is considered that the officers of the land department, subsequently and after a full review of the facts, decided the warrant to have been properly transferred to Taylor, and issued a patent to him.

It was not the foresight of the widow or heirs of Remsen which caused this warrant to be located upon lands so near to the thriving city of St. Paul, but that of Taylor, who appears to have been a resident of Minnesota; and this suit is a manifest attempt of the complainants to take to themselves the benefit of this action, in which they did not participate and of which they were entirely ignorant for over thirty years after the location had been made.

Conceding that the minors were not affected by laches until they became of age, it appears that the youngest of them reached his majority in 1863, at which time the lands were worth about $1,500. Then, if not before, the exercise of diligence became incumbent upon them. It was their duty to have informed themselves and to have acted. It is scarcely possible that they should not have known that their father was a soldier in the Mexican war, and they were chargeable by law with knowledge of the fact that he was entitled to a land warrant. If they did not know this as a matter of fact it was because their mother and elder sister had failed to inform them of it; and it is inequitable to charge upon the defendants the entire consequences of this ignorance.

*Knowledge of the transfer seems to [241] have finally come to them, not through any exertion of their own to inform themselves of the facts, but by an accidental meeting with a lawyer from Minnesota, who had in some way, probably by an examination of the title, become cognizant of the defect in the transfer. It was a mere matter of chance when they would be informed of the defect in the defendants' title, or whether it would ever come to their knowledge at all. To permit them now, after a lapse of forty-four years from the time the warrant was issued, and of thirty years from the time the youngest child became of age, to impeach the transaction, would be an act of the most flagrant injustice to the present holders of the property. This property, which was probably not worth more than one or two hundred dollars at the time of the location of the land warrant, is now estimated to be worth at least a million, and is covered, or partly covered, by houses and business blocks. In the forty-four years that have elapsed since the warrant was issued these lands have been platted and sold in lots to purchasers, who were probably ignorant in fact, if not in law, of any defect in the title, and relied upon the validity of the transfer from the widow and heirs of Remsen, and upon the patent from the United States, which appears to have been regularly issued after an examination of all the facts attending the granting, transfer, and location of the land warrant by the officers of the land department. While the fact that the complainants were ignorant of the defect in the title, and were without means to prosecute an investigation into the facts, may properly be considered by the court, it does not mitigate the hardship to the defendants of unsettling these titles. If the complainants may put forward these excuses for delay after thirty years, there is no reason why they may not allege the same as an excuse after a lapse of sixty. The truth is, there must be some limit of time within which these excuses shall be available, or titles might forever be insecure. The interests of public order and tranquillity demand that parties shall acquaint themselves with their rights within a reasonable time, and although this time may be extended by their actual ignorance, or want of means, it is by no means illimitable.

*If any authority were needed for the [242] action of the courts below in dismissing the bill upon the ground of laches, it would be found in Felix v. Patrick, 145 U. S. 317 [36: 719]. In that case a half-breed woman, belonging to the Sioux nation, received in 1857 a certificate of land scrip, issued under the then existing law, which provided that no "transfer or conveyance of any of said certificates shall be valid." Notwithstanding this provision the woman sold the scrip and executed a blank power of attorney, also a quitclaim deed in blank, in which the name of the attorney, the description of the land, and the name of the grantee were afterwards filled in by the grantee, who had caused the papers to be executed. The grantee thereafter located a tract of land, and subsequently Congress confirmed his title to the same. The half-breed was ignorant of all these facts until 1887. In 1888, she having died in the meantime, her representatives filed a bill in equity against the grantee, charging him with having fraudulently obtained the power of attorney and the quitclaim deed, but failing to state when and how the frauds were discovered. It was held that as the bill did not state the time when the frauds were discovered, so that the court may clearly see whether they could have been discovered before, the bill was fatally defective; and that, under the circumstances, it would be inequitable to disturb the title of the defendants, who held adversely as against the half-breed woman, and not by virtue of the power of attorney or quitclaim deed, which passed no title, or by the confirmatory act of Congress which granted no additional rights.

Upon the facts disclosed in this record, it is entirely clear that the decree of the court below was correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

Argued January 18, 19, 1898. Decided February 21, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa to review a judgment of that court affirming the decree of the District Court of Pottawattamie County, Iowa, quieting the title of Ed. Phelan to certain land as against the other parties to the suit which was commenced by John E. Blackman, plaintiff, against George F. Wright et al., defendants, in which suit said Phelan filed a petition of intervention, making plaintiffs in error and others defendants, praying a decree quieting his title as against all. There was also a motion to dismiss or affirm. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

The facts in this case are as follows: On June 25, 1889, plaintiff in error, Daniel Dull, being the owner of the tract of land in controversy, conveyed the same by warranty deed executed by himself and wife to John E. Blackman. Blackman, on August 2, 1889, made a deed of the same land to George F. Wright as security for moneys to be advanced by Wright. On the 29th of February, 1892, Blackman commenced this suit in the district court of Pottawattamie county, Iowa, to compel a reconveyance by Wright on the ground of his failure to advance any money. Prior thereto, and on January 30, 1892, Blackman had executed a deed of the land to Edward Phelan, which conveyance was at first conditional but, by agreement signed by the parties on September 15, 1892, was made absolute. On the 17th of September, 1892, Phelan filed his petition of intervention, setting forth his rights in the matter under the deed of January 30 and the agreement of September 15, and also making plaintiffs in error and others defendants, alleging that they claimed certain interests in the property, and praying a decree quieting his title as against all. On January 24, 1893, plaintiff's counsel withdrew his appearance for Blackman, and, upon his application, was allowed to prosecute the action in the name of Blackman for and in behalf of Phelan, the intervenor. On February 2, 1893, the plaintiffs in error appeared in the suit and filed an answer denying all the allegations in plaintiff's petition and in the petition of intervention. On the 15th of that month they filed an amended answer and a cross petition, in which they set up that Blackman had obtained his deed from them by certain false representations, and that a suit *was pending in the supreme[245 court of the state of New York, in which Daniel Dull was plaintiff, and Blackman, Wright, Phelan and others were defendants, in which the same issues were made and the same relief sought as in the case at bar. On May 29 they filed an amendment to their answer and cross petition setting forth that the case pending in the supreme court of New York had gone to decree, and attached a copy of that decree. The suit in the supreme court of the state of New York was commenced on the 3d of November, 1892 Blackman was served personally within the limits of that state, but the other defendants therein, Wright, Phelan, and Duffie their counsel, were served only by delivering to them in Omaha, Nebraska, a copy of the complaint and summons. No appearance was made by them. Notwithstanding which the decree was entered against them as against Blackman, and was a decree establishing the title of Daniel Dull, setting aside the deed made by him and his wife to Blackman, and enjoining the several defendants from further proseeuting the aetion in the Iowa court. After eertain other pleadings and amendments thereto had been made the case in the distriet court of Pottawattamie county, Iowa, eame on for hearing, and upon the testimony that court entered a deeree quieting Phelan's title to the land as against any and all other parties to the suit, subjeet, however, to eertain mortgage interests whieh were reeognized and proteeted, but which are not in any way pertinent to this eontroversy between Dull and wife and the defendants in error. On appeal to the supreme eourt of the state such deeree was, on January 21, 1896, affirmed, from whieh judgment of affirmanee plaintiffs in error have brought the case here.

Messrs. Isaac N. Flickinger, Alfred G. Safford, and Omri F. Hibbard for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Winfield S. Strawn for defendants in error.

Mr. Justiee Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

246] *The contention of the plaintiffs in error—and in it is the only question of a Federal nature presented by the record—is that the courts in Iowa did not give that full faith and credit to the deeree rendered in the supreme court of the state of New York to which under the Constitution of the United States it was entitled. From the foregoing statement of facts it appears clearly that although the suit in the Iowa eourt was originally eommenced by Blackman, and though his name was, under the practice prevailing in Iowa, never dropped from the title of the ease, it was, by reason of the intervention of Phelan and the orders of the eourt, simply proseeuted in his name for the benefit of Phelan, the intervener; that this intervention of Phelan, and his petition in support thereof, making the plaintiffs in error and others defendants thereto, was filed on the 17th of September, 1892, nearly two months before the commencement of the suit in New York. It also appears that while Blackman, Phelan, Wright, and others were named as parties defendant to the suit in New York, Blackman was the only one served within the territorial jurisdiction, and the only one appearing in that court. The other defendants were attempted to be brought in by service of summons in the state of Nebraska, and never entered any appearance in the suit. It is true the decree in the supreme eourt of the state of New York was entered before the trial of this ease in the distriet eourt of Iowa, and the record of the proeeedings in the New York court was in evidencc at the trial in the Iowa court. It further appears from the findings of fact made by the trial court in Iowa, and sustained by the supreme court of that state, that the entire right and title had passed from Blaek man to Phelan in September, 1892, nearly two months beforc the commencement of the suit in New York.

Upon these facts we remark that as the land, the subject-matter of this controversy, was situate in Iowa, litigation in respect to its title belonged properly to the courts within that state (Ellenwood v. Marietta Chair Co. 158 U. S. 105, 107 [39: 913, 914]), although if all the parties interested in the land were brought personally before a court of another state, its decree would be *conclusive upon them and [247 thus in effect determine the title. The suit in New York was one purely in personam. Any decree therein bound simply the parties before the court and their privies, and did not operate directly upon the lands. As said by this court in Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 105 [35: 640, 647]:

"The real estate was situated in Tennessee and governed by the law of its situs, and while by means of its power over the person of a party a court of equity may in a proper ease eompel him to aet in relation to property not within its jurisdiction, its deeree does not operate directly upon the property nor affect the title, but is made effectual through the coercion of the defendant, as, for instanee, by direeting a deed to be executed or eanceled by or on behalf of the party. The court 'has no inherent power, by the mere force of its decree, to annul a deed, or to establish a title.'"

In that suit the only party defendant subject to the jurisdiction of the court was Blackman. The other parties were not served with process within the limits of the state of New York, and never entered any appearanee in the case. The service attempted to be made by delivering a eopy of the summons to them in the state of Nebraska was ineffeetual to bring them within the jurisdiction of that court.

"Where the entire objeet of the aetion is to determine the personal rights and obligations of the defendants, that is, where the suit is merely in personam, eonstruetive serviee in this form upon a nonresident is ineffectual for any purpose. Process from the tribunals of one state cannot run into another state, and summon parties there domiciled to leave its territory and respond to proceedings against them. Publieation of proeess or notiee within the state where the tribunal sits cannot ereate any greater obligation upon the nonresident to appear. Process sent to him out of the state, and process published within it, are equally unavailing in proceedings to establish his personal liability." Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 727 [24: 565, 571].

"Such a decree, being in personam merely, ean only be supported against a person who is not a eitizen or resident of the *state in [248 which it is rendered, by aetual serviee upon him within its jurisdiction." Hart v. Sansom, 110 U. S. 151, 155 [28: 101, 103].

We remark again that while a judgment or decree binds, not merely the party or parties subject to the jurisdiction of the court, but also those in privity with them, yet that rule does not avail the plaintiffs in error, for Phelan aequired his rights prior to the institution of the suit in New York, and was therefore not privy to that judgment.

"It is well understood, though not usually stated in express terms in works upon the subjeet, that no one is privy to a judgment whose sueeession to the rights of property thereby affeeted occurred previously to the institution of the suit. A tenant in possession prior to the commencement of an action of ejectment cannot, therefore, be lawfully dispossessed by the judgment, unless made a party to the suit. . . . No grantee can be bound by any judgment in an action commenced against his grantor subsequent to the grant, otherwise a man having no interest in property could defeat the estate of the true owner. . . . The foreclosure of a mortgage, or of any other lien, is wholly inoperative upon the rights of any person not a party to the suit, whether such person is a grantee, judgment creditor, attachment creditor, or other lienholder. Freem. Judgm. 1st ed. § 162.

As Phelan was not brought within the jurisdiction of the New York court, and as the suit in that court was instituted nearly two months after he had acquired full title to the real estate, the decree of that court did not bind him as a party, nor bind him as in privity with Blackman, his grantor. The supreme court of Iowa did not err in so holding.

The decree is affirmed.

COMMISSIONERS OF THE SINKING FUND OF THE CITY OF LOUISVILLE and the City of Louisville.

Claim against government—power of treasury officers—act of February 25, 1893.

1. After the audit of the claim of the city of Louisville against the government under the act of 1890 and the appropriation to pay it by the act of 1891, the officers of the treasury had no power to re examine the correctness of such claim as audited, on the ground that a mistake therein had been made.

2. The subsequent act of February 25, 1893, gave no jurisdiction to interfere with or to review the action of the treasury officials under the act of 1890 or the action of Congress in enacting the act of 1891.

3. The act of 1891 was in the nature of a judgment, final in its character and subject to no appeal; and the duties of the officers of the government were limited to making payment as directed by the act; and Congress, when subsequently providing for the payment of other similar claims, did not intend to open the transactions which had been closed by payment under the act of 1891.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of the city of Louisville for the recovery of moneys due said city from the government on account of taxes improperly collected. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the court of claims in favor of the city of Louisville, based upon a petition filed in that court for the recovery of seventeen thousand and some odd dollars, alleged to be due the city from the government on account of taxes improperly collected.

It appears that between the years 1862 and 1872 the city of Louisville, Kentucky, owned a large amount of bonds and stock of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, upon which the company paid interest and declared cash dividends, retaining, however, during most of the time an undistributed surplus. Under the internal revenue law (§ 122, act of June 30, 1864), in force during this period, the company paid taxes to the United States upon its gross receipts, its undistributed surplus, the interest payable on its bonds, and its cash dividends. The taxes paid on interest and dividends were deducted from the amounts due as interest and dividends, so that the revenues of the city of Louisville accruing from these sources were diminished to the extent of such deductions; *but these[250 deductions were not known to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund of the city until the time had expired for an application to the government to be repaid the taxes so deducted.

In 1872, in the case of United States v. Baltimore & O. Railroad Company, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 322 [21:597], this court decided that a tax under the above-named § 122 of the internal revenue act, upon the interest on bonds issued by a railroad company, was a tax upon the creditor and not upon the corporation paying it, and that a municipal corporation, being a portion of the sovereign power of a state, was not subject to taxation by Congress upon its municipal revenues.

The time for making application for repayment of the taxes thus illegally obtained having passed (U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 3220, 3228), resort was had to Congress, which enacted the statute approved June 16, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 157, chap. 424). The statute authorized and required the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue "to audit and adjust the claim of the board of sinking fund commissioners of the city of Louisville, Kentucky, for internal revenue taxes on dividends on shares of stock owned by said board for said city of Louisville in the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, to the extent that such taxes were deducted from any dividends due and payable to said board, and to pass upon said claim and render judgment thereon in the same manner and with the same effect as if said claim had been presented and prosecuted within the time limited and fixed by law."

Pursuant to the provisions of this act, the city of Louisville presented to the proper officers of the Treasury Department its claims to recover taxes to the amount of $65,578.32, of which the officers allowed $42,514.03, the latter sum being made up, as stated, of two items, one of $24,801.14, taxes which had been deducted from cash dividends, and $17,712.89, taxes which had been deducted from surplus profits which, on the 17th of November, 1867, had been set apart by resolution of the board of directors of the railroad company as the basis of a stock dividend, which was directed to be distributed in February, 1868. The amount 251] of $42,514.03, having been *audited and allowed, was reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress for its action, there being no appropriation from which the money awarded the city could be paid.

Under the act of March 3, 1891, being an appropriation to supply deficiencies (26 Stat. at L. 862 ,at 867, chap. 540), Congress provided as follows: "Payment to city of Louisville, Kentucky: For payment to the city of Louisville, Kentucky, the amount found due, under the act of Congress approved June 16, 1890, and reported to Congress in House Executive Document No. 260, of the present session, $42,514.03." The amount thus appropriated was duly paid to the city, as directed by Congress.

Subsequently another application was made to Congress, and that body passed the act approved February 25, 1893 (27 Stat. at L. 477, chap. 165), a copy of which is set forth in the margin.†

Under this act the city of Louisville applied to the proper officers of the government for a further refund of $34 667.80 on account of taxes claimed to have been illegally exacted. One item in this last-named claim, amounting 252] to $3,008.40, the *appellants insist was for taxes collected by the government from the railroad company upon its undistributed surplus in 1868 and 1871, and that this item had been included in the claim presented in 1890, but had not been allowed because, as stated in the determination made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the act of June 16, 1890, under which the application for refunding was made, limited an adjustment of the claim "to the extent that such taxes were deducted from any dividends due and payable," and did not direct the adjustment of the claim to the extent that taxes were deducted from interest or gross receipts.

The Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue audited and adjusted the claim made under the act of 1893, at its full amount, and as incidental to such audit and adjustment he assumed to re-examine the claim allowed in 1891. The result of such re-examination of the latter claim was a reduction to the extent of $3,548.89, which sum was deducted from the amount allowed under the act of 1893, reducing it to the sum of $31,359.02. When the claim reached the first controller a further sum of $17,633.85 was deducted by him, which consisted principally of the amount allowed and paid in 1891 for taxes on surplus, which left a balance payable to the city of $13,725.17, for which sum the controller directed a draft to be issued. To recover the amount thus deducted from the claim as audited and allowed under the act of 1893, the city of Louisville commenced this proceeding in the court of claims, which rendered judgment in its favor for the amount demanded. The government has brought the case here for review.

Messrs. Charles C. Binney and L. A. Pradt, Assistant Attorney General, for appellant.

Messrs. Alphonso Hart and Fontaine T. Fox for appellees.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

The claim here made is that the officers of the government committed an error in auditing and allowing the amount paid in 1891 for taxes on surplus, as those taxes, it is said, were not referred to the act of 1890 and should not have been reported to Congress or ordered paid by it, and that the power to review this action (if not previously existing) was created by the act of 1893, above set forth.

We think the judgment of the court of claims is right. By the payment under the act of 1891 the questions involved were ended. It was not only an auditing and allowance by the proper officers of the Treasury of a claim over which they had jurisdiction, but the amount was paid under the direct commandment of an act of Congress specifically appropriating the particular sum reported to it as due to the city of Louisville and for the payment of which the authority of Congress was needed.

Laying for a moment the act of 1893 out of view, it seems clear to us that there was no power on the part of the officers of the Treasury to re-examine the correctness of the claim paid by virtue of the act of 1891, or to reverse that action on the ground that a mistake of law had been made in the decision reported to Congress upon which it passed the act last named. The officers who acted under the statute of 1890 (the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue) performed their duties in examining, auditing, and allowing the claim as they thought the facts and the law required. It was not the case of an allowance of an ordinary claim against the government by an ordinary accounting officer, any more than was the case of United States v. Kaufman, 96 U. S. 567–570 [24: 792, 793], or that of United States v. Savings Bank [United States v. Real Estate Sav. Bank], 104 U. S. 728 [26: 908]. When the decision of these officials was by the Secretary of the Treasury reported to Congress and 254] an appropriation made *by that body in 1891 of the specific sum mentioned in the report, with directions to pay the amount thus appropriated to the city of Louisville, the time for examination had passed, and it was the duty of the proper officers of the government to pay the money as directed by the statute.

†"Chap. 165. An Act for the Benefit of the State of Kentucky, Logan and Simpson Counties, and of Louisville, Kentucky, and of Sumner and Davidson Counties, Tennessee.

"Approved, February 25, 1893."

We also think the subsequent statute of 1893 gave no right to the Treasury officers to interfere with or in any manner to review the action of the government under the statutes of 1890 and 1891. It may be true that a small portion of the claim made by the city under the act of 1893 had theretofore been made under the act of 1890, but that portion had then been rejected and, of course, never audited, allowed, or paid. Because a small sum which had once been rejected was included in the principal claim made by the city in 1893, no sort of foundation was thereby laid for the assertion of a right on the part of the government to review and, in substance, reverse the prior action of the Treasury Department in allowing a claim which had been thereafter affirmed by Congress with a substantial direction to pay the amount thereof, and which had been paid accordingly.

The authority given by the act of 1893 required the officers therein named to audit and adjust the claims of the city of Louisville for internal revenue taxes to the extent that such taxes were deducted from any dividends or interest due and payable to the city and which had not been theretofore refunded, and for this purpose the statute of limitations was repealed and certain sections of the Revised Statutes were made applicable, and the amounts, when ascertained and not theretofore refunded, were directed to be paid out of the permanent annual appropriation provided for similar claims allowed within the present fiscal year (1893). We think this provision gave no jurisdiction to interfere with or to review the action of the Treasury officials under the act of 1890, or the action of Congress in enacting the statute of 1891.

The act of 1891 was in the nature of a judgment, final in its character, and subject to no appeal, and the duties of the officers of the government thereafter charged with the payment of the moneys appropriated by that act were 255] not discretionary, *and were limited to the clerical functions of making payment, as directed by the act. United States v. Jordan, 113 U. S. 418 [28: 1013]. It cannot be possible that Congress had the least intention, when making provision for the payment of other and further claims of the same character, to in any wise open the transactions which had been closed by the payment of the moneys directed by the act of 1891. We have no doubt whatever that if Congress had any such intention it would have made it clear by the use of far different language from that which is contained in the act of 1893. It would have said, in so many words, that, in proceeding under the statute of 1893, the officers named therein should examine into the correctness of the decisions arrived at in 1890 and 1891.

The judgment of the Court of Claims was right, and it should therefore be affirmed.

COMMISSIONERS OF THE SINKING FUND OF LOGAN COUNTY and the County of Logan, Kentucky, Appts.,

v.

UNITED STATES.

Tax on railroad company's surplus.

Payment by a railroad company of an internal revenue tax on its undistributed surplus under the act of 1864 is a payment of a tax upon its own property, and is not the payment of a tax upon a stock dividend thereafter declared by the railroad company.

Argued January 5, 6, 1898. Decided February 21, 1898.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims dismissing the petition of the County of Logan et al., claimants, to recover taxes heretofore paid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles C. Binney and L. A. Pradt, Assistant Attorney General, for appellants.

Messrs. Alphonso Hart and Fontaine T. Fox for appellee.

*Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the[256 opinion of the court:

This application was made to recover taxes heretofore paid, and, like the one in the preceding case, it is based upon the statement that the tax could not be imposed as against the county of Logan, because it was a municipal corporation, and not subject to taxation by Congress upon its municipal revenues. United States v. Baltimore & O. Railroad Company, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 322 [21: 597]. Therefore, if it appear that the railroad company has deducted from the dividend due the county the amount of any tax paid to the government on a stock dividend issued by the company, the appellants are entitled to recover. The facts are quite simple.

On the 14th of March, 1894, the appellants filed their petition in the court of claims for the refunding of taxes which they claimed to be entitled to under the act of February 25, 1893 (27 Stat. at L. 477, chap. 165). The act is set out in full in the margin in the preceding case of United States v. City of Louisville, 169 U. S. 249 [ante, 735]. The claim made herein was for internal revenue taxes alleged to have been illegally assessed, and amounting to the sum of $17,606.14. Under the provisions of the statute above cited the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, audited and adjusted the claim at the sum of $15,397.75, and in due course of procedure it came to the Controller of the Treasury, who directed a warrant to issue for the sum of $9,533.54 (the total amount withheld from the county on account of taxes on cash dividends), and he refused to include in the warrant the sum of $5,864.21, being the balance of the $15,397.75 which had been audited and adjusted as above mentioned, because, as the Controller held, the claim for taxes paid on account of stock dividends was illegal and unauthorized, and this suit is brought to recover the sum which was rejected by the Controller, and which he refused to pay. The court of claims gave judgment in favor of the government and dismissed the petition of claimants, who have appealed to this court from the judgment of dismissal.

The point first made by the counsel for the 257] claimants is *that the audit and adjustment made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of Congress of 25th of February, 1893, was an award having all the force of a judgment which could not be questioned either by the Controller of the Treasury or by the courts, except for fraud or mistake. The cases of United States v. Kaufman, 96 U. S. 567 [24:792], and United States v. Savings Bank [United States v. Real Estate Sav. Bank], 104 U. S. 728 [26:908], are cited for the purpose of showing the conclusiveness of the action of the officers above named.

All that those cases hold is, that where in a case somewhat similar to this the claim had been allowed by the officers named in the statute, "the allowance may be used as the basis of an action against the United States in the court of claims, where it will be prima facie evidence of the amount that is due, and put on the government the burden of showing fraud or mistake. This burden is not overcome by proving that some other officer in the subsequent progress of the claim through the department declined to do what the law or treasury regulations required of him before payment could be obtained. The fact of fraud or mistake must be established by competent evidence the same as any other fact in issue. An allowance by the commissioner in this class of cases is not the simple passing of an ordinary claim by an ordinary accounting officer, but a statement of accounts by one having authority for that purpose under an act of Congress." United States v. Savings Bank [United States v. Real Estate Sav. Bank], 104 U. S. 728, at 733 [26: 908, at 909]. The question of the conclusiveness of the action of the officers of the government under their general powers is also referred to in Wisconsin C. R. R. v. United States, 164 U. S. 190 [41:399], and it is there held that the government is not bound by the act of its officers in making an authorized payment under misconstruction of the law. However, the act of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury in approving the claim may be assumed to be prima facie evidence that the amount so approved by them was due the claimant from the government, and the burden therefore rested upon the government of showing that the allowance of *the amount [258 claimed in this proceeding was made through a mistake on the part of those officials. Unless this mistake is made apparent by the findings of the court below, its judgment in refusing to give effect to the allowance of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, might have to be reversed. If, however, the findings show that those officials did make a mistake in allowing that portion of the claim made which is now in suit, the judgment of the court below, so far as this point is concerned, must be affirmed.

The defense made by the government upon the merits is based on the provisions of the statute of 1893, and upon the allegations that the findings of the court below substantially show there were no taxes paid upon any stock dividends declared in 1867 or 1868. It is added that the claim on the part of the county of Logan was not in reality for any taxes actually paid on "dividends in scrip" or "stock dividends" issued to appellants, but that it was for a certain proportion of the taxes paid by the railroad company on that part of its profits which were not distributed in dividends, and which in fact constituted what the internal revenue acts of 1864 and 1866 called "profits carried to the account of any fund or used for construction," and which funds were taxable under those acts as the property of the corporation.

Counsel insists that a tax upon undistributed profits in the treasury or belonging to the corporation is like a tax on gross earnings, a tax on the corporation on account of its own property, and not to be thereafter recovered by this claimant, either under the act of 1893 or under those sections of the United States Revised Statutes therein alluded to.

It must be remembered that the court of claims under the act of 1893 was simply given jurisdiction to examine a claim which was otherwise barred by the statute of limitations. The act gave no other right and created no claim against the government not otherwise existing. The right of recovery for an illegal tax had been provided for by the Revised Statutes of the United States, § 3220, and that remedy could have been pursued for two years after the payment of *any such tax. [259 U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3228. In this case the time thus limited had expired, and the act of 1893 was passed for the purpose of setting aside the bar of the then existing statute. The right to demand the refunding of the money in dispute must depend, therefore, upon the question whether any tax on a stock dividend had been collected from the company by the government, and a proportionate amount thereof deducted by the company from the dividend otherwise due the county. No deduction of any tax from the scrip dividend due to the claimant was ever made in terms. It is sought to be inferred from the fact that a prior payment of a tax by the company on its undistributed surplus had thereby diminished that fund by the amount of the tax, and that a stock dividend must be assumed to represent profits not distributed in cash dividends, and that the claimant would have received more stock if the profits had not been diminished by the payment of the tax from which it is said a municipal corporation was exempt under the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Baltimore & O. Railroad, above cited. Of course, the payment of the tax diminished the profits of the company by just that amount. But, at the time when it was paid, the full amount thereof was due the government from the company itself, and not one penny could properly have been deducted from the amount of the tax by reason of the fact that a municipal corporation owned a certain amount of the stock of the company. All taxes which were levied on the property of the company were payable in their full amount by the company, and not a dollar could be legally deducted from such tax on account of the character of any owners of its stock. Consequently, when a stock dividend is declared, the fact that the directors might have chosen to declare a larger one, if it had not been for the payment of the taxes the company had made on its own property, is entirely immaterial. So is the fact, if it be a fact, that the total stock dividend was reduced by the amount which the company had theretofore paid as a tax upon its undistributed surplus.

There is no finding of the court below which in terms shows that the tax in question here 260] was ever paid on a "stock" or *"scrip" dividend. All that appears is that a stock dividend of 40 per cent on its capital was declared by the railroad company by a resolution adopted on the 16th of November, 1867, which provided that the stock should be issued on February 10, 1868.

The court below did find that prior to the passage of the act of February 25, 1893, certain proceedings had theretofore taken place in the Treasury Department relative to the same taxes paid by the same railroad company. (The court in this finding referred to the proceedings in regard to the claim made by the city of Louisville for a return of taxes, under the circumstances detailed in that case (just decided, 169 U. S. 249 [ante, 735]) and which are therein set forth.)

The court then set forth in this case the finding made in the Louisville Case, and in that case, after speaking of the fact that cash dividends had been declared upon the stock of the railroad company, and that there existed a large amount of undistributed surplus in the treasury of the railroad company, the finding continued: "These cash dividends and the undistributed surplus which was converted into stock or scrip dividends were held by the officers of the government to be subject to taxation, and taxes were assessed and collected according to the terms of the statute in force at the time of the respective collections."

Taking all the facts as found by the court below, it appears that the only tax paid was paid on the undistributed surplus of the company while it remained such surplus in its hands and while it was a portion of its own property, as much so as anything else owned by it, and that thereafter the company declared a stock dividend of 40 per cent upon its old capital.

By the provisions of the internal revenue act of 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 223, chap. 173, § 122), a stock dividend was subject to a tax of 5 per cent. So far as material the section provides: "That any railroad . . . that may have declared any dividend in scrip, or money due or payable to its stockholders, as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company, and all profits of such company carried to the account of any fund, or used *for construction, shall be subject to and[261 pay a duty of five per centum on the amount of all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, whenever the same shall be payable; and said companies are hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from all payments, on account of any interest, or coupons and dividends due and payable as aforesaid, the duty of five per centum," etc.

Under this plain provision of the statute it is perfectly clear that the stock dividend in question was a proper subject of taxation. But, as already mentioned, there is no finding that any such tax has been paid, and, of course, none that any deduction on its account was ever made from any dividend due the county. On the contrary, from the findings that have been made, it appears that the only tax which has been paid was paid by the railroad company upon its undistributed surplus at a time when such fund was its own absolute property. That fact, taken in connection with the declaration of the dividend of 40 per cent upon the amount of the capital of the railroad company, does not show a payment of the tax on the stock dividend declared under the resolution mentioned.

It is plain that this surplus fund, which, at the time it was taxed, belonged to the company, was not distributed to the stockholders, nor was it converted into stock by reason of the stock dividend. If it had been a cash dividend sufficiently large in amount to cover the surplus, then the payment of the dividend would have effected the distribution of the fund. But no distribution could take place by any stock dividend. Such a dividend distributed nothing but stock, which made the stockholder neither richer nor poorer than he was before it was issued.

Although the court finds that the undistributed surplus of the railroad company was held by the officers of the government to be subject to taxation, all taxes were assessed and collected according to the terms of the statute in force in the time of the respective collections, yet such fact does not advance us a step in the direction of showing that any duties were paid on the stock dividend. The tax or duties had been *paid by the company on[262 a fund which then belonged to it. Unless payment of the tax on this undistributed surplus was in substance a payment of the 5 per cent tax on the stock dividend, then there is no finding that any such payment was ever made. That payment cannot be so regarded because the tax on the undistributed surplus was a tax upon the property of the company, and was paid as such by the company, and if the amount thereof were deducted by the company from the subsequent stock dividend, that would be an act of the company, and would not render the prior payment of the tax on the undistributed surplus improper even with regard to Logan county. Otherwise all payments of taxes made by a company upon its own property would be subject to a deduction proportioned to the amount of its stock held by states or other corporations of a municipal character. The adoption of a resolution for a stock dividend, together with the issue of the stock, could have absolutely no effect upon the undistributed surplus fund, so far as any distribution thereof was concerned. The shareholder got no more interest in or right to that fund than he had before, and the prior payment of the tax upon it did not thereby decrease the amount of the 40 per cent dividend upon the old capital by a penny. And yet it is only upon the payment of the tax which the company made on its property, in the shape of its undistributed surplus, that the claimants can by this record found their claim to recover their proportion of such tax. If allowed, then the claimant could, upon the same reasoning, recover its proportion of every tax paid by the company upon any other of its property, unless the statute of limitations applied. If the company in fact reduced its stock dividend by the amount of the tax which it had previously paid on the surplus fund belonging to it, such fact gives no support to the claim of the county to recover from the government an amount of a perfectly legal tax. And as before stated, the proof really is that there was no other payment of a tax than one upon the surplus as the property of the company.

An effort is made to show that this payment of a duty or tax on the undistributed fund 263] might be treated as a payment *of such duty or tax on the stock dividend, under the proviso contained in § 121 of the statute of 1864, which reads: "Provided, That when any dividend is made which includes any part of the surplus or contingent fund of any . . . railroad company, which has been assessed and the duty paid thereon, the amount of duty so paid on that portion of the surplus or contingent fund may be deducted from the duty on such dividend."

It is perfectly apparent that this proviso includes only cash dividends. It is a dividend which is to include for distribution any part of the surplus or contingent fund of a railroad or other company. How can a stock dividend distribute a fund? As already remarked, a stock dividend distributes nothing but stock. Hence, there is no sense in applying the statute to a case where no distribution of a fund is made and where the fact of a double payment on the fund cannot arise. The proviso clearly refers to a case where a surplus has already paid duty and where subsequently to that time it is distributed to the shareholders. Under such circumstances that portion of the dividend which has thus once paid its duty of 5 per cent is not to be taxed again when distributed to the shareholders. But so long as there is no distribution, the tax paid on the surplus as surplus and which belonged to the corporation when the tax was paid, is not to be credited on or deducted from a subsequent tax upon a stock dividend which does not distribute the surplus nor in any manner change its ownership.

We agree, therefore, with the opinion of the court below, and we hold that where a railroad company pays a tax on its undistributed surplus under the act of 1864, it is thereby paying a tax upon its own property, and that such payment cannot be regarded as a payment of the tax upon a stock dividend thereafter declared by the railroad company.

The judgment of the Court of Claims should therefore be affirmed.

Act of Congress supersedes treaty—law of Oklahoma taxing cattle—not a burden on interstate commerce—not taxation without representation—does not violate uniformity—law-making power.

1. An act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty, and the act of May 2, 1890, creating the territory of Oklahoma, which included the Osage and Kansas Indian lands within the limits of that territory, must prevail against the provisions of the treaty excepting such lands from inclusion within any territory or state.
2. The territorial law of Oklahoma of March 5, 1885, making cattle subject to taxation which are kept or grazed on the Indian reservations in said territory, is not a violation of the rights of the Indians; such taxation is not upon the lands or privileges of the Indians.
3. Such tax law of said territory is not in conflict with the power of Congress to regulate commerce, as such a tax is too remote and indirect to be a tax or burden on interstate commerce, or an interference with the power of Congress.
4. Such taxation is not taxation without representation, or invalid as to nonresident owners of cattle as being without benefit to them, where the unorganized district or reservation has been attached to an organized county.
5. Said territorial law is not invalid because the taxes in question are levied on personal prop-

Argued and Submitted October 21, 22, 1897. Decided February 21, 1898.

APPEALS from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Oklahoma affirming the judgment of the District Court of Kay County, in said Territory, holding that all of the levies made for territorial purposes and the county levy for court expenses were valid, and dissolving the injunction as to those levies and as to all of the other county levies making the injunctions perpetual, in actions brought by Gay and Reed et al., plaintiffs, against A. M. Thomas et al., commissioners of Kay County, to obtain injunctions restraining the defendants from collecting certain taxes. Said actions were consolidated into one. Reversed, and cause remanded with directions to proceed in conformity with the opinion.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

These are cross-appeals from the supreme court of the territory of Oklahoma. The facts, as stated in the opinion of the court below, were as follows:

The appellants are nonresidents of the territory of Oklahoma and owners of large herds of cattle that were kept and grazed, during a portion of the year 1895, in parts of the Osage Indian reservation in this territory.

The appellees are the board of county commissioners, treasurer, and sheriff of Kay county, Oklahoma territory.

On the 3d Monday in February, 1894, the supreme court of the territory of Oklahoma, by an order entered on the journals of said court, attached to said county of Kay, for judicial purposes, all the Kaw or Kansas Indian reservation and all of the Osage Indian reservation north of the township line dividing townships 25 and 26 north. All of said reservations so attached to said Kay county for judicial purposes 265] by such *order are without the boundaries of said Kay county as established by the governor, and are not within the boundaries of any organized county of this territory. Said territory so attached to said county of Kay for judicial purposes is comprised wholly of lands owned and occupied by Indian tribes, and consists principally of wild, unimproved, and unallotted lands used for grazing purposes; that plaintiffs in error during the year 1895 and during the month of April of said year drove, transported, and shipped to the ranges and pastures in that part of said Osage Indian reservation attached to said Kay county for judicial purposes, as aforesaid, large herds and numbers of cattle, which were taken to said reservation in pursuance and by virtue and authority of certain leases to plaintiffs in error for grazing purposes made by the Osage tribal government under the supervision of the agent in charge of said tribe and upon the ratification and approval of the commissioner of Indian affairs and of the Secretary of the Interior, and said cattle of said plaintiffs in error were on the 1st day of May kept and grazed on that part of said Indian reservation attached to said Kay county for judicial purposes, as aforesaid.

By an act approved March 5, 1895, the legislative assembly of the territory of Oklahoma amended § 13, art. 2, chap. 70, of the Oklahoma Statutes relating to revenue, so that the same reads as follows: "That when any cattle are kept or grazed or any other personal property is situated in an unorganized country, district, or reservation of this territory, such property shall be subject to taxation in the organized county to which said country, district, or reservation is attached for judicial purposes," and authorized the board of county commissioners of the organized county or counties to which such unorganized country, district, or reservation is attached to appoint a special assessor each year, whose duty it should be to assess such property, and conferred upon such special assessor all the powers and required him to perform all the duties of a township assessor. The assessor so provided for was required to begin and perform his duties between the 1st day of April and the 25th day of May of each year and *to complete his duties and[266 return his tax lists on or before June 1, and the property therein authorized to be assessed, it was provided, should be valued as of May 1, each year.

In pursuance of the provisions of said act the county commissioners of said Kay county did duly appoint a special assessor for the year 1895 to assess such cattle as were kept and grazed and any other personal property situated in the unorganized country and parts of Indian reservations attached to said Kay county for judicial purposes, and said special assessor did, by virtue of said appointment, assess all the personal property in the territory so attached to the county of Kay for judicial purposes, including all of the cattle of the said appellants kept and grazed in said reservation on the 1st day of May, 1895. The said special assessor assessed the property of these appellants so located on said territory attached to said county of Kay for judicial purposes, as aforesaid, and returned the same upon an assessment roll at the total valuation of $760,469; that thereafter the said sum was, by the clerk of said county, carried into the aggregate assessment for said county, and by him certified to the auditor of the territory; that the territorial board of equalization in acting upon the various assessment of the various counties as certified to said board raised the aggregate valuation of the property returned for taxation upon the tax rolls of said county of Kay 35 per cent, and the county clerk for said county carried out the raised valuation so certified to him by said territorial board of equalization against the property of these appellants and made the aggregate valuation of such property $1,026,634. Thereafter the territorial board of equalization levied and duly certified to the county clerk of the county of Kay tax levies for territorial purposes for the year 1895 as follows: General revenue, three mills on the dollar; university fund, one half mill on the dollar; normal-school fund, one half mill on the dollar; bond-interest fund, one half mill on the dollar; board of education fund, one half mill on the dollar.

That the board of county commissioners for the county of Kay made the following levies for 267]the year 1895: for salaries, five *mills on the dollar; for contingent expenses, three mills on the dollar; for sinking fund, one and one half mills on the dollar, for court expenses, two and one half mills on the dollar; for county supplies, three mills on the dollar; for road and bridge fund, two mills on the dollar; for poor fund of said county, one mill on the dollar; for county school fund of said county, one mill on the dollar.

The county clerk of said county of Kay carried the valuation of the property of these plaintiffs in error upon the tax rolls of said county, and against the same extended the levies as aforesaid, and charged against the property of these plaintiffs in error in the aggregate the sum of $26,174.16.

Before these taxes became delinquent, plaintiffs in error began to remove or attempted to remove their respective property from the territory attached to Kay county for judicial purposes and beyond the limits of Oklahoma territory. The treasurer of said Kay county issued tax warrants for the several amounts of taxes levied against the property of each of said plaintiffs in error, and delivered the same to the sheriff of said county for execution; said sheriff seized certain property of each of appellants by virtue of such tax warrants. The appellants filed their several petitions in the district court of Kay county, and, on application, obtained injunctions restraining the appellees from making any further attempt to collect such taxes. Afterwards, on motion, the several actions were consolidated into one. To the petition filed in such consolidated action the defendants in error filed a general demurrer. At the hearing, the district court sustained the demurrer in part and overruled it in part, holding that all of the levies made for territorial purposes and the county levy for court expenses were valid, and as to those levies the injunction was dissolved, and as to all of the other county levies such injunctions were made perpetual. From that part of the order and judgment of the court dissolving the injunction as to the territorial taxes and the one county fund levy plaintiffs appealed. From that part perpetuating the injunction as to all of the county levies, except that for court expenses, the defendants appealed and filed their 268]cross petitions in *error, and the case was taken to the supreme court of the territory. In that court the judgment of the district court was affirmed. Three of the four judges, who sat in the case, agreed in holding that the taxes levied for territorial and court-expense funds were valid; two were of opinion that the balance of the taxes were unauthorized; one was of opinion that all the taxes were validly levied, and the fourth judge dissented in toto. From that judgment of the supreme court of the territory both parties appealed to this court.

Mr. J. F. King for Thomas et al., Board of Commissioners, et al.

Messrs. Henry E. Asp and John W. Shartel for Gay and Reed et al.

Mr. Harper S. Cunningham, Attorney General of the Territory of Oklahoma, filed (by leave) a brief on behalf of the said Territory.

Messrs. Jeremiah M. Wilson and O. F. Goddard filed a brief for certain owners of cattle.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

It is claimed that the legislative assembly of the territory of Oklahoma was without power to enact the law of March 5, 1895, providing for the taxing of cattle grazing upon the Indian reservations under leases granted by the Indians, because, both before and since the creation of said territory, exclusive jurisdiction over said Indians and their lands, and over all matters in any way affecting them, or in which they are interested, is in the United States.

It is, indeed, true that the lands in question, constituting the reservations of the Osage and Kansas Indians, are portions of lands previously granted by patent of the United States, in pursuance of the treaty of May 6, 1828 (7 Stat. at L. 311), and of the treaty of December 29, 1835 (7 Stat. at L. 478), to the Cherokee Nation *of Indians, and that it was provided, in[269 those treaties, that the lands so granted should not, without the consent of the Indians, at any future time be "included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory."

In the subsequent treaty with the Cherokees of July 19, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 799, 804), it was stipulated that the United States might "settle friendly Indians in any part of the Cherokee country west of the 96th degree, to be taken in a compact form in quantity not exceeding 160 acres for each member of each of said tribes thus to be settled; the boundaries of each of said districts to be distinctly marked, and the land conveyed in fee simple to each of said tribes, . . . said lands thus to be disposed of to be paid for to the Cherokee Nation, at such price as may be agreed on between the said parties in interest, subject to the approval of the President."

On the 26th of June, 1866, a treaty was made with the Osage Indians (14 Stat. at L. 687) wherein it was provided that a large part of the reservation then occupied by that tribe in Kansas was sold outright to the government for a certain sum of money, and by article 16 of said treaty it was provided that "if said Indians should agree to remove from the state of Kansas and settle on lands to be provided for them by the United States in the Indian territory on such terms as may be agreed on between the United States and the Indian tribes now residing in said territory, or any of them, then the diminished reservation shall be disposed of by the United States in the same manner and for the same purposes as hereinbefore provided in relation to said trust lands, except that fifty per cent of the proceeds of the sale of said diminished reserve may be used by the United States in the purchase of lands for a suitable home for said Indians in said Indian territory."

On July 15, 1870 (16 Stat. at L. 335, chap. 296), Congress passed an act, providing, in substance, that whenever the Osages should agree thereto, in such manner as the President should prescribe, said Indians should be removed from their said diminished reservation in the state of Kansas to the lands to be provided for them in the Indian territory, "to con-270]sist of a tract of land *in compact form, equal in quantity to 160 acres for each member of said tribe, . . . to be paid for out of the proceeds of the sales of their lands in the state of Kansas;" and subsequently the Osages were established upon their present reservation, and the Cherokees were paid therefor the sum of $1,650,600; and by an act approved June 5, 1872 (17 Stat. at L. 228), Congress confirmed this reservation in said Cherokee country.

The history of the transfer of the so-called Kaw or Kansas Indians from their reservation in the state of Kansas to lands bought from the Cherokee Nation, constituting their present reservation, was similar to that of the Osages, and calls for no special narration.

In 1883, sufficient money having been realized from the sales to pay for said lands, a deed was duly executed by the Cherokees conveying all their rights and title in and to the same to the United States for the use of the said Osage and Kansas Indians, which deed is recorded in volume 6 of the Indian Deeds in the office of the commissioner of Indian affairs in the Department of the Interior.

It is alleged that, by no subsequent treaty, have either the Cherokee or the Osage or Kansas Indians consented that the lands here in question should be included within the limits or jurisdiction of the territory of Oklahoma; and it is accordingly now contended that under the provision contained in the Cherokee treaties, the lands therein designated should never be embraced within the limits of a territory or state without the consent of said Indians, the exemption or right thereby created runs with the land, subject to which said lands, or any part thereof, could be conveyed to other Indians, and is not a right belonging solely to the Cherokees, which ceased to exist when the ownership of the Cherokees therein terminated.

Whether, without express stipulation to that effect, the right granted by treaty to the Cherokee Nation, to be exempt as to their lands, from inclusion within the limits of any territory or state, passed with the grant of a portion of such lands to the Osage and Kansas Indians, we need not consider, because, even if such were the law, it is conceded that the United States have, by the act of May 2, 1890 (26 271] Stat. at L. 81), *creating the territory of Oklahoma, included these Osage and Kansas Indian lands within the geographical limits of said territory.

It is well settled that an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty, and that any questions that may arise are beyond the sphere of judicial cognizance, and must be met by the political department of the government.

"It need hardly be said that a treaty cannot change the Constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our government. The effect of treaties and acts of Congress, when in conflict, is not settled by the Constitution. But the question is not involved in any doubt as to its proper solution. A treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress (Foster & Elam v. Neilson, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 314 [7: 435]); and an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty (Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curt. C. C. 454).

"In the cases referred to, these principles were applied to treaties with foreign nations. Treaties with Indian nations within the jurisdiction of the United States, whatever considerations of humanity and good faith may be involved and require their faithful observance, cannot be more obligatory. . . . In the case under consideration the act of Congress must prevail as if the treaty were not an element to be considered." The Cherokee Tobacco [207 ¼ lb. Papers Smoking Tobacco v. United States], 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 616 [20: 227].

That was a case where an act of Congress extended the revenue laws as respected tobacco over the Indian territories, regardless of provisions in prior treaties that exempted tobacco raised by Indians on their reservations.

The grant of legislative power to the territory of Oklahoma, contained in the 6th section of the organic act, was as follows:

"The legislative power of the territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, but no law shall be passed interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; no tax shall be imposed on the property of the United States, nor shall the lands or other property of nonresidents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents, nor shall *any law be passed [272 impairing the right to private property, nor shall any unequal discrimination be made in taxing different kinds of property, but all property subject to taxation shall be taxed in proportion to its value."

With the Indian reservations brought, by valid legislation, within the limits of the territory, and with the broad grant of legislative power contained in the section just quoted, we are next to consider objections urged to the validity of the act of the territorial assembly, approved March 5, 1895, wherein it provides that "when any cattle are kept or grazed, or any other personal property is situated in any unorganized country, district, or reservation of this territory, such property shall be subject to taxation in the organized county to which said country, district, or reservation is attached for judicial purposes."

Our attention is called to the following provision contained in the 1st section of the organic act:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to impair any right now pertaining to any Indians or Indian tribe in said territory under the laws, agreements, and treaties of the United States, or to impair the rights of person or property pertaining to said Indians, or to affect the authority of the government of the United States to make any regulation or to make any law respecting said Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, which it would have been competent to make or enact if this act had not been passed."

And also to § 3 of the act of February 28, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 794, chap. 383), as follows:

"Where lands are occupied by Indians who have bought and paid for the same, and which lands are not needed for farming or agricultural purposes, and are not desired for individual allotments, the same may be leased by authority of the council speaking for such Indians, for a period not to exceed five years for grazing, or ten years for mining purposes, in such quantities and upon such terms and conditions as the agent in charge of such reservation may recommend, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

And the contention is that, irrespective of the question whether said lands are, by the 273] treaties, excluded from the *limits and jurisdiction of the territory of Oklahoma, the taxation of cattle located for grazing purposes upon the reservations, under leases duly authorized by act of Congress, is a violation of the rights of the Indians and an invasion of the jurisdiction and control of the United States over them and their lands.

As to that portion of the argument which claims that, even if the Indians were not interested in any way in the property taxed, the territorial authorities would have no right to tax the property of others than Indians located upon these reservations, it is sufficient to cite the cases of Utah & N. Railway Company v. Fisher, 116 U. S. 28 [29: 542], and Maricopa & P. Railroad Co. v. Arizona, 156 U. S. 347 [39: 447], in which it was held that the property of railway companies traversing Indian reservations are subject to taxation by the states and territories in which such reservations are located.

But it is urged that the Indians are directly and vitally interested in the property sought to be taxed, and that their rights of property and person are seriously affected by the legislation complained of; that the money contracted to be paid for the privilege of grazing is paid to the Indians as a tribe, and is used and expended by them for their own purposes, and that if, by reason of this taxation, the conditions existing at the time the leases were executed were changed, or could be changed by the legislature of Oklahoma, at its pleasure, the value of the lands for such purposes would fluctuate or be destroyed altogether according to such conditions.

But it is obvious that a tax put upon the cattle of the lessees is too remote and indirect to be deemed a tax upon the lands or privileges of the Indians. A similar contention was urged in the case of New York, Lake Erie, & W. Railroad Co. v. Pennsylvania, 158 U. S. 431 [39: 1043]. There the state of Pennsylvania had imposed a tax upon a railroad, situated within the borders of that state, but leased to another railroad company engaged in carrying on interstate commerce, and this tax was measured by a reference to the amount of the tolls received by the lessor company from the lessee company. It was claimed that the imposition of a tax on tolls might lead to increasing them in an effort to throw 274]*their burden on the carrying company, and thus, in effect, become a tax or charge upon interstate commerce. But this court held that such a tax upon tolls was too indirect and remote to be regarded as a tax or burden on interstate commerce. A similar view was taken in the case of Henderson Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 150 [41: 953], where a tax imposed by the state of Kentucky on the intangible property of a company which owned and maintained a bridge over a river between two states was contended to be objectionable as constituting a burden upon interstate commerce, but it was held that the fact that the tax in question was to some extent affected by the amount of the tolls received, and therefore might be supposed to increase the rate of tolls and thus be a burden on interstate commerce, was too remote and incidental to make it a tax on the business transacted. Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 166 U. S. 185 [41: 965].

The suggestion that such a tax on the cattle constitutes a tax on the lands within the reasoning in the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, 157 U. S. 429 [39: 759], is purely fanciful. The holding there was that a tax on rents derived from lands was substantially a tax on the lands. To make the present case a similar one the tax should have been levied on the rents received by the Indians, and not on the cattle belonging to third parties.

It is further contended that this tax law of the territory of Oklahoma, in so far as it affects the Indian reservations, is in conflict with the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes. It is said to interfere with, or imposes a servitude upon, a lawful commercial intercourse with the Indians, over which Congress has absolute control, and in the exercise of which control it has enacted the statute authorizing the leasing by the Indians of their unoccupied lands for grazing purposes.

The unlimited power to Congress to deal with the Indians, their property and commercial transactions, so long as they keep up their tribal organizations, may be conceded; but it is not perceived that local taxation, by a state or territory, of property of others than Indians would be an interference *with Congres [275 sional power. It was decided in Utah & Northern Railway Co. v. Fisher, 116 U. S. 28 [29: 542], that the lands and railroad of a railway company within the limits of the Fort Hill Indian reservation in the territory of Idaho was lawfully subject to territorial taxation, which might be enforced within the exterior boundaries of the reservation by proper process. The question was similarly decided in Maricopa & P. Railroad Company v. Arizona Territory, 156 U. S. 347 [39: 447].

The taxes in question here were not imposed on the business of grazing, or on the rents received by the Indians, but on the cattle as property of the lessees, and, as we have heretofore said that such a tax is too remote and indirect to be deemed a tax or burden on interstate commerce, so is it too remote and indirect to be regarded as an interference with the legislative power of Congress.

These views sufficiently dispose of the objections urged against the power of the legislative assembly of Oklahoma to pass laws taxing property within the limits of the Indian reservations and belonging to persons not Indians. We must now consider the objections made to the mode in which that power was exercised in the act of March 5, 1895.

The most fundamental of these objections is found in the assertion that, so far as nonresident owners of cattle grazing within the Indian reservations are concerned, it is taxation without representation, and that such persons derive no benefit from the expenditure of the moneys accruing from the tax.

The organic act, as we have already seen, extends the exterior boundary of the territory around these Indian reservations. It also provided for the division of the territory into council and representative districts, and for the election of a legislative assembly and of a delegate to Congress. The Indian reservations were not included within any of the council or representative districts. The act provided that there should be seven counties, and fixed the county seats, and under the authority of the act the governor established the boundaries of these counties. The legislature was authorized to change the boundaries of the original counties, but were not given authority to include these Indian reservations, 276]or any lands not then *open to settlement in any of the counties. By §9 it was provided that the territory should be divided into three judicial districts; that the supreme court should define such judicial districts; and that the territory not embraced in organized counties should be attached, for judicial purposes, to such organized county or counties as the supreme court should determine. In May, 1890, the supreme court made an order attaching the several Indian reservations to certain organized counties for judicial purposes, and by an order on February 3, 1894, attached the reservations in question in this case to Kay county for judicial purposes.

As already stated, by the act of March 5, 1895, it was provided that when any cattle are kept or grazed or any other personal property is situated in any unorganized country, district, or reservation, such property shall be subject to taxation in the organized county to which said country, district, or reservation is attached for judicial purposes; and provision was made for the appointment of a special assessor for such unorganized country, district, or reservation. Under this condition of affairs it is contended that the taxing power cannot be lawfully exerted as respects property within these reservations. It is said that those to be affected by the tax have no voice in the election of the legislature to make the laws by which they are to be governed; that they have no school facilities for their children; that they cannot organize towns, so as to have the benefit of the police and sanitary laws of the territory; that the officers of Kay county have no authority to expend any portion of the moneys raised by this taxation in improving roads within the Indian reservation; that they cannot participate in the election of the territorial delegate; and that they are not benefited by the taxes appropriated for salary fund, contingent expense fund, sinking fund, road and bridge fund, poor fund, etc.

Undoubtedly there are general principles, familiar to our systems of state and Federal government, that the people who pay taxes imposed by laws are entitled to have a voice in the election of those who pass the laws, and that taxes must be assessed and collected for public purposes, and that the duty *or[277 obligation to pay taxes by the individual is founded in his participation in the benefits arising from their expenditure. But these principles, as practically administered, do not mean that no person, man, woman, or child, resident or nonresident, shall be taxed, unless he was represented by someone for whom he had actually voted, nor do they mean that no man's property can be taxed unless some benefit to him personally can be pointed out. Thus it has been held that personal allegiance has no necessary connection with the right of taxation; an alien may be taxed as well as a citizen. Mager v. Grima, 49 U. S. 8 How. 494 [12:1170]; Witherspoon v. Duncan, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 210 [18:339]. So, likewise, it is settled law that the property, both real and personal, of nonresidents may be lawfully subjected to the tax laws of the state in which they are situated.

The specific objection made to the validity of these taxes as imposed on personal property located in unorganized counties or in the reservations does not seem to us to be well founded. We have already cited the cases of Utah & Northern Railway Company v. Fisher, 116 U. S. 28 [29:542], and Maricopa & P. R. R. Co. v. Arizona, 156 U. S. 347 [39:447], wherein territorial tax laws were held to have a valid operation over property lying within Indian reservations. Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. Peniston, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 5 [21:787], was a case where unorganized country was attached by law to an organized county for judicial and revenue purposes, and the law was sustained, as appears in the decision delivered by Mr. Justice Strong, as follows:

"It remains only to notice one other position taken by the complainants. It is, that if the act of the state under which the tax was laid be constitutional in its application to their property within Lincoln county, the property outside of Lincoln county is not lawfully taxable by the authorities of that county under the laws of the state. To this we are unable to give our assent. By the statutes of Nebraska the unorganized territory west of Lincoln county, and the unorganized county of Cheyenne, are attached to the county of Lincoln for judicial and revenue purposes. The authorities of that county, therefore, were the proper authorities to levy the tax upon the property thus placed under their charge for revenue purposes."

*In Llano Cattle Co. v. Faught [69 Tex. [278 402], 5 S. W. 494, the case was that an unorganized county was attached by law to the organized county of Scurry for judicial purposes. The officers of Scurry county assessed and levied county taxes upon the cattle of the plaintiff, a foreign corporation, kept in the unorganized county, and it was held that the unorganized county, being in effect a part of the county to which it was so attached, the collection of taxes on such personalty of a nonresident may be enforced by the tax collector of the latter county. We are referred to similar decisions in Kansas: Philpin v. McCarty, 24 Kan. 393; in Ohio: Kemper v. McClelland, 19 Ohio, 308; in Iowa: Hilliard v. Griffin [72 Iowa, 331], 33 N. W. 156; in Michigan: Township of Comins, and Township of Harrisville, 45 Mich. 442.

It is further contended that, while the taxes assessed for territorial and court-expense funds may be valid, yet that the balance of the taxes, levied for county purposes and expended within the geographical limits of Kay county, are unauthorized, for the reason that the people on these reservations are not interested in such taxes, and receive no benefit from their expenditure. But, as it seems to us, it cannot be maintained that those plaintiffs whose cattle are within the protection of the laws of Oklahoma receive no benefit from the expenditures in Kay county. Certainly they have some advantage in the improvement of the roads within that county, when they journey to and from the towns and settlements in the organized county. They are interested in the prevalence of law and order in the communities adjacent to their property, and in the provision made for the care of the poor and insane. It is to be presumed that they have a right to send their children to the schools in the organized county.

The cases, both state and Federal, are numerous in which it has been held that taxes, otherwise lawful, are not invalidated by the allegation, or even the fact, that the resulting benefits are unequally shared.

In Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78 [26: 658], the complaint was that certain water, street, gas, school, and other taxes were unlawfully assessed against the property of the plain-279]tiff, which, *though lying within the city limits, were not benefited by such taxes; but this court, affirming the supreme court of Pennsylvania, said:

"We are unable to see that the taxes levied on this property were not for a public use. Taxes for schools, for the support of the poor, for protection against fire, and for waterworks are the specific taxes found in the list complained of. We think it will not be denied by anyone that these are public purposes in which the whole community have an interest, for which by common consent property owners everywhere in this country are taxed. There are items styled city tax and city buildings, which, in the absence of any explanation, we must suppose to be for the good government of the city, and for the construction of such buildings as are necessary for municipal purposes. . . . It may be true that he does not receive the same amount of benefit from some of these taxes as do citizens living in the heart of the city. It probably is true, from the evidence found in this record, that his tax bears a very unjust relation to the benefits received as compared with its amount. But who can adjust with precise accuracy the amount which each individual in an organized civil community shall contribute to sustain it, or can insure in this respect absolute equality of burdens and fairness in their distribution among those who must bear them?

"We cannot say judicially that Kelly [the plaintiff] received no benefit from the city organization. These streets, if they do not penetrate his farm, lead to it. The waterworks will probably reach him some day, and may be near enough to him now to serve him on some occasion. The schools may receive his children, and in this regard he can be in no worse condition than those living in the city who have no children, and yet who pay for the support of the schools. Every man in a county, a town, a city, a state, is deeply interested in the education of the children of the community, because his peace and quiet, his happiness and prosperity, are largely dependent upon the intelligence and moral training which it is the object of public schools to supply to the children of his neighbors and associates, if he has none himself."

*It is no objection to a tax that the party [280 required to pay it derives no benefit from the particular burden; e. g., a tax for school purposes levied upon a manufacturing corporation. But, in truth, benefits always flow from the appropriation of public moneys to such purposes, which corporations in common with natural persons receive in the additional security to their property and profits. Amesbury Nail Factory Co. v. Weed, 17 Mass. 53.

In Cooley on Taxation, 16, the result of a wide examination of the cases is thus stated:

"If it were practicable to do so, the taxes levied by any government ought to be apportioned among the people according to the benefit which each receives from the protection the government affords him, but this is manifestly impossible. The value of life and liberty, and of the social and family rights and privileges cannot be measured by any pecuniary standard; and by the general consent of civilized nations, income or the sources of income are almost universally made the basis upon which the ordinary taxes are estimated. This is upon the assumption, never wholly true in point of fact, but sufficiently near the truth for the practical operations of government, that the benefit received from the government is in proportion to the property held, or the revenue enjoyed under its protection; and though this can never be arrived at with accuracy, through the operation of any general rule, and would not be wholly just if it could be, experience has given us no better standard, and it is applied in a great variety of forms, and with more or less approximation to justice and equality. But, as before stated, other considerations are always admissible; what is aimed at is, not taxes strictly just, but such taxes as will best subserve the general welfare of the political society."

The fact that the taxes in question are levied on personal property only, and thus exempts real property, is urged as an objection to the validity of the act. It is claimed that such an exemption operates as an unjust discrimination.

As the owners of the cattle taxed own no real estate within the Indian reservation, this objection, if sound, would render *it im-[281 possible to tax the cattle at all. But it is the usual course in tax laws to treat personal property as one class and real estate as another, and it has never been supposed that such classification created an illegal discrimination, because there might be some persons who owned only personal property, and others who owned property of both classes. Again, it is complained that this law violates the principle of uniformity, and operates as an unjust discrimination, because it provides for an assessment of cattle, kept and grazed on the Indian reservations, at a different time from that provided for the assessment of personal property, including cattle, in the organized country.

It is not unusual for tax laws to authorize the assessment of different classes of property at different dates, and even of the same classes of property in different localities at different dates. Such matters of regulation must be supposed to be within the power of the state or territory, and to have their reasons in special facts known to the legislature. We are informed that the revenue laws of Oklahoma provide that real estate shall be valued for taxation on the 1st day of January, and personal property in the organized counties on the 1st day of February of each year, and the personal property upon the reservations on May 1. The gravamen of the complaint is that cattle are fatter and more valuable on May 1 than February 1, and hence there is an inequality in the assessments. On the other hand, it is claimed that if the cattle on the reservations were to be valued for taxation in February, the larger part would escape taxation, as they are not driven to the reservations till April.

A similar objection was urged against the validity of a tax law of the state of Wisconsin, wherein April 1 was fixed as the date for assessing saw logs belonging to nonresidents and May 1 for assessing saw logs of residents. The court said:

"It is claimed, (1) that this law violates the principle of uniformity in providing for an assessment of the logs of a nonresident at a different time than that provided in the case of residents, (2) that for the same reason it discriminates unjustly against the nonresidents. But I [282] am of opinion that the case *does not come within either of these principles. . . . The legislature was aware that the logs of nonresidents as well as resident owners were liable to be floated out of the state in the month of April." C. N. Nelson Lumber Company v. Town of Loraine, Cir. Ct. of U. S. for Dist. of Wisconsin, 22 Fed. Rep. 54.

In Missouri a statute was held valid which provided that real property should be assessed every two years in all counties outside of St. Louis, and that all property in the city of St. Louis should be assessed every year, for state and municipal taxes, and this although in the particular case it was shown that this difference in the time of the assessments made a considerable difference in the amount of the taxes. State, Rosenblatt, v. New Lindell Hotel Co. 9 Mo. App. 450.

A law providing different times for assessments for state taxes in the state of New York was held to be legal. The People, Twenty-third Street R. Co., v. Commissioners of Taxes, 91 N. Y. 593.

Several other provisions of the act in question are pointed to as creating discriminations against taxpayers whose property is in the unorganized district and reservations, such as these; that city and township assessors are required to be residents and qualified voters in the township or city where elected, but there is no such requirement imposed on the special assessor appointed by the board of county commissioners to assess the personal property in the reservations and unorganized districts; that the several township and city assessors are required to meet at the county seat and agree upon an equal cash basis of valuation of all property that they may be called upon to assess, but in this matter the special assessors do not participate; that the township assessor, clerk, and treasurer are a township board of equalization, and the mayor, city clerk, and city assessor are a city board of equalization, but that, in case of unorganized districts and reservations, the board of county commissioners act as a board of equalization, etc.

Without undertaking to enumerate all the instances in which there is some difference of procedure in respect to property assessed within the organized counties and property assessed in the unorganized districts and reservations, or to *consider minutely the several objec-[283 tions that are urged to such differences, we do not perceive that the questions suggested are for the courts. Clearly these are matters of detail within the legislative discretion. It is the law-making power which is to determine all questions of discretion or policy in ordering and apportioning taxes; which must make all the necessary rules and regulations, and decide upon the agencies by means of which the taxes shall be collected. When, as may sometimes happen, the legislature transcends its functions, and enacts, in the guise of a tax law, a law whereby the property of the citizen is confiscated or taken for private purposes, the judiciary has the right and duty to interpose. But such a case is not presented by this record.

These views dispose of the objections urged against the validity of the act of March 5, 1895, and leave only for consideration error assigned to the action of the territorial board of equalization in adding 35 per cent to the assessment or valuation made by the officer or officers to whom the duty to make the assessment is by the statute expressly committed. It is alleged that this order by the board of equalization was unauthorized and void.

We learn from the opinion of the supreme court of Oklahoma in the present case that this question of the power of the territorial board of equalization to raise the valuation of the properties to be taxed had been, in the previous case of Wallace v. Bullen, decided affirmatively, and that such decision was followed in the present case.

We are informed, however, by the brief filed in behalf of the petitioners that subsequently, on September 3, 1897, in the case of Gray v. Stiles (Okla.) 49 Pac. 1083, the subject was again considered and an opposite conclusion reached. It is also asserted in said brief that the question is one of general importance, and that a final decision of it may affect the validity of municipal obligations heretofore issued in the territory.

Such allegations disclose that there are parties not represented before us whose interests are involved in the inquiry. The case was heard in the trial court on a demurrer to the petition, *and the question of the validity of [284 the action of the board of equalization in raising the assessed values throughout the territory was put by the supreme court, without discussion, on its previous decision in the case of Wallace v. Bullen. We are also informed by the briefs that the case just mentioned is now pending before the supreme court on an order for rehearing. Whether the facts pertaining to the action of the board of equalization in this particular were the same in Gray v. Stiles as those in this case, we cannot say from this record.

In such circumstances, we think it would be premature for this court to determine the question.

As for the reasons before given, the judgment of the supreme court must be reversed, that court will have an opportunity to deal with this question, if it think fit, upon a rehearing.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma is accordingly reversed, and the cause is remanded with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

WILLIAM GRICE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 284-291.)

Jurisdiction to issue habeas corpus—interference with state court—duty of state court—ground for discharge upon habeas corpus—ground of urgency.

1. Circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction to issue the writ of habeas corpus in a case where a person is unlawfully restrained of his liberty by state officers under an unconstitutional statute.
2. Federal courts should not, by habeas corpus, interfere with the regular course of justice in a state court, unless in cases of peculiar urgency.
3. A state court is not bound to decide a constitutional question where there are other grounds for reversing a conviction under the law, upon pain of having its omission furnish a ground for Federal interference.
4. It is no ground for a discharge upon habeas corpus that the state statute which the prisoner is charged with violating is unconstitutional, and that several terms of the court have passed without the case being moved for trial, where he is on bail and has made no effort to obtain a trial.
5. The surrender of a person indicted, by his bail, at his request, and his consequent imprisonment, furnishes in itself no ground of urgency for the interference, by habeas corpus, of a Federal court, where there are no extraordinary and peculiar circumstances.

Argued January 26, 1898. Decided February 21, 1898.

APPEAL from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas discharging William Grice, the petitioner, upon a return to a writ of habeas corpus from the custody of the sheriff of McLennan County, Texas Reversed, and case remanded with instructions to set aside the order discharging the prisoner and to enter an order remanding him to the custody of the sheriff.

See same case below, 79 Fed. Rep. 627.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

This appeal is from an order of the United States circuit court for the northern district of Texas, made upon a return to a writ of habeas corpus, issued by that court to inquire into cause for detention of the petitioner, William Grice, who, it was alleged, was unlawfully restrained of his liberty by and held in the custody of J. W. Baker, the sheriff of McLennan county, Texas. After a hearing, the circuit court, on the 22d of February, 1897, discharged the petitioner. 79 Fed. Rep. 627.

The petition for the writ was filed on the 9th of December, 1896, and therein the petitioner, among other things, made the following allegations: That he was unlawfully restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of McLennan county, Texas, having been surrendered by his sureties under a recognizance which he had theretofore given; that he was detained by the sheriff under an indictment preferred against him and other citizens of the United States on the 21st of November, 1894. The indictment charged that William Grice, E. T. Hathaway, and several others, named in the indictment, unlawfully combined and engaged among themselves and with others, who were unknown to the grand jury, in a conspiracy against trade, and that they had created a trust by a combination of their capital, skill, and acts for the purpose of creating and carrying out restrictions in trade. The indictment was based upon an act passed by the legislature of Texas on the 30th of March, 1889, which is generally known and described as the anti-trust act of that state. When the indictment was presented, the defendants (including the petitioner herein) were arrested and brought before the proper court and entered into a recognizance conditioned for their appearance in court from day to day and term to term to answer the indictment. On the 2d of December, 1895, the case was regularly called, and the defendants, pursuant to the provisions of the Code of Criminal *Procedure of the state of Texas, an- [286 nounced a severance, and thereupon E. T. Hathaway, one of the defendants named in the indictment, was placed on trial to answer the charges contained therein. Before proceeding to trial on the merits, he in effect demurred to the indictment on the ground, among others, that the above-named act of the state of Texas was a violation of the Federal Constitution, for reasons which he stated. The demurrer was overruled and the trial of the cause was then proceeded with, and on the 12th of December, 1895, a verdict of guilty as charged in the indictment was rendered, and the jury assessed defendant's punishment at a fine of $50. Hathaway duly took proceedings for the purpose of obtaining a review by the court of criminal appeals of the state of Texas of the various matters raised by the demurrer and in the course of his trial.

Under the law of Texas, one who is convicted of a felony, although the punishment imposed is only a fine, is still necessarily subjected to confinement in the jail pending the determination of any appeal which he may take, and under that provision the defendant Hathaway was subjected to confinement in jail pending the determination of his appeal.

It was argued in the court of criminal appeals on the 29th day of January, 1896, and was not decided until the 24th day of June, 1896, leaving the defendant Hathaway in the meantime incarcerated in the McLennan county jail. On the last-mentioned day the court of criminal appeals decided the case, but did not pass upon the constitutionality of the act under which the indictment was framed, although that question had been raised in the court below and presented to the appellate court on the argument of the appeal. The court decided the appeal upon another ground, which the petitioner herein calls a technical ground of pleading, the court holding that because the indictment presented failed to charge Hathaway with knowingly carrying out as agent the stipulations, purposes, prices, etc., under the alleged conspiracy, the admission of evidence to that effect over the objection of the defendant was unwarranted in law, and the conviction was therefore in-287 valid. The appellate court thereupon *reversed the judgment and remanded the cause for a trial de novo.

Since the rendition of this judgment two terms of the criminal court in the proper county have been held, one of which was drawing near its close at the time that the petitioner filed his petition, December 9, 1896, and the petitioner then makes this allegation: that "while this petitioner, together with his codefendants who have been arrested and placed in recognizance, have stood ready and anxious for trial upon said indictment, yet said case has not even been called by the court for trial, nor has said cause been set for trial, but the same has been permitted to remain upon the docket of said court, subjecting this petitioner and his codefendants, not only to the shame and contumely of an indictment for felony, but denying to him and his codefendants the right to be heard in his defense in said court as a citizen of the United States, and whereby this petitioner, as well as his codefendants, are without remedy in the state courts of Texas for the assertion and vindication of their rights under the Constitution of the United States." It is then shown in the petition that upon the 24th of November, 1896, Hathaway, one of his codefendants, procured from the circuit court of the United States a writ of habeas corpus, requiring the sheriff of McLennan county, who then had him in custody, to produce the body of said Hathaway, and that the writ was served upon the sheriff, who made return that he held his prisoner under the indictment above mentioned.

A hearing before the court was then set for the 7th of December, 1896, and notice thereof was given to the sheriff and prosecuting officers of the county of McLennan, advising them of the proceedings and of the time when the matter would be inquired into. On the 7th of December the state court dismissed the indictment and prosecution as against Hathaway, leaving the same to stand unimpaired as to the petitioner herein and his codefendants. This action on the part of the state court, the petitioner charges, was for the purpose of defeating the jurisdiction of the United States court upon the writ of habeas corpus, which had then been issued, *and to thereby prevent [288 that court from passing upon the constitutional rights of said Hathaway. After this discharge by the state court, the sheriff made return, setting up that fact and that he claimed no further right or custody over the relator.

The petitioner then avers that the act in question violates the Constitution of the United States for the reasons which he names, and that by reason of the premises "he is without remedy for the assertion and vindication of his rights as a citizen of the United States under the Constitution thereof; that he has stood under indictment for felony, charged with the violation of said alleged statute of the state of Texas, approved March 30, 1889, for the period of two years, without being afforded an opportunity by the state courts of Texas for the assertion of his rights, as aforesaid, as a citizen of the United States. Your petitioner believes, and so avers, that it is the purpose and intent of the state authorities of the state of Texas to prevent, if possible, any appeal by this petitioner to the courts of the United States for the vindication of his rights as aforesaid as a citizen of the United States In view of the premises herein recited and without the interposition of this honorable court for his due protection and the due conservation of his rights, as a citizen of the United States, he is practically remediless by an appeal in regular course or otherwise." The petitioner, therefore, asked for a writ of habeas corpus in order that he might be discharged from custody.

The writ having been duly served, the sheriff made return showing that he held the petitioner by virtue of a writ issued upon the indictment, and he further alleged that the authorities had been anxious and ready to accord all the defendants under the indictment that speedy trial which they were guaranteed under the Constitution and the laws of the state of Texas; that the delay had come in great part from the action of the defendants; that at the first term of court after the indictment was presented, the case was set down for trial on the 14th of March, and was thereafter continued by agreement between the state and the defendants; that at the *succeeding [289 September term the case was set down for trial on October 4, and on that day it was postponed upon motion of the defendants and set down for the November term, to be tried on the 2d of December, 1895, and that when the cause was called on that day the defendants, including the petitioner, claimed a severance, to which they were entitled under the laws of Texas, and forced the state to try Hathaway alone, thereby avoiding and defeating a trial of the petitioner herein. The sheriff further returned that the purpose of the petitioner and his codefendants was, as he believed, to defeat the jurisdiction of the courts of Texas in the administration of its laws; and that the relator and his codefendants had agreed among themselves to have their several sureties surrender them into the custody of the sheriff, and that by their own acts and at their own request and by their own procurement the sureties of petitioner and his codefendants did surrender them, and on the day of the surrender and contemporaneously with it a writ of habeas corpus from the circuit court was served upon the sheriff, commanding him to produce before the court instanter the body of petitioner.

Attached to the return were the affidavits of the sureties of the petitioner, in which they said in substance that the petitioner wanted them to surrender him to the sheriff on the day named, and that by his request they went to the lawyer's office and met the petitioner and accompanied him to the office of the sheriff, where they surrendered him to the sheriff.

The petitioner filed a replication which was in substance an admission of the truth of many of the allegations made in the return and the accompanying affidavits, but denied their materiality, and claimed that they furnished no answer to the allegations of the petitioner, as contained in his petition. The relator did deny that he had conspired or confederated for the purpose of defeating the jurisdiction of the courts of Texas or the administration of its laws; on the contrary, he alleged that for two years he and his codefendants had submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts of Texas for the purpose of trial, and that when it became evident to the petitioner and his codefendants that a trial was not to be [290] had except at some *indefinite period in the future, if ever, then the petitioner "as a citizen of the United States proceeded to exercise his rights as such citizen and to call upon the courts of the United States to vindicate his rights as he was entitled under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and not for the purpose of defeating the jurisdiction of said courts of Texas, but for the purposes as indicated."

After hearing the parties, the circuit court decided that a proper case had been made out for its interference by virtue of the writ of habeas corpus, and thereupon held that the statute of the state of Texas called the anti-trust law was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and, consequently, void. The court therefore discharged the petitioner, and from that order this appeal has been taken.

Mr. M. M. Crane for appellant.

Messrs. George Clark, Joseph H. Choate, S. C. T. Dodd, John D. Johnson, and D. C. Bolinger for appellee.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

The court below had jurisdiction to issue the writ and to decide the questions which were argued before it. Ex parte Royall, 117 U. S. 241 [29: 868]; Whitten v. Tomlinson, 160 U. S. 231 [40: 406]. In the latter case most of the prior authorities are mentioned. From these cases it clearly appears, as the settled and proper procedure, that while circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction, under the circumstances set forth in the foregoing statement, to issue the writ of habeas corpus, yet those courts ought not to exercise that jurisdiction by the discharge of a prisoner unless in cases of peculiar urgency, and that instead of discharging they will leave the prisoner to be dealt with by the courts of the state; that after a final determination of the case by the state court, the Federal courts will even then generally leave the petitioner to his remedy by writ of *error from this court. The reason [291] for this course is apparent. It is an exceedingly delicate jurisdiction given to the Federal courts by which a person under an indictment in a state court and subject to its laws may, by the decision of a single judge of the Federal court, upon a writ of habeas corpus, be taken out of the custody of the officers of the state and finally discharged therefrom, and thus a trial by the state courts of an indictment found under the laws of a state be finally prevented. Cases have occurred of so exceptional a nature that this course has been pursued. Such are the cases Re Loney (Thomas v. Loney), 134 U. S. 372 [33: 949], and Re Neagle (Neagle v. Cunningham), 135 U. S. 1 [34: 55], but the reasons for the interference of the Federal court in each of those cases were extraordinary, and presented what this court regarded as such exceptional facts as to justify the interference of the Federal tribunal. Unless this case be of such an exceptional nature, we ought not to encourage the interference of the Federal court below with the regular course of justice in the state court.

The ground for the discharge of the petitioner in this case, as given by the court below, was because of the opinion of that court that the anti-trust law of the state of Texas violated the Constitution of the United States, and was therefore void. The question of the validity of that act of course exists whether the case be in the state court or a hearing transferred to the Federal court by virtue of the writ of habeas corpus. It is the duty of the state court, as much as it is that of the Federal courts, when the question of the validity of a state statute is necessarily involved as being in alleged violation of any provision of the Federal Constitution, to decide that question, and to hold the law void if it violate that instrument. But the state court is not bound to decide the constitutional question when there are other grounds for reversing a conviction under the law, upon pain of having its omission furnish a ground for Federal interference.

The special circumstances creating what the court below regarded as a necessity for its immediate action, and which made the case one of urgency, are stated in the opinion of the court rendered in discharging the prisoner.

*The first circumstance stated is that [292] the court of criminal appeals did not decide, when it had the opportunity, the question of the constitutionality of the act in question, and that that court, while deciding it was unnecessary to pass upon the constitutional questions raised, "referred favorably to the decisions of the supreme court of the state in which the anti-trust law had been sustained in this regard." It is matter of common occurrence—indeed, it is almost the undeviating rule of the courts, both state and Federal—not to decide constitutional questions until the necessity for such decision arises in the record before the court. This court has followed that practice from the foundation of the government, and we can see no reason for just criticism upon the action of the state court in refusing to decide the question of the constitutionality of this act, when, at the same time, it held in substance that there was no evidence upon which to sustain the conviction of the defendant upon the indictment then before it, and that therefore the judgment should be reversed. In granting a new trial, it cannot properly be urged that the court failed to fulfil its duty towards the defendant in any degree whatever, because it did not decide the constitutional question as desired by him. The decision of the case was upon such a ground that the probability was that no conviction of the defendant could thereafter be had under that indictment. When the judgment of conviction was reversed the defendant Hathaway gave bail, and remained at large until the proceedings for his discharge were taken some six months after the judgment of reversal had been given.

Criticism is also made upon the fact that the state court did not discharge Hathaway after the decision upon his appeal until the circuit court issued the writ of habeas corpus some six months thereafter. It does not appear that Hathaway had applied to have his case tried, nor to be discharged from the indictment by reason of the decision granting him a new trial. However that may be, Hathaway's Case was finished by his actual discharge, and it has no further bearing upon the action of the state court in this case.

It is also said that since the trial of Hathaway [293] and the *granting of a new trial to him the case of the petitioner has not been called for trial, and that two terms of court since the granting of a new trial to Hathaway had come and the second one was about expiring at the time when the petitioner filed his petition in the circuit court for this writ. Here, again, there is no allegation and no proof that any attempt had been made on the part of this petitioner to obtain a trial in the state court, or that he had been refused such trial by that court upon any application which he made. It is the simple case of a failure to call the indictment for trial, the petitioner being in the meantime on bail and making no effort to obtain a trial and evincing no desire by way of a demand that a trial in his case should be had.

We do not say that a refusal to try a person who is on bail can furnish any foundation for a resort to the Federal courts, even in cases in which a trial may involve Federal questions, but in this case no refusal is shown. A mere omission to move the case for trial (the party being on bail) is all that is set up, coupled with the assertion that defendant was eager and anxious for trial, but showing no action whatever on his part which might render such anxiety and eagerness known to the state authorities.

It was also stated that the petitioner could expect little better results on a trial of his case in the state court than obtained upon the trial in the Hathaway Case. We think this statement is entirely without proof or even probability. The petitioner was indicted as one of several defendants under the same statute, and it is claimed that those of them mentioned in the indictment who resided in Texas were situated similarly to Hathaway. The probability, therefore, would be exceedingly strong that if the petitioner were tried upon the indictment found against him he would have to be acquitted by direction of the court for lack of evidence, under the decision of the criminal court of appeals in Hathaway's Case.

We are of opinion that neither one of the grounds taken by the court below nor all combined furnish any reason for the discharge of petitioner upon the writ issued by that court. The surrender of the petitioner by his bail at his request, and *his consequent impris- [294 onment, furnishes in itself no ground of urgency for the interference of a Federal court. The imprisonment is entirely voluntary, and while the surrender by his bondsmen may be good for the purpose of avoiding any technical objection to the issuing of the writ founded upon the fact that the petitioner was on bail, yet the fact of imprisonment under such circumstances adds nothing to the strength of his case as calling for the interposition of the Federal court. This whole case is clearly nothing but an attempt to obtain the interference of a court of the United States when no extraordinary or peculiar circumstances exist in favor of such interference.

Upon the facts appearing herein, we think no sufficient case was made out for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the circuit court. We come to this decision irrespective of the question of the validity of the state statute and without passing upon the same or expressing any opinion in regard thereto.

If this application had been made subsequently to a trial of the petitioner in the state court and his conviction upon such trial under a holding by that court that the law was constitutional, and where an appeal from such judgment of conviction merely imposing a fine could not be had, excepting upon the condition of the defendant's imprisonment until the hearing and decision of the appeal, a different question would be presented and one which is not decided in this case, and upon which we do not now express any opinion.

The order of the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Texas must be reversed, and the case remanded to that court with instructions to set aside the order discharging the prisoner, and to enter an order remanding him to the custody of the sheriff.

So ordered.

In numbers 337, Baker v. Austin; 338, Baker v. Hawkins; and 339, Baker v. Finley, involving the same question, and argued with this case, the same order is made.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 295-311.)

Summary process to recover possession of land—mortgagee cannot maintain summary proceedings against mortgagor—state construction of statute—relation of landlord and tenant—remedy of mortgagee to recover possession.

1. Summary process to recover possession of land in the city of Washington, under D. C. Rev. Stat. § 684, cannot be maintained unless the conventional relation of landlord and tenant exists between the parties.
2. A mortgagee of land in the District of Columbia under a deed of trust which provides that the mortgagor shall have possession until default, and under which the mortgagee is entitled to possession after condition broken, is not within the scope and effect of said statute, and the mortgagee cannot maintain summary proceedings thereunder to recover possession from the mortgagor who holds over after condition broken, where there has been neither forcible entry nor detainer by force.
3. Where an act of Congress has been taken from a state statute, the known and settled construction which such statute has received in the state before the original enactment of the act of Congress must be considered as having been adopted by Congress with the text thus expounded.
4. A mortgagee does not hold the relation of landlord and tenant to a mortgagor in possession.
5. Until the mortgagee takes actual possession, the mortgagor is not liable, without an express covenant to that effect, to pay rent, and is entitled to take the rents and profits to his own use.
6. Where a mortgagor holds over after condition broken, the mortgagee in order to obtain possession must resort to the appropriate remedy of a writ of ejectment or a bill of foreclosure.

Submitted October 13, 1897. Decided February 21, 1898.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment of that court reversing the judgment of the Supreme Court of that District for the defendants and remanding the case with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff in summary proceedings to recover possession of land in the city of Washington brought by the Eastern Trust & Banking Company against Edward M. Willis and William G. Johnson. Judgment of the Court of Appeals reversed, and case remanded with directions to affirm the judgment of the supreme court of the District

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a summary process to recover possession of land in the city of Washington, under § 684 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, commenced September 17, 1894, by complaint before a justice of the peace, by the Eastern Trust & Banking Company against Edward M. Willis and William G. Johnson, each of whom pleaded title in Johnson; and the case was thereupon certified to the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

In accordance with a general rule of that court, requiring the plaintiff in such a process to file "a declaration making demand for the possession of the premises, with a description thereof, as in ejectment," the plaintiff filed a declaration, demanding possession of the land, describing it by metes and bounds, and alleging that the defendants entered thereon, and unlawfully ejected the plaintiff therefrom, and unlawfully detained the same from the plaintiff.

The parties submitted the case to the determination of the court, without a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts, in substance as follows:

The plaintiff was a corporation organized under a charter granted by the legislature of the state of Maine, by which it *was located[296 at the city of Bangor in the county of Penobscot, and was authorized to establish agencies elsewhere in that state. Johnson was sued as assignee of the American Ice Company, a corporation of Maine, and doing business at Bangor and also at the city of Washington: and Willis was sued as the tenant or lessee of Johnson.

On December 2, 1889, by an indenture, in the nature of a mortgage, executed in Maine, and duly recorded in that state and in the District of Columbia, the American Ice Company conveyed to the Eastern Trust & Banking Company, "and its successors, in trust, with full power of succession to and enjoyment of the franchise of the corporation, all its real estate, wharves, ice houses, boarding house, stables, boilers, elevator, and machinery, situated in the town of Hampden in said county of Penobscot, and in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia, together with all and singular the privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging," to secure the payment of bonds of the ice company to the amount of $40,000, payable to the trust company at its office in Bangor in equal instalments of $5,000 each, in three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, and ten years after date, with interest. The deed provided, among other things, as follows:

First. "Until default shall be made in the payment of the principal or interest of said bonds or some of them, or in the maintenance of insurance, or in the payment of taxes or assessments as herein provided, or until default shall be made in respect to something by these presents required to be done by said party of the first part, the American Ice Company shall be permitted and suffered to possess, manage, develop, operate, and enjoy the plant and property herein conveyed, and intended so to be, and to take and use the income, rents, issues, and profits thereof, in the same manner, to the same extent, and with the same effect, as if this deed had not been made."

Second. If the ice company shall pay the principal and interest, and do all other things required to be done on its part, this deed shall be void. But if any default shall be made, and shall continue for ninety days, the whole amount of the bonds, principal and interest, shall be 297] deemed immediately due and *payable, "and it shall be lawful for the trustee to enter into or upon the premises and property hereby granted, or intended so to be, and to take possession of the whole or any part thereof," and to sell and dispose of the same by public auction in Bangor, giving notice, as therein required, in newspapers published in Bangor and in Washington, and "in its own name or in the name of the American Ice Company, to make, execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale a good and sufficient deed or deeds of conveyance of the property so sold; and any sale made as aforesaid shall be a perpetual bar, both at law and in equity, against the American Ice Company, and all persons claiming by, through, or under it, from claiming the property, rights, interests, and franchises so sold, or any interest therein." The proceeds of the sale, after payment of expenses, shall be paid over ratably to the bondholders, and the remainder, if any, to the ice company.

Third. "The foregoing provision for a sale under the power aforesaid is cumulative with the ordinary remedy of foreclosure by entry or suit therefor; and the trustees thereunder may, upon default being made as aforesaid, institute and carry out proceedings to foreclose this mortgage or deed of trust, by suit or otherwise, in such manner as may be authorized by law for the foreclosure of mortgages of real estate. And the American Ice Company hereby waives any and all rights of sale or redemption, now or hereafter provided by the statutes of Maine or of the United States."

The bonds were duly issued, as recited in the mortgage, and were delivered to and held by purchasers for value in the regular course of business. The first instalment of the bonds, and all interest which fell due on or before December 1, 1892, were paid. The rest of the bonded debt, and the interest thereon, were never paid, and were due and payable at the time of the commencement of this suit.

On October 13, 1893, the ice company executed to Johnson an assignment of all its property for the benefit of its creditors, under the act of Congress of February 24, 1893 (27 Stat. at L. 474, chap. 157). Johnson accepted the as-298] signment, and assumed *the duties of assignee; and as such on January 29, 1894, executed to Willis a lease in writing of all the ice company's real estate in the city of Washington, for one year from that date, at a monthly rate of $130.

After the default which took place on December 1, 1893, had continued more than ninety days, a majority of the bondholders directed the trust company to proceed in the execution of the trust. In pursuance of that direction, and of the power contained in the mortgage, the trust company advertised and exposed the whole mortgaged property for sale by auction at Bangor on May 4, 1894. The sale was adjourned until September 8, 1894, when the property was sold, and was purchased by a committee of the bondholders, and for their benefit. The terms of the sale have not yet been complied with, nor any deed made to the purchasers, it being understood and agreed between them and the trustee, at the time of the sale, that the trustee should first obtain possession of the property.

The trust company, on July 30, 1894, caused a thirty days' notice to quit to be served on Johnson and on Willis; and on September 17, 1894, commenced this suit to recover possession of the property by causing a seven days' summons to be issued to each of them by a justice of the peace of the District of Columbia; and thereupon subsequent proceedings took place as above stated.

Upon the agreed statement of facts, the supreme court of the District of Columbia gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed to the court of appeals, which reversed the judgment, and remanded the case with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff. 6 App. D. C. 375. The defendants sued out a writ of error from this court which was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. 167 U. S. 76 [ante, 83]. They then obtained from this court this writ of certiorari to the court of appeals under the act of March 3, 1897 (29 Stat. at L. 692, chap. 390), 167 U. S. 746, mem.

Messrs. Calderon Carlisle, William G. Johnson, and William A. Maury, for petitioners:

The relation of landlord and tenant did not exist, and the case was not within the true intent of the meaning of the landlord and tenant act.

Mr. B. F. Leighton, for respondent:

The deed of trust to defendant was duly recorded and acknowledged. Its delivery passed the title to the grantee, in præsenti, and, whether recorded or not, was good as against the grantor and his assigns without consideration.

The power to dispose of the property to satisfy the debt for which it is pledged is not collateral, but, like the right of redemption, inheres in the subject. It is not an addition to the mortgage, but a part of it; and the mode in which it may be exercised is as proper a subject of agreement, prima facie, as the terms of the mortgage itself.

Lawrence v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 13 N. Y. 209.

Such a power is sustained by English and American authorities alike.

Croft v. Powell, 2 Comyns, Rep. 603; Corder v. Morgan, 18 Ves. Jr. 344; Matthie v. Edwards, 2 Colly. Ch. Cas. 465; Davey v. Durrant, 1 De G. & J. 535; Montague v. Dawes, 12 Allen, 397; Elliott v. Wood, 45 N. Y. 71.

The remedies at law and in equity of the cestuis que trust are concurrent. The adoption of the one does not exclude the other. Whether they are entitled to obtain possession through their trustee under the proceedings instituted in these causes depends upon the provisions of the deed of trust and the laws of this jurisdiction.

The estate limited in the premises and habendum of the deed of trust is a fee. Both the limiting clauses contain apt and technical language to create that estate.

The power to take possession and sell is found in the deed of trust.

This power of sale is expressly made cumulative with the ordinary remedy of foreclosure by entry, suit, or otherwise.

The clause in the deed of trust permitting the American Ice Company to retain possession of the property until default is similar in language and identical in legal effect with the clause in the deed of trust considered and interpreted by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia in the recent case of Loring v. Bartlett, 4 App. D. C. 1.

Chief Justice Alvey, speaking for the court, said: "The effect of the deed to the trustees was to vest the fee-simple estate in them from the date of the deed; and but for the express provision or reservation in the deed which we have already recited, whereby the appellee was allowed to retain possession of the property until default made the right of possession would also have vested in the trustees from the date of the deed."

The right of the American Ice Company to the possession of the property embraced in the deed of trust terminated upon default in the payment of the bonds That was one of the events upon the happening of which its right of possession was made to depend. The right of possession immediately accrued to the defendant, and the landlord and tenant act furnished the proper remedy to enforce that right.

In the case of Loring v. Bartlett, 4 App. D. C. 1, the purchaser from the trustee brought the suit. Here the trustee sues. In all other respects the cases are similar in fact and identical in legal principle. In Loring v. Bartlett the right of the purchaser from the trustees to sue was put upon the express ground that he held the trustees' title, and was substituted to their right by operation of law. "The property having been sold under the power in the deed after default made by the appellees the purchaser became entitled to all the rights vested in the trustees in regard to the possession of the premises, and is substituted to their rights in that respect, by operation of law." This is the language of the court. The conclusion reached by the court in this case is fortified by numerous decisions.

Wilkinson v. Hall, 3 Bing. N. C. 508.

The situation of a lessor on the expiration of a term, and of a mortgagor who has covenanted that the mortgagee may enter upon a certain day, are precisely the same.

Doe, Fisher, v. Giles, 5 Bing. N. C. 421; Georges Creek Coal & I. Co. v. Detmold, 1 Md. 225.

The landlord and tenant act was passed July 4, 1864. The first case on the interpretation of this statute was that of Spalding v. Hall. The facts in this case were that the defendant was in possession of certain premises under a lease which was to expire June 30, 1864. On the 16th day of June the owner of the premises leased the same to the plaintiff for five years, commencing July 1, 1864. No notice to quit was served on defendant, and he remained in possession after the expiration of his term. Plaintiff brought suit for possession under the landlord and tenant act. The court held that the defendant Hall was a tenant from year to year, and entitled to six months' notice, which was sufficient of itself to dispose of the case; but the court went further, and held that the true intent and meaning of the legislature was to extend this remedy to all persons who by act of the lessor, or by operation of law, were placed in the same relation to the tenant as the original lessor, to wit, the grantees or assignees, devisees, or heirs at law of the lessor.

Spalding v. Hall, 6 D. C. Rep. 124.

This case was decided November 21, 1864. Ten years later the case of Lucas v. Jones was decided. This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the possession of the premises in controversy, under the provisions of the act in question. The defendant had encumbered the premises in controversy by a deed of trust in the ordinary form to secure the payment of a debt therein described. Having made default in the payment of said debt, the property was sold by the trustees named in the deed of trust, and purchased by the plaintiff, to whom a conveyance had been made by the trustee. Plaintiff served the defendant with thirty days' notice to quit, on the theory that after the sale he was a statutory tenant by sufferance. The court held that the action would lie. Justice MacArthur in deciding the case said: "I was of opinion then that the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties could not be inferred from these circumstances so as to bring the cause within the statute upon which it was founded. A careful examination of the language used in the first section has satisfied me that in this respect my construction of the act was erroneous, and all of the judges who heard the case here are of the same opinion. . . . The simple fact of possession where there is no contract is a sufficient circumstance to create such tenancy, and if a man, therefore, holds possession of premises belonging to another, and there is no agreement between them, the relation of landlord and tenant arises by mere operation of the statute."

Luchs v. Jones, 1 MacArth. 346.

The case of Fiske v. Bigelow was similar in its facts, and a like conclusion was reached by the court.

Fiske v. Bigelow, 2 MacArth. 431.

The case of Barber v. Harris, 6 Mackey, 593, was brought to this court by writ of error to reverse a judgment quashing a writ of certiorari to a justice of the peace for the District of Columbia. The plaintiff in error was in possession of a certain house and premises situate in the city of Washington, in said District, as tenant under a certain lease not then expired the terms of which are fully set out in said petition. The leased premises were sold under a certain deed of trust prior in date to that of the lease. The purchaser was the defendant in error, Barber, who served him with a thirty days' notice to quit, and then brought an action for possession under the landlord and tenant act. The justice before whom the suit was brought gave judgment for Barber. The petition averred that the proceedings before the justice were void for want of jurisdiction, because, inter alia, the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between the said Barber and plaintiff in error, by convention, and that his proper remedy was by ejectment. The court below, on motion, quashed the writ of certiorari, and the case came here on error from that judgment. The case was heard on motion to dismiss or affirm. Justice Gray, for the court, said: "But, upon the merits of the case, the judgment below is so clearly right that the motion to affirm must be granted."

Harris v. Barber, 129 U. S. 368 (32: 699); District of Columbia v. Rapley, 6 Mackey, 534.

The adoption by courts of other jurisdictions of the lien theory in respect of mortgages and the incorporation of equitable doctrines into the common law as administered in many of the states (independently of or previous to the adoption of Codes), render the decisions of such states of little or no value in the present case.

It will thus be seen that by virtue of the common law as interpreted and applied in the District of Columbia, and also by the express contract contained in the deed of trust, the American Ice Company became, upon the execution and delivery of the deed, the tenant of the Eastern Trust & Banking Company, and, upon default, the latter became entitled to appeal to the proceedings provided for by the landlord and tenant act to obtain possession.

299] *Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

Sections 680–691 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, contained in chapter 19, entitled "Landlord and Tenant," are a re enactment of the act of Congress of July 4, 1864, entitled "An Act to Regulate Proceedings in Cases between Landlord and Tenants in the District of Columbia." 13 Stat. at L. 383, chap. 243.

By §§ 681 and 682 (re-enacting § 1 of the act of 1864) "a tenancy at will shall not arise or be created without an express contract or letting to that effect, and all occupation, possession, or holding of any messuage or real estate, without express contract or lease or by such contract or lease the terms of which have expired, shall be deemed and held to be tenancies by sufferance;" and "all estates at will and sufferance may be determined by a notice, in writing, to quit, of thirty days."

By § 684 (re-enacting § 2 of the act of 1864) "when forcible entry is made, or when a peaceable entry is made and the possession unlawfully held by force, or when possession is held without right, after the estate is determined by the terms of the lease by its own limitation, or by notice to quit, or otherwise," then "on written complaint on oath of the person entitled to the premises to a justice of the peace, charging such forcible entry or detainer of real estate, a summons may be issued to a proper officer commanding the person complained of to appear and show cause why judgment should not be rendered against him."

The statute further provides as follows: The summons shall be served at least seven days before the appearance of the party complained of. If it appears by default or upon trial that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the premises, he shall have judgment and execution for the possession and costs; if the plaintiff fails to prove his right to possession, the defendant shall have judgment and execution for his costs. If, upon trial, the defendant pleads title in himself, or in another person under whom he claims the premises, the case is *to be certified [300 to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and each party is to recognize to the other, the defendant "to pay all intervening damages and costs and reasonable intervening rent for the premises," and the plaintiff to enter the suit and to pay all costs adjudged against him. An appeal to the same court may be taken by either party against whom judgment is rendered by the justice of the peace. Rev. Stat. D. C. §§ 685 689; Act of July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 383, 384, chap. 243, §§ 2–4).

This plaintiff is the mortgagee of land in the District of Columbia, under a deed of trust to secure the payment of certain bonds, in instalments payable in successive years, with interest; and providing that until default the mortgagor shall be permitted to possess and enjoy the property, and to take and use the income, rents, issues, and profits thereof, "in the same manner, to the same extent, and to the same effect as if this deed had not been made;" but that, if any default be made, and be continued ninety days, the trustee may enter upon the property, and sell the same by public auction, or may pursue the ordinary remedy of foreclosure by entry or suit as authorized by law.

The mortgagor assigned the property to an assignee for the benefit of creditors; the assignee made a lease in writing thereof for a year at a monthly rent; default was made and continued for ninety days; and the mortgagee after giving the assignee and his lessee thirty days' notice to quit, instituted this process against them to recover possession under the landlord and tenant act of the District of Columbia.

The principal question presented by the record is whether, in a case like this, where there has been neither forcible entry nor detainer by force, a mortgagee entitled to possession after condition broken is within the scope and effect of the statute.

In Barber v. Harris (1888) 6 Mackey, 586, affirmed by this court in Harris v. Barber (1889) 129 U. S. 366 [32: 697], cited in support of the judgment below, this question was not and could not be decided. That case arose upon a writ of certiorari to a justice of the peace, 301] by which his judgment for *possession under the statute was sought to be set aside upon allegations that the plaintiff was a purchaser at a sale under a mortgage, and the conventional relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between the parties, and therefore the justice of the peace has no jurisdiction. The ground on which both the supreme court of the District of Columbia and this court declined to set aside the judgment of the justice of the peace was, that the existence of the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties, and the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace over the case, were sufficiently shown by general allegations in the complaint that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the premises and that they were detained from him and held without right by the defendant, tenant thereof by the sufferance of the plaintiff, and whose tenancy and estate therein had been determined by thirty days' notice to quit; and that these allegations could not be contradicted upon the writ of certiorari. See 6 Mackey, 594, 595, 129 U. S. 368, 371 [32: 699, 700].

In Jennings v. Webb (1892) 20 D. C. 317, 322, in which it was decided that one tenant in common could not maintain this form of proceeding against his cotenant, Justice Cox, speaking for Justices Hagner and James, as well as for himself, said: "There seems to be a little misapprehension of the nature of this proceeding. While our rule requires the plaintiff to file a declaration, as in ejectment, that does not convert the proceeding into an action of ejectment at all, in which the plaintiff recovers upon the strength of his title. In this proceeding, unless he establishes the relation of landlord between himself and the defendant no matter what the form of declaration is, he is not entitled to recover. I have always held that at special term, and that is the opinion that we entertain now. It is still a landlord and tenant proceeding."

In two earlier cases, a purchaser at a sale under a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage had been declared, by the supreme court of the District of Columbia in general term, to be entitled to maintain this proceeding against the mortgagor, who had remained in possession without the plaintiff's consent, and had been served with a thirty days' notice to quit. But in *the first of those cases this was wholly [302 obiter dictum, the appeal to the general term being dismissed because the judgment in special term was final; and in the other case no question appears to have been raised upon the construction of the statute. Luchs v. Jones (1874) 1 MacArth. 345; Fiske v. Bigelow (1876) 2 MacArth. 427.

Afterwards, in Loring v. Bartlett (1894) 4 App. D. C. 1, the court of appeals, speaking by Chief Justice Alvey, reversing a judgment of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and quoting from Birch v. Wright, 1 T. R. 378, 382, 383, refrained from expressing a definite opinion upon the question "whether the simple and ordinary relation of mortgagor and mortgagee involves the relation of landlord and tenant by implication of law, within the meaning and sense of the statute;" and maintained the suit, solely upon the ground that a provision in a trust deed to secure the payment of promissory notes, by which the mortgagee and her heirs and assigns were to be permitted "to use and occupy the said described premises, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof to take, have, and apply, to and for her and their sole use and benefit, until default be made in the payment of said notes or any of them," constituted a redemise from the mortgagee to the mortgagor, which would support a proceeding under the statute. The cases relied on in support of that decision were Georges Creek & I. Co. v. Detmold, 1 Md. 225, 236, and some English cases, all of which were ordinary actions of ejectment, and none of them under statutes like that now in question.

The decision in Loring v. Bartlett was followed by the court of appeals in the present case, without further discussion. 6 App. D. C. 375, 383.

Upon full consideration of the terms of the act of Congress, and in view of the existing state of the law in this country at the time of its passage, this court is unable to concur in the conclusion of the court of appeals.

The common saying that a mortgagor in possession is tenant at will to the mortgagee has been often recognized to be a most unsafe guide in defining the relation of mortgagee and *mortgagor, or in construing statutes [303 authorizing landlords to recover possession against their tenants by summary process before a justice of the peace.

In Moss v. Gallimore (1779) Lord Mansfield said: "A mortgagor is not properly tenant at will to the mortgagee, for he is not to pay him rent. He is so only quodam modo. Nothing is more apt to confound than a simile. When the court or counsel call a mortgagor a tenant at will it is barely a comparison. He is like a tenant at will. The mortgagor receives the rent by a tacit agreement with the mortgagee, but the mortgagee may put an end to this agreement when he pleases." 1 Dougl. 279, 282, 283. And in Birch v. Wright (1786) Mr. Justice Buller said: "He is not a tenant at will, because he is not entitled to the growing crops after the will is determined. He is not considered as a tenant at will in those proceedings which are in daily use between a mortgagor and mortgagee; I mean in ejectments brought for the recovery of the mortgaged lands." 1 T. R. 378, 383.

Under early statutes of the state of New York, providing that any tenant at will, or at sufferance, or for years, holding over without permission of his landlord after the expiration of his term, or after default in the payment of rent, might be removed from the possession upon a proceeding commenced by the landlord before a justice of the peace, it was constantly held by the supreme court of the state that a mortgagee could not maintain this process against a mortgagor in possession; and Chief Justice Savage said that for some purposes, indeed, the mortgagor, after condition broken, was considered as tenant to the mortgagee; but that the statute "was clearly designed to afford a speedy remedy where the conventional relation of landlord and tenant existed, and not where that relation is created by operation of law;" and "the legislature never intended that the mortgagee should have a right to proceed under this statute to obtain possession of the mortgaged premises after forfeiture." N. Y. Stat. of 1820, chap. 194; 2 Rev. Stat. of 1828, pt. 3, chap. 8, tit. 10, §§ 28 et seq.; Evertson v. Sutton (1830) 5 Wend. 281, 284 [21 Am. Dec. 217]; Roach v. Cosine (1832) 9 Wend. 227, 231, 232; Sims v. Humphrey (1847) 4 Denio, 185, 187; Benjamin v. Benjamin (1851) 5 N. Y. 383, 388; People, Mitchell, v. Simpson (1863) 28 N. Y. 55, 56.

304] *It is true, as has been heretofore observed by this court, that in the state of New York the courts of law had, by a gradual progress, adopted the views of courts of equity in relation to mortgages, and considered the mortgagor, whilst in possession and before foreclosure, as the real owner, except as against the mortgagee, and as having the right of possession, even as against the mortgagee; whereas, by the law of Maryland, prevailing in the District of Columbia, the legal estate is considered as vested in the mortgagee, and, as soon as the estate in mortgage is created, the mortgagee may enter into possession, though he seldom avails himself of that right. Van Ness v. Hyatt, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 294, 299 [10: 168, 170].

But the mortgagee has been equally held not to be entitled to maintain against the mortgagor a summary landlord and tenant process in states where, as in New England, the mortgagee is held to be the owner of the legal title. 1 Jones, Mortg. § 58.

The Revised Statutes of Massachusetts of 1836, chap. 104, §§ 2, 4-9, contained provisions very similar to those of §§ 2-4 of the act of Congress of July 4, 1864, as to the cases in which and the persons by and against whom the proceedings might be instituted, the service of summons, the form of judgment, and the removal of the case, by certificate or by appeal, into a court of record.

In that chapter of the Massachusetts statutes of 1836, § 2 was as follows: "When any forcible entry shall be made, or when an entry shall be made in a peaceable manner, and the possession shall be unlawfully held by force, and also when the lessee of any lands or tenements, or any person holding under such lessee, shall hold possession of the demised premises, without right, after the determination of the lease, either by its own limitation, or by a notice to quit, as provided in the 60th chapter" (§ 26 of which provided that estates at will might be terminated by either party by notice of three months, or by the landlord by fourteen days' notice in case of nonpayment of rent), "the person entitled to the premises may *be restored to the possession thereof, in[305 the manner hereinafter provided." And by § 4, "the person entitled to the possession of the premises" might obtain from a justice of the peace a summons to answer to a complaint charging the defendant with being in possession of the land in question, and holding it unlawfully and against the right of the plaintiff.

It was the settled construction of that statute by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, that a mortgagee, even after he had entered for the purpose of foreclosure, could not maintain an action against his mortgagor to recover possession of the mortgaged premises. "Whilst the parties stood in the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee," said Chief Justice Shaw, "the defendant was not lessee, within the meaning of this statute. A mortgagor in possession is sometimes in a loose sense said to be tenant at will to the mortgagee. But he is not liable to rent, or to account for rents and profits; these he holds to his own use. He is like a tenant at will because the mortgagee may enter upon the estate at his will, if he can do so peaceably, when not restrained by covenant." Larned v. Clarke (1851) 8 Cush. 29, 31. And again: "The present statute contemplates three cases in which this process will lie: 1, forcible entry; 2, forcible detainer; 3, a tenant holding against his landlord, either (1) after the determination of a lease by its own limitation; or (2) after the expiration of a notice to quit duly given; or (3) after a notice of fourteen days, for nonpayment of rent. . . . In the present case, the proof shows no forcible entry, no forcible detainer, no holding over of a tenant of demised premises. These are the only cases contemplated in this statute in which this summary process will lie. Although, in a loose sense, a mortgagor in possession is said to be tenant at will of the mortgagee, yet he is not within the reason or the letter of the Revised Statutes, chap. 104, § 2. He is not lessee, or holding under a lessee, or holding demised premises without right after the determination of the lease. The remedies of a mortgagee are altogether of a different character, clearly marked out by law." Hastings v. Pratt (1851) [306 8 Cush. 121, 123. See also Dakin v. Allen (1851) 8 Cush. 33; Gerrish v. Mason (1855) 4 Gray, 432.

In chapter 137 of the General Statutes of Massachusetts of 1860, the provisions of the Revised Statutes of 1836, above mentioned, were substantially re-enacted, § 2 being put in the following form: "When a forcible entry is made, or when a peaceable entry is made and the possession unlawfully held by force, or when the lessee of land or tenements, or a person holding under such lessee, holds possession without right after the determination of the lease by its own limitation, or by notice to quit, or otherwise, the person entitled to the premises may be restored to the possession in the manner herelnafter provided." The words "or otherwise" were apparently added in that section, because of its having been decided, under the earlier statute, that "the determlnation of the lease by its own limitation" did not include its determination by the lessor's entry for breach of a condition in the lease. Fifty Associates v. Howland (1846) 11 Met. 99; Whitwell v. Harris (1871) 106 Mass. 532.

By § 5 of the statute of 1860 "the person entitled to the possession of the premises" may obtain from a justice of the peace a summons "to answer to the complaint of the plaintiff, for that the defendant is in possession of the lands, . . . which he holds unlawfully and against the right of the plaintiff."

The provision, above quoted, of the statute of 1860, which defines the circumstances under which this summary process may be commenced before a justice of the peace, is almost exactly like the corresponding provision of the act of Congress of 1864. as will appear by putting the two together, with those words of the Massachusetts statute which have been omitted in the act of Congress printed in italics, and the words added in the act of Congress inclosed in brackets, as follows: "When a forcible entry is made, or when a peaceable entry is made and the possession unlawfully held by force, or when the lessee of land or tenements, or a person holding under such lessee, holds possession [is held] without right after the determination [estate is determined by the terms] of the lease by its own limitation, or by notice to quit or otherwise."

307] *This provision, as incorporated in the act of Congress, though somewhat condensed in form, is essentially in the same words, and of precisely the same meaning, as the provision of the statute of Massachusetts. While it omits the words "the lessee or the tenements, or a person holding under such lessee," it still, like the Massachusetts statute (in cases where there is neither forcible entry nor forcible detainer), is restricted to cases in which "the lease" has been determined, and differs in this respect from the provision in the 1st section of the act of Congress, which defines tenancies by sufferance.

The statute of Massachusetts and the act of Congress resemble each other in many other respects. Each authorizes "the person entitled to the premises" to recover possession by complaint to a justice of the peace. Each authorizes the complaint to be in general terms; in Massachusetts, alleging that the defendant is in possession of the land, and holds it unlawfully and against the right of the plaintiff; in the District of Columbia, "charging a forcible entry or detainer of real estate." Each requires the summons to be served seven days before appearance. The provisions as to the form of the judgment of the justice of the peace for either party are exactly alike in both statutes. Each statute provides that when the title is put in issue, the case may be certified to a court of record; that from any judgment of the justice of the peace an appeal may be taken by either party to that court; and that upon such removal, either by certificate or by the defendant's appeal, the defendant shall recognize to the plaintiff, with sufficient securities, to pay intervening rent and damages. Mass. Gen. Stat. of 1860, chap. 137, §§ 6-10; Act of July 4, 1864, chap. 243, §§ 2-4; Rev. Stat. D. C. §§ 684-689.

The resemblance between the provisions of the Massachusetts Statute of 1860 and of the act of Congress of 1864 is so remarkable that it is evident that the latter were taken from the former. This being so, the known and settled construction, which those statutes had received in Massachusetts before the original enactment of the act of Congress, must be considered as having been adopted by Congress with the text thus expounded. Tucker* v. Oxley, 9 U.[308 S. 5 Cranch, 34, 42 [3: 29, 31]; Pennock v. Dialogue, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 1, 18 [7: 327, 333]; Metropolitan Railroad Co. v. Moore, 121 U. S. 558, 572 [30: 1022, 1026]; Warner v. Texas & Pacific Railway Co. 164 U. S. 418, 423 [41: 495, 500]. In Metropolitan Railroad Co. v. Moore, just cited, where provisions of statutes of New York, regulating judicial procedure, had been incorporated by Congress, in substantially the same language, in the legislation concerning the District of Columbia, it was held that Congress must be presumed to have adopted those provisions as then understood in New York and already construed by the courts of that state, and not as affected by the previous practice in Maryland or in the courts of the District of Columbia.

Before the passage of the act of Congress of 1864, the supreme judicial court of Maine had held that a mortgagee could not proceed against his mortgagor under a statute of that state, the leading sections of which provided that "a process of forcible entry and detainer may be commenced against a disseisor, who has not acquired any claim by possession and improvement; and against a tenant holding under a written lease or contract, or person holding under such tenant, at the expiration or forfeiture of the term, without notice; . . . and against a tenant at will, whose tenancy has been terminated" by notice to quit, in which last case "the tenant shall be liable to the process aforesaid without further notice and without proof of any relation of landlord and tenant." Me. Rev. Stat. of 1857, chap. 94; Reed v. Elwell (1858) 46 Me. 270, 278, 279; Dunning v. Finson (1859) 46 Me. 546, 553. See also Sawyer v. Hanson (1845) 24 Me. 542; Clement v. Bennett (1879) 70 Me. 207.

Similar opinions have been expressed in cases arising in other states under statutes differing in language, but having the same general purpose. Davis v. Hemenway (1855) 27 Vt. 589; McCombs v. Wallace (1872) 66 N. C. 481; Greer v. Wilbar (1875) 72 N. C. 592; Necklace v. West (1878) 33 Ark. 682; Nightingale v. Barens (1879) 47 Wis. 389; Steele v. Bond (1881) 28 Minn. 267; Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy R. Co. v. Skupa (1884) 16 Neb. 341. We have not been referred to, and are not aware of, a single case in any state in which a summary *process of this kind has been[309 maintained by a mortgagee against his mortgagor, unless specifically given by distinct provision in the statute.

The view which has been generally, if not universally, entertained by the courts of the several states upon this subject has been well expressed by the supreme court of Minnesota in Steele v. Bond, above cited, as follows: "The act concerning forcible entries and unlawful detainers, so far as it affords a remedy for landlords against tenants who unlawfully detain the premises after a default in the payment of the rent, or the expiration of the term, must be construed as similar acts have always been construed by the courts of other states, to apply only to the conventional relation of landlord and tenant. It was not intended as a substitute for the action of ejectment, nor to afford means of enforcing agreements to surrender possession of real estate, where that relation does not exist or has not existed. The foundation fact upon which the jurisdiction rests is that the tenant is in possession of the land in consequence and by virtue of that relation, and unlawfully withholds possession after a default in the performance of the terms upon which he entered, or after his term has expired." 28 Minn. 273.

Considering the terms of the act of Congress, the settled construction, before the passage of that act, of the statute of Massachusetts from which it appears to have been taken, and the general course of decision in this country under statutes on the same subject, the reasonable conclusion is that, in order to sustain this form of proceeding, the conventional relation of landlord and tenant must exist or have existed between the parties.

A mortgagee holds no such relation to a mortgagor in possession. The mortgagor, though loosely called a tenant at will of the mortgagee, is such in no other sense than that his possession may be put an end to whenever the mortgagee pleases. Lord Mansfield, in Moss v. Gallimore, 1 Dougl. 279, 283; Lord Selborne, in Lows v. Telford, 1 App. Cas. 414, 426; Shaw, Ch. J., in Larned v. Clarke, 8 Cush. 29, 31; Carroll v. Ballance, 26 Ill. 9, 19 [79 Am. Dec. 354]. The mortgagee may take pos-310]session *at any time; but, so long as there has been no breach of condition of the mortgage, this right is rarely exercised, and the mortgagor is usually permitted, by oral or tacit agreement with the mortgagee, or by express stipulation in the mortgage, to remain in possession. 2 Bl. Com. 158; Moss v. Gallimore, above cited; Colman v. Packard, 16 Mass. 39; Flagg v. Flagg, 11 Pick. 475, 477; Jamieson v. Bruce, 6 Gill & J. 72, 75; Van Ness v. Hyatt, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 294, 299 [10: 168, 170]. Until the mortgagee takes actual possession, the mortgagor is not liable, without an express covenant to that effect, to pay rent, and is entitled to take the rents and profits to his own use. Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242, 248-251 [28: 415, 418, 419], and cases cited; Freedmen's Saving & T. Co. v. Shepherd, 127 U. S. 494, 502 [32: 163, 167]; Larned v. Clarke, above cited.

When the mortgagor remains in possession with the assent of the mortgagee, without formal agreement, no one would think of saying that there was a lease from the mortgagee to the mortgagor, or that the relation of landlord and tenant existed between them. An express stipulation in the mortgage, that the mortgagor may remain in possession until breach of condition, is intended merely to put in definite and binding form the understanding of the parties as to the exercise of their rights as mortgagor and mortgagee, and not to create between them a distinct relation of tenant and landlord. Anderson v. Strauss, 98 Ill 485.

That such was the understanding and intention of the parties to the deed of trust in this case is apparent from its terms, by which the American Ice Company mortgages all its real estate, wharves, ice houses, and other buildings and machinery; and it is provided that, until default, the mortgagor "shall be permitted and suffered to possess, manage, develop, operate, and enjoy the plant and property herein conveyed, and intended so to be, and to take and use the income, rents, issues, and profits thereof, in the same manner, to the same extent, and with the same effect, as if this deed had not been made."

The result is, that the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain this process, but must be left, so far as the aid of a court of *justice is [311 requisite to secure the rights conferred by the mortgage, to the appropriate remedy of a writ of ejectment, or a bill of foreclosure. Comp. Stat. D. C. chap. 48, § 1; chap. 55, § 10; Hogan v. Kurtz, 94 U. S. 773 [24: 317]; Hughes v. Edwards, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 489 [6: 142].

Judgment of the Court of Appeals reversed, and case remanded with directions to affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Virginia statute as to liability of carrier—not a regulation of interstate commerce—duty of carrier.

1. The statute of Virginia (Va. Code 1887, § 1295), that "when a common carrier accepts for transportation anything directed to a point of destination beyond his own line he shall be deemed thereby to assume an obligation for its safe carriage to such point of destination, unless, at the time of such acceptance, such carrier be released or exempted from such liability by contract in writing signed by the owner or his agent,"—is not a regulation of interstate commerce and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or void.

2. The remote effect upon commerce, resulting from the lawful exercise by a state of its power to determine the form in which contracts may

Submitted January 4, 1898. Decided February 21, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia to review a judgment affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of the City of Richmond in favor of the R. A. Patterson Tobacco Company, plaintiff, against the Richmond & Alleghany Railroad Company et al., for the value of certain tobacco delivered by the plaintiff to said railroad company to be carried to Bayou Sara, Louisiana, from the city of Richmond, which tobacco was lost. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. T. Wickham and Henry Taylor, Jr., for plaintiffs in error:

Where the subject of a contract is the transportation of articles of commerce from one state to another, the sole and exclusive power to prescribe its terms is vested by the Constitution in Congress, and no power is left in the state by which it can make any regulation; and nonaction on the part of Congress, where the subject is national in its character or admits of uniformity of regulation, means that there shall be no regulation by the state.

Mr. A. W. Patterson for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

In August, 1888, the Patterson Tobacco Company delivered to the Richmond & Alleghany Railroad, which was then in the hands of receivers, a lot of tobacco consigned to Mann and Levy, Bayou Sara, Louisiana. On receiving the tobacco the railroad issued a bill of lading whereby it was expressly stipulated that it should only be liable for the transportation of the goods over its own line, and beyond this was to be responsible solely as a forwarder, that is to say, that all its obligations should be discharged if it safely carried the goods over its own road, and delivered them to a connecting carrier. The limitations on this subject in the bill of lading were full and clear, and there is no question that if the rights of the parties are to be measured by the terms of the bill of lading that the carrier was not liable for a loss happening beyond its line. When this shipment was made there was no law of the state of Virginia forbidding or purporting to forbid a carrier, in receiving goods for interstate shipment, from restricting its liability in accordance with the tenor of the bill of lading in question. In fact, the supreme court of appeals of Virginia in this case expressly held that the Virginia law sanctions a contract made by a carrier to that effect. The bill of lading for the tobacco, issued as above stated, was not signed by the shipper, although at the time the freight was received and when the bill was issued the Code of Virginia contained the following provisions:

"When a common carrier accepts for transportation anything directed to a point of destination beyond the terminus of his own line or route, he shall be deemed thereby to assume an obligation for its safe carriage to such point of destination, unless, at the time of such acceptance, such carrier be released or exempted from such liability by contract in writing signed by the owner or his agent, and, although there be such contract in writing, if such thing be lost or injured, such common carrier shall himself be liable therefor, unless, within a reasonable time after demand made, he shall give satisfactory proof *to the [313 consignor that the loss or injury did not occur while the thing was in his charge." § 1295, Virginia Code of 1887.

The tobacco not having been delivered to the consignees, the shippers sued the Richmond & Alleghany Railroad for the value thereof, on the assumption that the railroad was responsible as a common carrier for the nondelivery. The corporation relied for its defense on the contract embodied in the bill of lading, and on the fact that the tobacco had been duly transferred to a connecting carrier, and was thereafter lost. The case was submitted to the trial court on an agreed statement, admitting the receipt of the goods, the issue of the bill of lading, the fact that it was not signed by the shipper, and the loss of the tobacco beyond the lines of the defendant. The plaintiff rested on the statute above quoted, and the defendant company on its claim that the statute was a regulation of interstate commerce and therefore in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. The trial court held the railroad liable, and from a judgment of the supreme court of appeals of the state of Virginia, affirming its action, this writ of error is prosecuted.

The supreme court of appeals of Virginia in its able opinion, and the counsel of both parties at bar, conceded that an attempt on the part of a state to prohibit a carrier, as to an interstate shipment, from limiting its liability to its own lines would be a regulation of interstate commerce, and therefore void. We shall therefore not examine this question, but shall proceed to a consideration of the case without expressing any opinion upon it. It is manifest that the statute of the state of Virginia in question does not attempt to substantially regulate or control contracts as to interstate shipments, but simply establishes a rule of evidence ordaining the character of proof by which a carrier may show that although it received goods for transportation beyond its own line, nevertheless, by agreement, its liability was limited to its own line. That this is the sole purpose of the statute seems too plain for anything but statement. It leaves the carrier free to make such limitation as to liability on an interstate shipment beyond its own line as it may deem proper, provided 314] only the *evidence of the contract is in writing and signed by the shipper. The distinction between a law which forbids a contract to be made and one which simply requires the contract when made to be embodied in a particular form is as obvious as is the difference between the sum of the obligations of a contract and the mere instrument by which their existence may be manifested. The contract is the concrete result of the meeting of the minds of the contracting parties. The evidence thereof is but the instrument by which the fact that the will of the parties did meet is shown.

The failure to bear this plain distinction in mind is the fallacy which is involved in all the contentions which are pressed by the plaintiff in error. It is of course elementary that where the object of a contract is the transportation of articles of commerce from one state to another that no power is left in the states to burden or forbid it; but this does not imply that, because such want of power obtains, there is also no authority on the part of the several states to create rules of evidence governing the form in which such contracts when entered into within their borders may be made, at least, until Congress, by general legislation, has undertaken to govern the subject. But it is said, although the learned court below announced, as an abstract principle, that under the law of Virginia a carrier was free when receiving an interstate shipment, to limit his liability to his own line, the conclusion reached by the court was inconsistent with this ruling, and, in effect, substantially repudiated its correctness. The line of reasoning by which this proposition is supported is this: If there had been no statute, it is said, the court admitted that the terms of the bill of lading would have exempted the carrier from liability beyond its own line, but by applying the statute to the bill of lading it did not so exempt the carrier, therefore the statute was so enforced as to prevent the carrier from contracting, and hence its application negatived the power to contract for such exemption. But the inconsequence is in the argument of the plaintiff in error and not in the reasoning or the conclusion of the court. The inadequacy of the bill of lading to protect the carrier from liability beyond *its own line resulted, it is true, [315 from the statute, but not because the statute forbade the carrier from contracting so as to limit his liability, but because the contract which he did make was not in the form required by law, and therefore was not evidence that there was such a contract. Indeed, the entire argument upon which it is asserted that error was committed by the court below but manifests in varying forms of statement the fallacy already noticed, that is, it comes from obscuring the difference between substance and form, between a power to contract and the asserted right in availing of the authority, to disregard the requisites essential to show a valid contract, and this confusion of thought also marks the difference between the case now presented and the very many adjudged cases cited by the plaintiff in error in support of its proposition.

Of course, in a latitudinarian sense any restriction as to the evidence of a contract, relating to interstate commerce, may be said to be a limitation on the contract itself. But this remote effect, resulting from the lawful exercise by a state of its power to determine the form in which contracts may be proved, does not amount to a regulation of interstate commerce. The principle on this subject has been often stated by this court, and, indeed, has been quite recently so fully reviewed and applied that further elaboration becomes unnecessary. In the case of Chicago, M. & St. P. Railway Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133 [ante, 688], it was said (p. 138 [ante, 693]):

"They are not, in themselves, regulations of interstate commerce, although they control, in some degree, the conduct and the liability of those engaged in such commerce. So long as Congress has not legislated upon the particular subject, they are rather to be regarded as legislation in aid of such commerce, and as a rightful exercise of the police power of the state to regulate the relative rights and duties of all persons and corporations within its limits. Such are the grounds upon which it has been held to be within the power of the state to require the engineers and other persons engaged in the driving or management of all railroad trains passing through the state to submit to an *examination by a local board as [316 to their fitness for their positions; or to prescribe the mode of heating passenger cars in such trains. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465 [31: 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804]; Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96 [32: 352, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 238]; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628 [41: 853]. See also Western U. Telegraph Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650 [40: 1105]; Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299 [41: 166]; Gladson v. Minnesota, 166 U. S. 427 [41: 1064]."

These views dispose of the substantial questions which the case presents, for the contention which arises on the concluding sentences of the statute, imposing upon a carrier a duty where the loss has not happened on the carrier's own line to inform the shipper of this fact, is but a regulation manifestly within the power of the state to adopt.

Affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
DIXON N. GARLINGER.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 316-323.)

Pay of night inspector—extra pay—treasury regulations—payments, when deemed to be in full.

1. A night inspector in the customs service, who serves both night watches and is not excused from duty the succeeding night, is not entitled to double pay under the Treasury Regulations of 1877; no implied contract arises for full pay for both watches.
2. Under U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 1764, 1765, no officer can receive extra pay unless the same is authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor expressly states it to be for additional pay.
3. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot, by his regulations dividing a day's service into parts, attach to each part the pay for a full day's work.
4. Payments of compensation to a government employee, frequently made, for a considerable period of time, and received without objection or protest, when there is no pretense of fraud or of duress, will be deemed to be in full, and will preclude any subsequent claim for extra services.

Argued January 4, 5, 1898. Decided February 21, 1898.

APPEAL from a decree of the Court of Claims in favor of the claimant Dixon H Garlinger, against the United States for extra services rendered by him as night inspector in the customs service. Reversed, and cause remanded with directions to dismiss the action.

See same case below, 30 Ct. Cl. 208.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

This was an action brought by Dixon N. Garlinger, in the court of claims, against the United States, wherein he sought to recover for alleged extra service rendered by him while in the employ of the United States. The trial court found the facts to be as follows:

I. The claimant, a citizen of the United States, was appointed by the collector of the port of Baltimore a night inspector in the customs service at Baltimore in 1882. He took the oath of office and entered upon the discharge of the duties of night inspector of customs on April 1, 1882, and continued in office until August 25, 1886, a period of 1,608 days.

II. During the above-named period the claimant was paid for 1,608 days, of which 1,353 payments were for night service when he was present rendering actual service, and 255 were for night service when he was absent and off duty.

III. During the 1,353 days of night service the claimant was required to perform duty as night inspector from sunset to sunrise and until relieved by the day inspector, the length of the night service consequently varying, and sometimes extending from 5 P. M. of one day until 10 A. M. of the succeeding day. During this time the claimant was not allowed to be off duty on the succeeding night, after having been on duty two watches, except in the 255 instances set forth in finding II., when he was off duty and received pay. That is to say he performed the duties of both the first and second watch on 1,098 nights without additional compensation and without being allowed to be off duty on any alternate night.

IV. The petition not having been filed until August 24, 1888, 144 days of the number last above stated are barred by the statute of limitations, leaving 954 days as the subject of the present suit.

V. The claimant objected to his superior officer, the surveyor of the port, against his being required to perform the duties of both watches in one night without being excused *from the performance of duty on the [318 following night, and he subsequently remonstrated at various times.

VI. At the time of his entering the service as night inspector he was furnished by his superior officers with a copy of the regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury for his governance and defining his duties. It was customary for the surveyor of the port to furnish such regulations to inspectors and others at the time of their entering the customs service. The regulations hereinafter quoted were among those so given to the claimant.

VII. The Laws and Regulations for the Government of Officers of Customs under the Superintendence and Direction of Surveyor of Ports, 1877, were issued by the Secretary of the Treasury to the customhouse authorities of all ports, including the port of Baltimore, and were in operation in all of the principal ports, except Baltimore, in which the practice of the port at the time of the claimant's appointment was not, and had not been, in accordance with the requirement of the regulations making two night watches and relieving the first watch at midnight. There the surveyor of the port had always required the night inspectors to serve from sunset to sunrise.

VIII. The following are among the regulations given to the claimant when he entered the service, above referred to:

"Art. 420. The night watchmen shall be divided into two watches, as nearly equal as possible, both watches to perform duty every night. The surveyor of the port will, however, make such changes in the division of the watches as he may deem expedient, and will appoint the hours of duty for the different watches.

"Whenever it is necessary to assign a night watchman to a vessel, or to any other 'all-night' charge, the night watchman so assigned must remain on the vessel, or on his charge, until relieved, and he will be excused from performing any duty the following night.

As to limitation of time to present claims, see note to Waddell v. United States (Ct. Cl.) 7 L. R. A. 861.

"Night watchmen must not quit their charge on being relieved without first making 319] their presence personally known *to the officer relieving them. Night watchmen, when on duty, must wear their official badge."

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, the court decided, as a conclusion of law, that the claimant was entitled to recover $2,862.

Messrs. George Hines Gorman and Louis A. Pradt, Assistant Attorney General, for appellant.

Messrs. L. T. Michener, F. P. Deweese, W. W. Dudley, and R. R. McMahon for appellee.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

Dixon N. Garlinger, the plaintiff in the court below, was employed by the collector of the port of Baltimore as a night inspector in the customs service from April 1, 1882, till August 25, 1886. For his services he was entitled to be paid $3 per day for each day's work actually performed; and it is a conceded fact that he was so paid for each and every day he was in the service.

Two years after he ceased to be so employed he brought this action, claiming to recover additional compensation, and recovered a judgment for the sum of $2,862.

The plaintiff based his claim for additional pay upon two grounds, viz., that by the laws and regulations for the government of officers of customs under the superintendence and direction of surveyors of ports, issued in 1877 by the Secretary of the Treasury, it was, among other things, provided as follows: "The night watchmen shall be divided into two watches, as nearly equal as possible, both watches to perform duty every night. The surveyor of the port will, however, make such changes in the division of the watches as he may deem expedient, and will appoint the hours of duty for the different watches. Whenever it is necessary to assign a night watchman to a vessel, or to any other 'all-night' charge, the night watchman so assigned 320] must remain on the vessel, or *on his charge, until relieved, and he will be excused from performing any duty the following night;" and that, in disregard of this regulation, and of his objections and remonstrances, he was required to perform the duties of both watches in some nights, without being excused from the performance of duty on the following nights.

It is contended that, from these facts, the law will imply a contract between the claimant and the United States, whereby the former will be entitled to be paid for both watches, as if they constituted two days' service.

On the part of the United States it is claimed that the regulation quoted did not constitute an express contract of employment between the parties; that the facts negative any notion of an implied promise to pay any additional sum beyond the statutory rate of $3 per day; that, even if a breach of contract were shown, no recovery could be had beyond the sum already paid; that there is no obligation on the United States because such a regulation, if it is to receive the construction placed upon it by the court below, is in conflict with the law, and therefore null and void; that the construction placed upon the regulation by the court is erroneous; that the regulations of 1877 were repealed and ceased to be in force at any time after March 24, 1883, by reason of subsequent regulations, which should have been applied by the court below.

Section 2733 of the Revised Statutes, under the authority of which the claimant was employed, was as follows:

"Each inspector shall receive, for every day he shall be actually employed in aid of the customs, three dollars; and for every other person that the collector may find it necessary and expedient to employ, as occasional inspector, or in any other way in aid of the revenue, a like sum, when actually so employed, not exceeding three dollars for every day so employed."

Section 1764 of the Revised Statutes provides that "no allowance or compensation shall be made for any extra service whatever, which any officer or clerk may be required to perform, unless expressly authorized by law;" *and [321 § 1765, that "no officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary, pay, or emoluments are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or for any other service or duty whatever, unless the same is authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly states that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation."

Of these provisions, while they were part of the act of August 23, 1842 (5 Stat. at L. 508, chap. 183), and before they were carried into the Revised Statutes, it was said by this court, in Hoyt v. United States, 51 U. S. 10 How. 141 [13: 361]: "It [this statute] cuts up by the roots these claims by public officers for extra compensation, on the ground of extra services. There is no discretion left in any officer or tribunal to make the allowance, unless it is authorized by some law of Congress. The prohibition is general, and applies to all public officers, or quasi-public officers, who have a fixed compensation."

Many cases to the same effect, construing these provisions, are collected in United States v. King, 147 U. S. 676 [37: 328], and in Mullett's Administratrix v. United States, 150 U. S. 566 [37: 1184], where it was said that, "obviously, the purpose of Congress, as disclosed by these sections, was that every officer or regular employee of the government should be limited in his compensation to such salary or fees as were by law specifically attached to his office or employment. 'Extras,' which are such a fruitful subject of disputes in private contracts, were to be eliminated from the public service."

We are unable to accept the contention that it was competent for the Secretary of the Treasury, by passing regulations, dividing a day's service into parts, to attach to each part the pay for a full day's work. By the word "day" in § 2733, Congress evidently meant the calendar day; and the purpose of Congress in prescribing the pay of $3 for every day, and in forbidding any allowance or compensation for extra services, would be defeated if the regulation in question were to be construed as providing that a period of twenty-four hours might be so divided as to justify two or 322] more payments,* to the same person, of the amount fixed for the daily compensation.

Nor do we think that such a construction can be properly given to the regulation in question. Nothing is said therein of double pay in case the officer serves both watches. In such a case, the provision is that he will be excused from performing any duty the following night. This express provision negatives the inference that if he serves an all-night watch he will be entitled to double pay, and it certainly does not afford a ground on which to base an implied contract for full pay for both watches.

United States v. Martin, 94 U. S. 400 [24: 128], does not help this claimant's case, for there the court was construing a statute of Congress declaring that eight hours should constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics. Rev. Stat. § 3738. It is not pretended that the present claimant falls within the provisions of that statute. He stands only on the regulation already quoted, and which must be interpreted in such a way as to consist with the statutes mentioned.

It is not found that the claimant himself ever demanded, during the period of his service, the compensation he now seeks. What he complained of was that, after he had performed an all-night service, he was not excused from duty the following night. He was not employed for any specific period, and was at liberty to quit the service if he thought the duties too onerous. He, however, elected to remain during the period above mentioned, and to receive the compensation awarded him by the collector, without any protest as to its insufficiency. It may be fairly presumed that the collector, in paying, and the claimant, in accepting, the money paid, supposed that the payments were in full. Such a course of conduct, we think, brings this claimant within the principle of well-settled cases, that the receipt of payment, purporting to be in full, where there is no fraud or coercion, cannot afterwards be repudiated as insufficient. Baker v. Nachtrieb, 60 U. S. 19 How. 126 [15: 528]; United States v. Childs, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 232 [20: 360]; De Arnaud v. United States, 151 U. S. 483 [38: 244].

Such a principle is especially applicable to the transaction of the government, whose ex- 323] penditures are met by legislative *appropriations. We do not want to be understood as saying that the mere fact of receiving money in payment will estop a creditor. But where, as in this case, the payments were made frequently, through a considerable period of time, and were received without objection or protest, and where there is no pretense of fraud, or of circumstances constituting duress, it is legitimate to infer that such payments were made and received on the understanding of both parties that they were in full. Such a presumption is very much strengthened by the lapse of two years before the appellee thought fit to make any demand.

These views sufficiently dispose of the case, and render it unnecessary to consider the other contentions urged on behalf of the government.

The decree of the Court of Claims is reversed, and the cause is remanded to that court with directions to dismiss the claimant's petition.

RANSOM PAYNE, Appt.,
v.
W. S. ROBERTSON et al.

Entering lands in Oklahoma.

A deputy marshal who was in Oklahoma territory as an employee of the government just prior to and at the moment of time when the land first became legally open for settlement was disqualified from entering upon and claiming lands therein as a homestead under § 13 of the act of March 2, 1889, which forbids any person who entered upon and occupied said lands before they were open for settlement from entering any of said lands or acquiring any right thereto.

Submitted January 17, 1898. Decided February 28, 1898.

APPEAL from a decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Oklahoma affirming the decree of the District Court for the County of Logan, First Judicial District, in said Territory, dismissing a suit in equity brought by Ransom Payne, plaintiff, against W. S. Robertson et al. to obtain a decree that defendants might be devested of the legal title to land and that it be vested in the plaintiff. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice White:

Payne, the appellant here, filed his bill of complaint in the district court for the county of Logan and territory of Oklahoma, first judicial district, against the present appellees. It was averred in the bill that prior to the passage of the act of Congress of March 2, 1889, providing for opening the Oklahoma lands for settlement, the complainant had been *duly [324 appointed and qualified as a deputy marshal of the United States, and that after the proclamation of the President, on March 23, 1889, declaring that said lands would be open to settlement after noon of the 22d of April, 1889, complainant, in pursuance of orders of his superior officer, the marshal of the United States for the district of Kansas, went into the territory, to the locality where the United States land office at Guthrie was located, for the purpose of preserving public order. That being rightfully in said territory and possessed of all the qualifications required by the act of Congress to authorize an entry of lands in such territory for the purpose of a homestead, complainant, after 12 o'clock noon of said April 22, 1889, settled upon a named quarter section of land, at once commenced digging a well thereon, and claimed the same as his homestead, and that on the next day he duly entered said tract of land at the United States land office in Guthrie, paid the necessary charges and expenses connected with such entry, and thereafter fully complied with all other requirements of the homestead law. Though the bill averred that at the time of his going into the territory to perform the duties of deputy marshal, complainant "had formed no purpose or intention in regard to selecting and taking a homestead when said lands should be duly opened to settlement," nevertheless it was averred elsewhere in the bill, that in reliance on certain opinions and assurances of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, claimed to have been communicated to parties similarly situated as was the complainant, to the effect that persons so situated were not disqualified from entering a homestead when the lands became opened to settlement, complainant remained in the territory and made the settlement in question. It was further averred that, subsequent to such entry and settlement, the defendant Fitzgerald went upon and claimed said tract of land as a homestead, and that other parties, by force and against the notice and warning of the complainant, proceeded to stake off and occupy a large portion thereof as a town site in violation of law and of the prior superior homestead rights of the complainant. It was also averred that on May 9, 1889, the town-site claimants instituted proceedings in the United States land office at Guthrie, Oklahoma, to obtain a cancelation of the homestead entry of complainant, and that ultimately such entry was canceled, the Secretary of the Interior approving the action of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in ordering such cancelation, on the ground that complainant was disqualified by his presence in the territory prior to the time fixed in the proclamation of the President, from making 325] the entry. It was further averred *that subsequently the Secretary of the Interior, in pursuance of the provision of the act of May 14, 1890, chap. 207, appointed the defendants Robertson, Foster, and Schnell to prove up and enter the tract of land claimed for a town site, in trust for the inhabitants of a town to be called East Guthrie, and that after final entry by such trustees a patent of the United States was duly issued to them, which it was claimed vested in said defendants the legal title to the land covered by the patent.

In conclusion, complainant averred that he had done all things required by law in order to be entitled to a final patent, and that he was the equitable owner of the land claimed by him; that the Secretary of the Interior had misapplied and misconstrued the law in canceling the entry of complainant; and he prayed that the town-site trustees might be devested of the legal title to the tract in question and it be vested in complainant. The bill was demurred to upon various grounds, and the demurrer being sustained a decree was thereupon entered dismissing the bill. On appeal, this decree was affirmed by the supreme court of the territory, and from the decree of affirmance an appeal was taken to this court.

Messrs. S. D. Luckett, John W. Daniel, Henry N. Copp, and Amos Green for appellant.

Messrs. John K. Richards, Solicitor General, Bayard T. Hainer, and Horace Speed for appellees.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

*In sustaining the demurrer the lower [326 courts passed upon but one of the grounds stated therein, namely, that which asserted that the complaint did not set forth a cause of action. This contention went to the merits of the case and called for a decision of the question whether the Secretary of the Interior, upon the facts found by him, properly held that Payne was disqualified from making his alleged entry. As this is the pivotal point in the case, and its decision is free from difficulty, we shall confine ourselves, in this opinion, to its consideration.

The ruling of the Secretary of the Interior that the settlement made by complainant was invalid is averred in the bill to have been based upon the following finding of facts:

"Ransom Payne made homestead entry for the N. W. ¼ of section nine (9) on April 23, 1889. Said Ransom Payne was a United States deputy marshal, duly appointed prior to the passage of the act of March 2, 1889 (16 C. L. O. 10, 11), providing for the opening of the territory of Oklahoma to settlement, and prior to the proclamation of the President fixing the day for said opening, and he entered said territory prior to April 22, and was there at noon of that day in obedience to orders issued by his superior officer, and he was there in the discharge of his official duties. Immediately after 12 o'clock noon of April 22 he went upon the land in question and commenced to dig a hole in the ground for a well, and as soon as practicable appeared at the local office and made his entry. So far as his age, citizenship, etc., are concerned he was a qualified homestead claimant, and he bases his claim upon his prior settlement."

The statute which it is claimed was misconstrued and misapplied by the Secretary of the Interior in his decision sustaining the cancelation of Payne's entry, is that portion of § 13 of the Indian appropriation act approved March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. at L. 1004, chap. 412), which, after stipulating for the disposal of lands acquired from the Seminole Indians to actual settlers under the homestead laws only, except as therein otherwise provided, declared that "until said lands are opened for settlement by proclamation of the President, no person *shall be permitted to enter upon and [327 occupy the same, and no person violating this provision shall ever be permitted to enter any of said lands or acquire any right thereto." It was also claimed that the Secretary misconstrued and misapplied the proclamation of the President of date March 23, 1889 (26 Stat. at L. 1544), fixing the time for the opening of the lands for settlement, particularly that portion which reads as follows:

"Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States, by virtue of the power in me vested by said act of Congress, approved March second, eighteen hundred and eighty-nine aforesaid, do hereby declare and make known, that so much of the lands, as aforesaid, acquired from or conveyed by the Muscogee (or Creek) Nation of Indians, and from or by the Seminole Nation of Indians, respectively, as is contained within the following-described boundaries, viz.:

"Will, at and after the hour of twelve o'clock, noon, of the twenty-second day of April next, and not before, be open for settlement, under the terms of, and subject to, all the conditions, limitations, and restrictions contained in said act of Congress, approved March second, eighteen hundred and eighty-nine, and the laws of the United States applicable thereto. . . .

"Warning is hereby again expressly given, that no person entering upon and occupying said lands before said hour of twelve o'clock, noon, of the twenty-second day of April, A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-nine, hereinbefore fixed, will ever be permitted to enter any of said lands or acquire any rights thereto; and that the officers of the United States will be required to strictly enforce the provision of the act of Congress to the above effect."

The question presented is, therefore, solely this: Was the complainant disqualified by reason of his entry into the territory and his presence there at the hour of the opening of the territory for settlement, under the circumstances stated in the finding of the Secretary, from making a homestead entry immediately upon the lands being opened for settlement?

This question is governed by the case of Smith v Townsend, 148 U. S. 490 [37:533]. The point 328] there presented was whether a *railroad section hand, residing with his family on a railroad right of way within the territory, and who by reason of his employment and residence was present therein at the hour of noon on April 22, 1889, could immediately thereafter legally enter upon public land adjoining said right of way and claim the same as a homestead. A construction was rendered necessary of the 2d section of the act of March 1, 1889 (25 Stat. at L. 757, 759, chap. 317), ratifying and confirming an agreement with the Muscogee (or Creek) Indians, whereby a large body of their lands, subsequently included in the territory of Oklahoma, had been ceded to the United States. The section referred to declared the ceded land to be part of the public domain and subject to homestead entry. The concluding sentence of the section read as follows:

"Any person who may enter upon any part of said lands in said agreement mentioned prior to the time that the same are opened to settlement by act of Congress shall not be permitted to occupy or to make entry of such lands or lay any claim thereto."

A construction was also required of the substantially similar provision contained in the act of March 2, 1889, heretofore quoted, and of the "warning" notice contained in the proclamation of March 23, 1889, which we have also heretofore referred to. To aid in construing these provisions resort was had to the history of the times, in order to ascertain the reason of the statutes as well as their meaning, and the conclusion was deduced (p. 496 [37: 535]) that the purpose of the legislative provisions referred to was "to secure equality between all who desired to establish settlements in that territory. The language is general and comprehensive: 'Any person who may enter upon any part of said lands . . . prior to the time that the same are opened to settlement . . . shall not be permitted to occupy or to make entry of such lands or lay any claim thereto. . . . Until said lands are opened for settlement by proclamation of the President, no person shall be permitted to enter upon and occupy the same, and no person violating this provision shall ever be permitted to enter any of said lands, or acquire any right thereto.' No exception* is made[329 from the general language of these provisions; and it was evidently the expectation of Congress that they would be enforced in the spirit of equality suggested by the generality of the language."

And, again, at page 500 [37: 536], the court observed:

"The evident intent of Congress was, by this legislation, to put a wall around this entire territory, and disqualify from the right to acquire, under the homestead laws, any tract within its limits, everyone who was not outside of that wall on April 22. When the hour came the wall was thrown down, and it was a race between all outside for the various tracts they might desire to take to themselves as homesteads."

Subsequently, conceding that Smith, the appellant in the case, was lawfully on the right of way of the railroad company, and that he possessed all the qualifications prescribed by the general homestead law, it was said (p. 500 [37: 536]):

"He did not have the qualifications prescribed by this statute; and there is nothing to prevent Congress, when it opens a particular tract for occupation, from placing additional qualifications on those who shall be permitted to take any portion thereof. That is what Congress did in this case. It must be presumed to have known the fact that on this right of way were many persons properly and legally there; it must also have known that many other persons were rightfully in the territory—Indian agents, deputy marshals, mail carriers, and many others, and if it intended that these parties, thus rightfully within the territory on the day named, should have special advantage in the entry of tracts they desired for occupancy, it would have been very easy to have said so. The general language used in these sections indicates that it was the intent to make the disqualification universally absolute. It does not say 'any person who may wrongfully enter,' etc., but 'any person who may enter'—'rightfully or wrongfully' is implied. There are special reasons why it must be believed that Congress intended no relaxation of these disqualifications on the part of those on the company's right of way, for it is obvious that, when a railroad runs through unoccupied territory like Oklahoma, which on a given day is opened for settlement, *numbers of settlers will immedi- [330 ately pour into it, and large cities will shortly grow up along the line of the road; and it cannot be believed that Congress intended that they who were on this right of way in the employ of the railroad company should have a special advantage of selecting tracts, just outside that right of way, and which would doubtless soon become the sites of towns and cities."

And in concluding its opinion the court held that "one who was within the territorial limits at the hour of noon of April 22 was, within both the letter and spirit of the statute, disqualified to take a homestead therein."

The reasoning of the opinion to which we have referred is fully applicable to the facts of the case under review; indeed, the very character of case now presented was referred to in illustration. In accordance with the views there expressed, we must, therefore, hold that as the appellant was within the territory just prior to and at the moment of time when the land first became legally open to settlement, he was disqualified at that time from entering upon and claiming lands therein as a homestead. Manifestly, Congress did not intend that one authorized to enter the territory in advance of the general public, solely to perform services therein as an employee of the government, should be at liberty, immediately on the arrival of the hour for opening the territory to settlement, to assume the status of a private individual and "actual settler," and make selection of a homestead, thus clearly securing an advantage in selection over those who, obedient to the command of the President, remained without the boundaries until the time had arrived when they might lawfully enter.

Affirmed.

331] UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

LEWIS A. EATON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 331-352.)

Vacancy in office—appointment of vice consul—power of President—salary—statute as to bonds—when entitled to compensation—services for administering upon estate—disbursements for lights—modifying judgment.

1. A vacancy in the office of consul general and vice consul, which justifies an emergency appointment of a vice consul under the Consular Regulations of 1888, arises when the consul general and vice consul are absent or unable to discharge the duties of the consular office.
2. The temporary inability, from sickness, of one who is both consul general and minister resident in Siam, to perform the duties of his office, does not incapacitate him to make an emergency appointment of a vice consul.
3. Congress can confer upon the President the power to appoint a vice consul under U. S. Const. art. 2, § 2, giving Congress the power to authorize the President to appoint inferior officers.
4. Where Congress has given but one salary to the person who is both minister resident and consul general at Siam, the salary of the vice consul who temporarily discharges the duties of both offices is to be computed upon the basis of the salary of both offices.
5. Statutory provisions as to the giving of a bond by an officer before entering on his duties are directory, and not mandatory.
6. A vice consul who, when he is designated and enters upon his duties, takes the oath of office and at once communicates with the Department of State, and is recognized as consul general, and allowed to perform the duties of that office, is entitled to compensation, although his bond has not been approved.
7. It is the statutory duty of a consul to administer upon the personal estates of citizens of the United States who die within his consulate, and his fees for such services are to be accounted for by him as official fees, and are not to be allowed to him.
8. Disbursement for "lights upon the King's birthday" may be allowed to the vice consul at Bangkok, Siam, when approved by the Department of State.
9. When only one item is erroneously allowed by a judgment, this does not make it necessary to reverse the whole judgment, but only to modify the same as to that item.

Submitted January 4, 1898. Decided February 28, 1898.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims rejecting the claim of Sempronius H. Boyd, his widow having been substituted as a party plaintiff on his death, for his salary as minister resident and consul general to Siam, and allowing the amount of the claim of Lewis A. Eaton as vice consul at Bangkok, Siam, the two cases having been consolidated. Modified as to amount, and, as modified, affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice White:

In October, 1890, Sempronius H. Boyd was commissioned as minister resident and consul general of the United States to Siam; he qualified and proceeded to his post, and was in June, 1892, engaged in the discharge of his official duties. At that time, being seriously ill, Boyd was granted by the President a leave of absence. Before leaving Bangkok, Siam, Boyd, to quote from the findings of fact, "believing his illness would terminate fatally, and being desirous to protect the interests of the government during his absence and until the then expected arrival from the United States of Robert M. Boyd, whom Sempronius Boyd desired should act as consul general, the latter called to his aid Lewis A. Eaton (now a plaintiff herein, who was then a missionary at Bangkok) and asked *him [332 to take charge of the consulate and its archives. Thereupon the following letter, dated June 21, 1892, was written by Boyd:

U. S. Legation and Consulate General,
Bangkok, June 21, 1892.

Krom Luang Devawongsee Varoprokan,
Minister for Foreign Affairs:

Monsieur Le Ministre: It is with exceeding regret to me to be forced to abandon my diplomatic and consular duties at the court of His Majesty, with the enjoyment, pleasure, comfort, and genuine friendship so marked

---

NOTE.—As to extra pay or compensation to officers, see note to United States v. Macdaniel, 8: 587.

As to bond to secure public funds, see note to State, Overton County, v. Copeland (Tenn.) 31 L. R. A. 844.

and distinguished, which the representative of the United States fully appreciated and imparted to his government.

All the physicians advise me to go soon to a cold climate. The President has wired me to that effect. In 20 or 30 days I may be strong enough for a sea voyage, of which I will avail myself. I am authorized to designate and do designate L. A. Eaton vice consul general until I am able to assume. If not incompatible with public affairs, I beg you to so regard him.

Monsieur le Ministre, I am too weak and feeble to call in person, which I would so much like to have done, and expressed my thanks and that of my government to the foreign office and attachés.

With assurance of my high consideration, I have the honor to be, Monsieur le Ministre,

Your obedient servant.

Boyd thereupon administered to Eaton an oath to faithfully discharge the duties of the office of vice consul general, etc. The findings state that Boyd believed he had authority for this action. Robert M. Boyd, who is referred to above, was then in the United States, and, although appointed as vice consul, had not qualified. Sempronius H. Boyd remained in Siam until the 12th day of July, 1892, when he left for the United States, and on his departure he turned over to Eaton, as the representative of the government of the United States, all the archives and property of the legation. Boyd arrived at his home, in the state of Missouri, on August 27, 1892, and although his leave of absence expired October 26, 1892, [333] *he did not, on account of illness, return to his post, but remained at his home, where he died June 22, 1894. Eaton, on the departure of Boyd, was the sole person "in charge of the interests of the government at Bangkok, and performed whatever duties were required there of either a minister resident or a consul general, with the knowledge of the Department of State and with that department's approval. The department acknowledged his communications and acted upon them as communications from a person authorized to perform the duties of minister resident and consul general in the emergency then existing." On "September 2, 1892, Eaton executed (under instructions from the Department of State) an official bond, calling himself acting consul general of the United States at Bangkok; this was received at the Department of State and was approved January 3, 1893; subsequently, under instructions from the Department of State, dated January 24, 1893, he executed another bond as vice consul general of the United States at Bangkok, which was approved by the Secretary of State April 23, 1893. Both of these bonds bore date June 13, 1892, with the knowledge and consent of Eaton's sureties thereon, and were so dated because of a pencil memorandum on each bond when received in blank by Eaton from the Department of State, directing him to insert the date of his appointment in the blank space reserved for the date."

On November 2, 1892, the Secretary of State wrote Eaton, inclosing him the commission of Robert Boyd, which had been issued in 1891, as vice consul at Siam. In February, 1893, Robert Boyd appeared in Siam, and, in accordance with the instructions of the Secretary of State, Eaton introduced him as vice consul, and on May 18 he qualified, when Eaton's performance of the duties of the office ceased. The findings below say:

"Eaton rendered to the accounting officers of the Treasury his account for salary for the entire period of his service, in which he charged and claimed one half of the salary of $5,000 per annum, appropriated for said post of minister resident and consul general, from July 12, 1892, to October 26, 1892; that is, from the departure of the minister to and including the *date on which the leave of [334] absence for sixty days (excluding transit time) expired, and the full salary at the rate of $5,000 per annum from October 27, 1892, to May 17, 1893, inclusive.

"Eaton also rendered with his salary account a return of all fees collected during the entire period of his service, both fees official and unofficial, including fees notarial and fees and fines received in the United States consular court at Bangkok, amounting in all to $245.41.

"Eaton also rendered to the Department of State his account of disbursements from the contingent fund of the legation and consulate general from July 1, 1892, to April 30, 1893, which was there approved.

"In the settlement of said accounts by the accounting officers of the Treasury the sum of $5.73, expended by Eaton for candles and lanterns, was suspended for information, which was thereafter furnished, but said sum remains disallowed and unpaid.

"In the settlement of Eaton's salary accounts by the Treasury the total amount of fees received, to wit, $245.41, was charged to him, and covered into the Treasury. The one half salary from July 12, 1892, to October 26, 1892, amounting to $726.90, was suspended for 'further information,' which was thereafter furnished; but this sum remains unpaid. The full salary from October 27, 1892, to May 17, 1893, amounting to $2,792.35, as approved by the Department of State, was allowed and credited. Deducting from this $245.41 leaves in Eaton's favor a balance of $2,546.94; which was certified to his credit by the First Controller December 4, 1893, no part of which has been paid."

It is inferable from the facts found that the amount of compensation which the accounting officers of the government settled and allowed in favor of Eaton, as above stated, was withheld from him because of a claim advanced by Sempronius H. Boyd to the entire salary as minister resident and consul general during a part of the time for which a portion of or the whole of the salary had been allowed Eaton. Indeed, on the 16th of June, 1894, Sempronius H. Boyd sued in the court below to recover his full salary as minister resident and consul general *from July, 1892, to February 11, 1893.[335 Thereupon, in December, 1894, Eaton commenced his action to recover the sums embraced in the following items:

A. For notarial or unofficial fees charged to him in the settlement of his salary account by report No. 162,708, as aforesaid, as per Exhibit C herewith	$177 41
B. For the item of salary suspended in the settlement of his accounts for salary by report No. 162,708, as aforesaid	726 90
C. For the balance of salary found due to the claimant by report No. 162,708, as aforesaid, and certified to his credit	2,546 94
D. For item expended for contingent expenses by claimant, and suspended in the settlement of his account therefor by report No. 162,709, as aforesaid	5 73
	$3,456 98

The court below consolidated the two cases, and on its finding the facts above recited, rejected the claim of Sempronius H. Boyd, his widow having been substituted as a party plaintiff on his death, and allowed the full amount of the claim sued for by Eaton. From this judgment the United States alone appeals.

Messrs. Louis A. Pradt, Assistant Attorney General, and Charles W. Russell, for appellant.

Messrs. John C. Chaney and John R. Garrison for appellee.

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

The errors relied upon to obtain a reversal rest on three contentions: 1st. That the appointment 336] of Eaton as acting *vice consul was without warrant of law, and hence not susceptible of ratification by the State Department. 2d. Even if the appointment was authorized by law, the statute conferring the power was in violation of the Constitution of the United States. 3d. Because, even conceding the appointment to have been valid, the court allowed a sum in excess of the amount which the claimant was legally entitled to recover. We will dispose of these contentions in the order stated.

In the third paragraph of § 1674, Revised Statutes, the following definition is found: "'Vice-consuls' and 'vice commercial agents' shall be deemed to denote consular officers, who shall be substituted, temporarily, to fill the places of consuls general, consuls, or commercial agents, when they shall be temporarily absent or relieved from duty." And this definition by Congress of the nature of a vice consulship was not changed by the amendment to § 4130 of the Revised Statutes by the act of February 1, 1876, as the obvious purpose of that act was simply to provide that where the words 'minister,' 'consul,' or 'consul general' were generally used, they should be taken also as embracing the subordinate officers who were to represent the principals in case of absence. In other words, that where a delegation of authority was made to the incumbent of the office, the fact that the name of the principal alone was mentioned should not be considered as excluding the power to exercise such authority by the subordinate and temporary officer, when the lawful occasion for the performance of the duty by him arose. Provision for the appointment and the pay of vice consuls are found in the following sections of the Revised Statutes:

"Sec. 1695. The President is authorized to define the extent of country to be embraced within any consulate or commercial agency, and to provide for the appointment of vice consuls, vice commercial agents, deputy consuls, and consular agents, therein, in such manner and under such regulations as he shall deem proper; but no compensation shall be allowed for the services of any such vice consul, or vice commercial agent, beyond nor except out of the allowance made by law for the principal consular officer in whose place such appointment *shall be made. No vice [337 consul, vice commercial agent, deputy consul, or consular agent, shall be appointed otherwise than under such regulations as have been or may be prescribed by the President."

"Sec. 1703. Every vice consul and vice commercial agent shall be entitled, as compensation for his services as such, to the whole or so much of the compensation of the principal consular officer in whose place he shall be appointed, as shall be determined by the President, and the residue, if any, shall be paid to such principal consular officer.

The Consular Regulations, promulgated with the approval of the President, contain the rules adopted in execution of the powers expressed in the above provisions. When the appointment in controversy took place, the regulations of 1888 were in force, and in §§ 36, 87, and 471 thereof were found the rules governing the appointments of vice consuls and temporary vice consuls and the manner of their payment. These sections are as follows:

"36. Vice consuls general, deputy consuls general, vice consuls, deputy consuls, vice commercial agents, deputy commercial agents, and consular agents are appointed by the Secretary of State, usually upon the nomination of the principal consular officer, approved by the consul general (if the nomination relates to a consulate or commercial agency), or if there be no consul general, then by the diplomatic representative. If there be no consul general or diplomatic representative, the nomination should be transmitted directly to the Department of State, as should also the nomination for subordinate officers in Mexico, British India, Manitoba, and British Columbia. The nomination for vice consul general and deputy consul general must be submitted to the diplomatic representative for approval, if there be one resident in the country. The privilege of making the nomination for the foregoing subordinate officers must not be construed to limit the authority of the Secretary of State, as provided by law, to appoint these officers without such previous nomination by the principal officer. The statutory power in this respect is reserved, and it will be exercised in all cases in which the interests *of the service or other public [338 reasons may be deemed to require it."

"87. In case a vacancy occurs in the offices both of consul and vice consul, which requires the appointment of a person to perform temporarily the duties of the consulate, the diplomatic representative has authority to make such appointment, with the consent of the foreign government and in conformity to law and these regulations, immediate notice being given to the Department of State. In those countries, however, when there are consuls general, to whom the nomination of subordinate officers are required to be submitted for approval, the authority to make such temporary appointments is lodged with them. Immediate notice should be given to the diplomatic representative of the proposed appointment, and, if it can be done within a reasonable time, he should be consulted before the appointment is made. If such a vacancy should occur in a consulate general, the temporary appointment will be made by the diplomatic representative."

"471. The compensation of a vice consul general, vice consul, or vice commercial agent is provided for only from that of the principal officer. The rules in respect to his compensation are as follows, viz.:

"1. In case the principal officer is absent on leave for sixty days or less, in any one calendar year, and does not visit the United States, the vice consular officer acting in his place is entitled to one half of the compensation of the office from the date of assuming its duties, unless there is an agreement for a different rate, the principal officer receiving the remainder. But after the expiration of the sixty days, or after the expiration of the principal's leave of absence (if less than sixty days), the vice consular officer is entitled to the full compensation of the office.

"2. If the principal visits the United States on such leave and returns to his post, the foregoing rule will include the time of transit both from and to his post, as explained in paragraph 460. But if the principal does not return to his post, either because of resignation or otherwise the rule will embrace only the time of [339] absence, not exceeding sixty days, together with the time of transit from his post to his residence in the United States."

It is plain that the above sections of the Revised Statutes confer upon the President full power, in his discretion, to appoint vice consuls and fix their compensation; that they forbid any appointment, except in accordance with the regulations adopted by the President, with a limitation, however, that the compensation of these officers, if appointed, should be solely "out of the allowance made by law for the principal consular officer in whose place such appointment shall be made." The regulations just quoted come clearly within the power thus delegated. The legality of the appointment in question is then first to be determined by ascertaining whether it was authorized by the regulations. Before analyzing the text of the regulations their general purpose must be borne in mind. The first section referred to (36) lodges the power in the Secretary of State in all cases to appoint a vice consul or vice consul general. The manifest object of the provision was to prevent the continued performance of consular duties from being interrupted by any temporary cause, such as absence, sickness, or even during an interregnum caused by death and before an incumbent could be appointed. This was secured by the designation in advance of a subordinate and temporary official who, in the event of the happening of the foregoing conditions, would be present to discharge the duties. Section 87 provided for a condition of affairs not embraced in § 36, that is, for the case where there would arise a temporary inability to perform duty on the part of both the consul and vice consul. The two provisions together secure an unbroken performance of consular duties by creating the necessary machinery to have within reach one qualified to perform them, free from any vicissitude which might befall either the regular incumbent of the office of consul or the vice appointee.

In view of the recognition of Eaton by the State Department and the express approval of his bond as vice consul, it would result that, at least from the date of the official action of the Secretary of State, he would be entitled to be treated *as appointed by that officer un- [340 der § 36. But as the sum of the salary allowed by the court below antedated the approval of the bond, we pretermit this question, and come to consider whether Eaton's designation was within the regulation for emergency appointments provided in § 87.

The first requisite for calling the emergency power into play exacted by this regulation was, that there should be a vacancy in the office both of consul general and vice consul. It is clear that the findings establish that there was such vacancy within the meaning of the regulation. The fact that the minister resident and consul general had obtained a leave of absence from the President, and was sick and unable to discharge his duties, and that the vice consul previously appointed had not qualified, and was absent from Siam, did not, it is argued, justify an emergency appointment, because these facts did not create a vacancy in the narrower sense of that word. But the vacancy to which regulation 87 relates cannot be construed in a technical sense without doing violence to both the letter and spirit of the statute which authorized the regulation, and without destroying the true relation and harmonious operation of the two rules on the subject expressed in §§ 36 and 87. That the statute did not contemplate a merely technical vacancy in the office of a consul general, before a vice consul could be appointed, clearly results from the fact that it defines the latter and subordinate officer as one "who shall be substituted temporarily to fill the places of consuls general . . . when they shall be temporarily absent or relieved from duty." The power to make the appointment when the consul general was only temporarily absent of necessity conveyed authority to do so, although there might be no vacancy in the office, but simply an absence of the principal officer. The provision of the statute limiting the pay of the vice consul or temporary officer out of the pay of the principal official, the incumbent, is also susceptible of but one construction, that is, that the temporary officer could be called upon to discharge the duties, even although there was an incumbent, where, from absence or other adequate cause, he ceased temporarily to perform his duties.

341] Regulation 36, adopted in *pursuance of the statute and providing for the appointment of vice consuls simultaneously or concurrently with the appointment of consuls, and regulating their pay, is as clear on this subject as is the statute. As regulation 87 but adds another safeguard to that created by the general terms of 36, by providing for a contingency not contemplated in 36, that is, the case of vacancy in both the consular and vice consular offices, it follows that the word "vacancy" in 87 imports provision for a condition like unto that contemplated by the law and provided for in 36. Looking at the two regulations together, and taking in view their purpose, it is obvious that the appointment of the temporary officer for which they both provide depended, not solely on a technical vacancy, but included a case where there arose a mere absence or inability of the principal and vice officer to discharge the duties of the consular office.

Nor is it true to say that because regulation 87 confers the power to appoint an emergency vice consul general "on the diplomatic representative," therefore Boyd, who was both minister resident and consul general, was without authority to make a temporary appointment to the latter office. The argument by which this proposition is supported is as follows: As Boyd filled both offices, if there was inability to discharge the duties of one, there was also like inability as to the other, and therefore incapacity to designate in one character a temporary officer to fill the duties of the other. The error here lies in assuming that because an official is temporarily prevented from performing the duties of his office thereby he becomes without capacity to make an emergency appointment. There is no essential identity between the two conditions, and it was because of their evident distinction that the regulations caused the existence of one condition, the temporary failure to perform duty, to give rise to the other; that is, the birth of the power to make the temporary appointment. It would lead to an absurd conclusion to construe the regulation as meaning that the very circumstance which generated the power to make the appointment had the necessary effect of preventing the coming into being of the power created.

342] *If the two offices of minister resident and consul general be treated as distinct and separate functions, although vested in the same natural person, the authority was clearly in the minister to appoint the vice consul general. If, on the other hand, the two functions be considered as indivisible the like result follows, since the mere fact that the officer had obtained a leave or was sick and unable to be present in his office and discharge its duties did not deprive him of the capacity to make a temporary appointment. In its ultimate analysis, the proposition we have just considered substantially maintains that in no case where the duties of the minister resident and consul general are united in the one person can an emergency consul general be designated under § 87. It would follow that in every such case where leave of absence was granted or sickness arose, and there was no vice consul general present, the public interest must inevitably suffer in consequence of the closing of the consular office. But the very purpose of the statute and regulations was to guard against such a contingency. The evil consequences to result from admitting the proposition are conceded, but the result is attributed, not to error in the argument, but to a presumed omission in the regulations, which should, it is urged, be corrected, not by judicial construction, but by an amendment or change in the regulations. The error in the proposition, however, cannot be obscured by assigning the consequences which flow from it to a defect in the regulations, when, if a sound rule of interpretation be applied, the supposed omission does not arise.

The construction rendered necessary by a consideration of the text of the statute and the regulations, by the remedy intended to be afforded, and the evil which it was their purpose to frustrate, is that the power to designate in case of the absence or the temporary inability of the consul general was lodged in a superior officer, if there was such officer in the country where the consul discharged his duty, and, if not, on the happening of the conditions contemplated by the rule, the officer highest in rank was authorized to make the temporary appointment. Doubtless it was this construction which caused the Department of State to recognize Eaton's appointment *and the Secretary of State to approve [343 his bond as vice consul general. The interpretation given to the regulations by the department charged with their execution, and by the official who has the power, with the sanction of the President, to amend them, is entitled to the greatest weight, and we see no reason in this case to doubt its correctness.

The claim that Congress was without power to vest in the President the appointment of a subordinate officer called a vice consul, to be charged with the duty of temporarily performing the functions of the consular office, disregards both the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Although art. 2, § 2, of the Constitution requires consuls to be appointed by the President "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," the word "consul" therein does not embrace a subordinate and temporary officer like that of vice consul as defined in the statute. The appointment of such an officer is within the grant of power expressed in the same section, saying "but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments." Because the subordinate officer is charged with the performance of the duty of the superior for a limited time and under special and temporary conditions, he is not hereby transformed into the superior and permanent official. To so hold would render void any and every delegation of power to an inferior to perform under any circumstances or exigency the duties of a superior officer, and the discharge of administrative duties would be seriously hindered. The manifest purpose of Congress in classifying and defining the grades of consular offices, in the statute to which we have referred, was to so limit the period of duty to be performed by the vice consuls and thereby to deprive them of the character of consuls in the broader and more permanent sense of that word. A review of the legislation on the subject makes this quite clear. Section 1674, Revised Statutes, took its source in "An Act to Regulate the Diplomatic and Consular Systems of the United States," approved August 18, 1856 (11 Stat. at L. 52, chap. 127). Whilst in the earlier periods of the government, officers known 344] as vice consuls *were appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, the officials thus designated were not subordinate and temporary, but were permanent and in reality principal officials. [Appointment of Consuls] 7 Ops. Atty. Gen. 247; 3 Jefferson's Writings, 188. During the period, however, whilst the office of vice consul was considered as an independent and separate function, requiring confirmation by the Senate, where a vacancy in a consular office arose by death of the incumbent, and the duties were discharged by a person who acted temporarily, without any appointment whatever, it would seem that the practice prevailed of paying such officials as de facto officers. In 1832 the Department of State submitted to Mr. Attorney General Taney the question of whether the son of a deceased consul, who had remained in the consular office and discharged its duties, was entitled to the pay of the office. In replying, the Attorney General said:

"If, after the death of Mr. Coxe, his son performed the services and incurred the expenses of a residence there, and his acts have been recognized by the government, I do not perceive why he should not receive the compensation fixed by law for such services. He was de facto consul for the time, and the public received the benefit. . . . The practice of the government sanctions this opinion, as appears by the papers before me; and in several instances similar to this, since the law of 1810, the salary has been paid. . . . The public interest requires that the duties of the office should be discharged by someone; and where, upon the death of the consul, a person who is in possession of the papers of the consulate enters on the discharge of its duties, and fulfils them to the satisfaction of the government, I do not preceive why he should not be recognized as consul for the time he acted as such, and performed the services to the public; and, if he is so recognized, the law of Congress entitles him to his salary." [Provisions for Widows of Consuls Who Die in Office] 2 Ops. Atty. Gen. 523 524.

The terms of the law and its construction in practice for more than forty years sustains the theory that a vice consul is a mere subordinate official, and we do not doubt its correctness.

We come, then, to consider the errors assign-345] ed as to the *amount of the salary Prior to February 26, 1883, the consular official at Bangkok was of the third class, and his salary was $3,000. At the date mentioned (22 Stat. at L. 424, chap. 56) an appropriation was made for minister resident and consul general to Siam, $5,000. It was on this salary, which was reiterated in subsequent appropriations, that the allowance to Eaton was computed by the accounting officer of the Treasury, and adjudged by the court below. It is first claimed that as the vice appointment related only to the consul general's office and not to that of minister resident, there was error in computing the allowance on the basis of the salary of both offices. Although both the statute and the regulations provide for the payment of the vice official from that of the principal officer, and of this fact Congress presumably had knowledge, yet in no case for the appropriation for the salary of the minister resident and consul general to Siam has there been an attribution of a portion thereof to one function and another part to the other. On the contrary, Congress has treated the compensation of the two as an indivisible unit. As the duties of the two offices have thus been inseparably blended by Congress, and presumably the performance of the function of one office embraced of necessity the discharge of the duties of the other, we do not think the accounting officers erred in treating the salary fixed for the joint service as indivisible, and in not attempting an apportionment, when Congress had failed to direct that such division be made, or to furnish the method of making it. Indeed, the finding that Eaton executed all the duties of both offices required of him by the State Department, during his temporary tenure, implies that he performed, at the request of the State Department, as consul general, all the functions of minister resident. Thus the facts bring the case directly within Revised Statutes 1738, which provides that a consular officer may exercise diplomatic functions in the country to which he is appointed, when there is no officer of the United States empowered to discharge such duties therein, and when the consular officer is "expressly authorized by the President to do so." Conclusive cogency results from these considerations when it is borne in mind that *by the treaty between Siam [346] and the United States there was but one diplomatic and consular officer of the United States in Siam, and that by the express terms of one of the later treaties with Siam the word "consul general" of the United States, therein used, is defined to include any consular officer of the United States in Siam. 23 Stat. at L. 782, 783.

It is further argued that, as the vice consul is required by law (Rev. Stat. § 1698) before he enters on the execution of his trust to give bond, there was error in allowing Eaton compensation for a period prior to the approval of his bond by the Secretary of State on April 3, 1893. The finding by the court below that Eaton entered on the discharge of his duties when designated, at once communicated with the Department of State, and was recognized as consul general and allowed to perform all the duties of that office, answers this contention. It is settled that statutory provisions of the character of those referred to are directory and not mandatory. In United States v. Bradley, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 343 [9: 448], which was a suit upon a bond given by one Hall as paymaster, it was contended that as the bond required by the statute to be executed before an appointee could enter upon the duties of the office had not been furnished,

Hall was not accountable as paymaster for moneys received by him from the government. The court, however, held otherwise, saying, per Story, J. (p. 365 [9:457]): "The giving of the bond was a mere ministerial act for the security of the government, and not a condition precedent to his authority to act as paymaster. Having received the public moneys as paymaster, he must account for them as paymaster." In United States v. Linn, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 313 [10:751], suit was brought upon an undertaking executed by Linn as receiver of public moneys, with sureties. A contention was advanced like that made in the Bradley Case. The undertaking in question was not executed under seal, while the statute required that the appointee should, before entering upon the duties of the office, execute a "bond." In holding the undertaking enforceable as a common-law obligation, and answering the claim that it was not valid for want of a consideration, the court, per Thompson, J., said (p. 313 [10:751]): "These 347]emoluments [of the office] were the *considerations allowed him for the execution of the duties of his office; and his appointment and commission entitled him to receive this compensation, whether he gave any security or not. His official rights and duties attached upon his appointment." And, in referring approvingly to the decision in the Bradley Case, and in reiterating the reasoning of the opinion in that case to which we have already alluded, the court said (p. 313 [10:751]): "According to this doctrine, which is undoubtedly sound, Linn was a receiver, de jure, as well as de facto, when the instrument in question was given. And although the law requiring security was directory to the officers intrusted with taking such security, Linn was under a legal as well as a moral obligation to give the security required by law." At page 314 [10:751] it was also observed that it was not the mere appointment of Linn as receiver that formed the consideration of the instrument sued upon, but the emoluments and benefits resulting therefrom.

It is true, as claimed by counsel for the government, that in the opinion delivered in the subsequent case of United States v. Le Baron, 60 U. S. 19 How. 77 [15:527], expressions are found which appear inconsistent with those to which we have just called attention. But the question presented in the Le Baron Case was as to the proper construction of the language of a bond which had been given by a government official, subsequent to his permanent appointment as a deputy postmaster, which bond was executed at the time the appointee was performing the duties of the office under a temporary appointment made during a recess of the Senate. Suit having been brought for a breach of the condition of the bond, it was contended that the terms of the instrument stipulated only for liability for the proper performance of the duties of the office under the first appointment. It was held, however, that as the statute required the giving of bond before the appointee could enter upon the execution of the duties of the office, it could not be presumed that the bond was intended to relate back to an earlier date than the time of its acceptance, and that its terms should be given a prospective, and not a retrospective, operation. In the course of the reasoning on this branch of the *case [348 general expressions were used to the effect that the appointee could not act and the bond could not take effect until its approval; and in discussing the further contention that the appointee was not in office under the second appointment at the time the bond took effect, because his commission had not been sent to him, and was not actually transmitted until after the death of the President who had made the appointment, it was observed that the acts required by the statute to be performed by the appointee before he could enter on the possession of the office under his appointment were "conditions precedent to the complete investiture of the office;" and that "when the person has performed the required conditions, his title to enter on the possession of the office is also complete." But this general language must be confined to the precise state of facts with reference to which it was used, and does not warrant the inference that it was intended to overrule the doctrine enunciated in the Bradley and Linn Cases, which were not even referred to. Indeed, that this was not supposed to be the deduction proper to be drawn from the reasoning in the Le Baron Case, is shown by the fact that in the later case of United States v. Flanders, 112 U. S. 88 [28:630], the doctrine of the earlier cases was carried to its legitimate result. In the Flanders Case the precise question raised in the case at bar was presented and decided. A collector of internal revenue who was required before entering upon the duties of his office to give bond, and who was also required to take an oath before becoming entitled to the salary or emoluments of the office, failed to give bond or take the oath until more than two months after he had been allowed to enter upon the duties of the office. In a suit upon the bond, credit was claimed for compensation for services performed during the period preceding the taking of the oath and giving of bond, and the allowance was resisted by the government on the ground that under the statutory provisions referred to the right to compensation did not exist. The court, however, held otherwise, saying (p. 91 [28:631]):

"If he [the collector] is appointed, and acts, and collects the moneys, and pays them over and accounts for them, and the govern [349 ment accepts his services and receives the moneys, his title to the compensation necessarily accrues, unless there is a restriction growing out of the fact that another statute says that he must take the oath 'before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments' of the office. But we are of opinion that the statute is satisfied by holding that his title to receive, or retain, or hold, or appropriate, the commissions as compensation does not arise until he takes and subscribes the oath or affirmation, but that, when he does so, his compensation is to be computed on moneys collected by him, from the time when, under his appointment, he began to perform services as collector, which the government accepted, provided he has paid over and accounted for such moneys."

This was evidently the view taken by the State Department, since on January 24, 1893, when the bond was returned for re execution in another form, Eaton was directed to insert therein the date of his original appointment. These considerations dispose of all the questions presented, except the contention that there was error in awarding to Eaton certain items of fees collected and reported to the Treasury and charged to him, included in which were commissions of $67.91 earned on the settlement of two estates, and the sum of $5.73 disbursed by Eaton for lights upon the birthday of the King of Siam. We need only examine the legality of the two items just mentioned, as the sole objection made to the validity of the others is that Eaton was not entitled to charge them, because he was not lawfully acting as consul general.

It is contended that the fees collected for settlement of estates should not be allowed, because the services were "official," and we are referred to paragraph 508, subdivision 69, of the Consular Regulations of 1888, as supporting this claim. On the part of the appellee, however, it is urged that the point has been held otherwise in United States v. Mosby, 133 U. S. 273 [33: 625], where it is said a similar objection to like charges was decided to be without merit.

It was held in the Mosby Case that the court of claims properly allowed to Mosby—who had 350] been consul at Hong Kong *from February, 1879, to July, 1885.—the sum of $8 21, as "five per cent commission on the estate of Alice Evans, May, 1881." In disposing of the matter the court said (p. 287 [33: 630]) that "this evidently was a fee in the settlement of a private estate, and was properly allowed." It does not distinctly appear whether the fee there considered was controlled by the Consular Regulations of 1874 or by those of 1881. This is obvious when it is considered that the regulations of 1881 were only promulgated in May of that year. The regulations controlling this case are those of 1888, which in the respect in question are substantially like those of 1881, whilst fees earned prior to May, 1881, were governed by the regulations of 1874, which differed on the subject from those of 1881. Indeed, this difference between the two was referred to in the Mosby Case, where it was said (p. 280 [33: 628]):

"Paragraph 321 of the Regulations of 1874 is as follows: '321. All acts are to be regarded as 'official services,' when the consul is required to use his seal and title officially, or either of them; and the fees received therefor are to be accounted for to the Treasury of the United States.' It is to be observed that this paragraph uses the word 'required,' and does not say that all acts are to be regarded as official services when the consul uses his seal and title officially, or either of them."

"Paragraph 489 of the Regulations of 1881 reads as follows: '489. All acts or services for which a fee is prescribed in the tariff of fees are to be regarded as official services, and the fees received therefor are to be reported and accounted for to the Treasury of the United States, except when otherwise expressly stated therein.'"

In view of the fact that it is not certain when the fees in question in the Mosby Case were earned and of the difference between the Consular Regulations of 1874 and 1881, we shall not inquire into the correctness of the decision in the Mosby Case as applied to the precise facts there considered, but will examine the question here presented in the light of the Consular Regulations of 1888 and as one of first impression.

*By § 1745 of the Revised Statutes, the[351 President is authorized to prescribe, from time to time, the rates or tariffs of fees to be charged by diplomatic and consular officers for official services, "and to designate what shall be regarded as official services, besides such as are expressly declared by law." Section 1709 of the Revised Statutes makes it the "duty" of consuls and vice consuls to administer upon the personal estate left by any citizen of the United States who shall die within their consulate.

The fact that the statute makes it the duty of a consul to administer on personal estates gives rise to the clearest implication that fees for such services were official fees, and the regulations on the subject promulgated by the President clearly support this view. Thus, in the tariff of consular fees contained in paragraph 508 of the Consular Regulations of 1888 it is provided, in item numbered 56, as follows:

"56. For taking into possession the personal estate of any citizen who shall die within the limits of a consulate, inventorying, selling, and finally settling and preparing or transmitting, according to law, the balance due thereon, five per cent on the gross amount of such estate. If part of such estate shall be delivered over before final settlement, two and one half per cent to be charged on the part so delivered over as is not in money, and five per cent on the gross amount of the residue. If among the effects of the deceased are found certificates of foreign stocks, loans, or other property, two and one half per cent on the amount thereof. No charge will be made for placing the official seal upon the personal property or effects of such deceased citizen, or for breaking or removing the seals."

And, by paragraph 375 of the same regulations, a consular officer is directed to report to the Treasury Department fees of this character, and if he be a salaried officer to hold the same subject to the order of the department. This decisive provision is besides supplemented by paragraph 501 of the regulations, in which it is declared that "all acts or services for which a fee is prescribed in the tariff of fees are to be regarded as official services, and the fees charged and received *therefor are to be [352 reported and accounted for to the Treasury of the United States, except when otherwise expressly stated therein."

As the statute made it the official duty of a consul to administer upon the estate of American citizens dying within the consular district, and the President, by virtue of the power vested in him, has clearly placed such duties in the category of "official services," and required the fees earned therefor to be accounted for as "official fees," it is plain that the accounting officer of the Treasury properly charged Eaton with the amount of such fees, and that the court of claims erred in its ruling to the contrary.

The ground of objection urged to the allowance by the court of claims of the item of $5.73 is stated in the brief to be that the disbursement "was personal or diplomatic and wholly foreign to consular business." We are unable, however, to say that the court of claims erred in its finding in respect to this item as follows: "The petty item for lights upon the King's birthday was approved by the Department of State, and appears to be a charge within the discretion of that department; it is therefore allowed."

It follows from the foregoing considerations that the only error committed by the court below was in treating the fees for the settlement of estates as unofficial, when they should have been held to be official. But this does not render it necessary to reverse the judgment in its entirety, but only to modify the same. Rev. Stat. § 707; Ballew v. United States, 160 U. S. 187 [40: 388]. This modification will be effected by deducting from the principal sum of $3,456.98, found due by the court of claims, $67.91, being the amount of the fees improperly allowed. The judgment of the Court of Claims is therefore modified by reducing the amount thereof to $3,389.07, and as so modified it is affirmed.

Patent for land—act of 1866 to quiet land titles in California—remedial statute—bona fide purchaser—assignment of right—rehearing—record of proof.

1. A patent for land issued by the United States does not preclude an inquiry by the court whether it was issued without authority or contrary to a statute.
2. The words "grantees" and "grants" in the act of 1866, to quiet land titles in California, should not be so construed as to require a formal grant from Mexico, but apply to a claimant who has in good faith and for a valuable consideration purchased from one claiming to be a Mexican grantee or from his assigns, and where there was no adverse claim other than that of the United States.
3. A remedial statute ought not to be so construed as to defeat in part the very purpose of its enactment.
4. Under the statute of 1866 record proof of the existence of a grant was not necessary in order to give the officers of the United States jurisdiction to issue the patent upon being satisfied of the existence of those facts in regard to which it was their province to determine.
5. Whether or not one is such a bona fide purchaser is a question to be determined by the government on issuing the patent; and an inquiry into that question of fact is precluded by the patent itself.
6. The right of a bona fide purchaser from a Mexican grantee to purchase the lands at the minimum price under the act of Congress of July 23, 1866, for quieting land titles in California, is not a mere personal privilege, but may be assigned by him, and his assignee can exercise the right.
7. After a decision refusing the patent, by the Secretary of the Interior, an application for a rehearing may be made to and the patent granted by his successor in office, if it could have been done by the former had he remained in office.

Submitted January 5, 1898. Decided February 23, 1898.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review a judgment affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California in favor of the plaintiff, Joseph Naphtaly, against the defendants, Julius A. Beley et al., for the recovery of land described in the complaint. Affirmed.

See same case below, 44 U. S. App. 232.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

The defendant in error, who was the plaintiff below, brought this action in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California to recover the possession of certain lands described in his complaint, and also the value of the rents, issues, and profits; thereof. He alleged that he was the owner in fee of the lands in question and entitled to their possession, and that while such owner the defendants wrongfully entered upon the lands and ousted him therefrom, and have since wrongfully withheld from him the possession thereof. He further alleged that he was the owner of the land by virtue of a patent duly and regularly issued to him by the United *States in the year 1893, under and in [354 pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress of April 24, 1820 (3 Stat. at L. 566, chap. 51), entitled "An Act Making Further Provision for the Sale of the Public Lands," and the acts supplemental thereto, and also under the provisions of § 7 of the act of Congress of July 23, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 218, chap. 219), entitled "An Act to Quiet Land Titles in California," and that the defendants denied the validity of that patent.

The defendants answered, denying the various allegations of the complaint, and the case came to trial without a jury, a jury having been waived by all the parties.

The plaintiff put in evidence the patent issued to him from the United States for the land described in the complaint, and proved that while he was in the peaceable and quiet possession of such land the defendants entered upon it and ousted him therefrom, and have ever since detained the land from him. He also proved its rental value.

The bill of exceptions contains the following:

"It was then admitted by the defendants' counsel that at the time of the issuance of the patent hereinbefore described the lands therein and in the complaint described were public lands of the United States, subject to sale under the laws of the United States. It was here conceded by defendants' counsel that defendants did not propose to connect themselves in any manner or form with the title of the United States to the premises described in the complaint herein, or any part thereof, either by certificate of purchase, patent, or anything of the kind.

"The plaintiff then rested."

The plaintiff's action rests primarily upon § 7 of the statute of the United States entitled "An Act to Quiet Land Titles in California," approved July 23, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 218, 220, chap. 219). That section, so far as material, reads as follows:

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That where persons in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, have purchased lands of Mexican grantees or assigns, which grants have subsequently been rejected, or where the lands so purchased have been excluded from the final survey of any Mexican grant, and have [355]*used, improved, and continued in the actual possession of the same as according to the lines of their original purchase, and where no valid adverse right or title (except of the United States) exists, such purchasers may purchase the same, after having such lands surveyed under existing laws, at the minimum price established by law, upon first making proof of the facts as required in this section, under regulations to be provided by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, joint entries being admissible by conterminous proprietors to such an extent as will enable them to adjust their respective boundaries."

To maintain their defense, the defendants then offered in evidence the application made by the plaintiff to purchase the lands from the United States pursuant to the 7th section above quoted. The application and the accompanying papers were offered for the purpose of showing that there had, in fact, never been any grant from the Mexican government to the Romeros, through whom, as supposed Mexican grantees, the plaintiff below derived his claim, and by reason of which claim he had made application to the land office under the provisions of the 7th section of the above-mentioned act of Congress. The papers offered in evidence by defendants showed that while the country was under Mexican rule the Romeros had taken proceedings to obtain a grant of lands, which included the land in question, from the Mexican government, and that such proceedings had certainly gone as far as a final decree by the governor providing for the making of a grant asked for, but there was no record evidence of any actual grant ever having been made. The facts as to the documentary evidence in the case are fully set forth in the report of the case of Romero v. United States, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 721 [17: 627].

The evidence so offered by defendants was objected to on the part of the plaintiff as immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant for the purpose of affecting the validity of the patent under which the plaintiff claimed title to the lands in question. The court sustained the objection and the defendants duly excepted. Thereupon the defendants rested, and the court ordered judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff and *against the defend- [356 ants for a recovery of the land in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. This judgment was affirmed by the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit (44 U. S. App. 232), and the case is brought here for review.

Mr. Henry F. Crane for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. A. T. Britton and A. B. Browne for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The defendant in error insists that his patent is conclusive evidence that he is a purchaser within the meaning of the 7th section of the statute above quoted, and that, no fraud being alleged, no evidence can be received for the purpose of in any other way invalidating the patent issued to him by the government of the United States.

The patent does not preclude this court from construing the act of 1866, nor does it preclude an inquiry by the court whether the patent was issued without authority or against the expressed will of Congress, as manifested in the statute. Burfenning v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. Railway Company, 163 U. S. 321 [41: 175], and cases there cited. If it were so issued, it is the duty of the court to give no weight to it. The proper construction of the act of 1866 is, therefore, the first question to be considered.

In order that a person may avail himself of that act, is it necessary that an actual grant from the Mexican authorities to some grantee through whom the title is derived should be proved? If so, the judgment in favor of the plaintiff in this case must be reversed, as no such grant was proved. We are of opinion, however, that the statute does not require proof of such a grant.

When the United States took possession of that portion of the country in which the lands in question are situated, it is public knowledge that there were many claims made *by [357 private individuals to lands under alleged grants from the preceding Mexican government. In order to ascertain and settle the questions arising thereunder, Congress, on the 3d of March, 1851, passed an act (9 Stat. at L. 631, chap. 41) in which a commission was constituted and before which claims of that character might be proved. The 8th section provided "that each and every person claiming lands in California by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican government shall present the same to the said commissioners when sitting as a board, together with such documentary evidence and testimony of witnesses as the said claimant relies upon in support of such claims; and it shall be the duty of the commissioners, when the case is ready for hearing, to proceed promptly to examine the same upon such evidence, and upon the evidence produced in behalf of the United States, and to decide upon the validity of the said claim, and, within thirty days after such decision is rendered, to certify the same, with the reasons on which it is founded, to the district attorney of the United States in and for the district in which such decision shall be rendered."

It will be noticed that the jurisdiction here given was only to decide upon the validity of the claim presented, and if the commission decided that the claims were not valid ones, as derived from the Mexican or Spanish government, it was the duty of the commission to reject them. Provision was made for a review of the decision of the commissioners by the district court of the district in which the lands claimed were situated, which court upon such review was authorized and required "to decide on the validity of such claim," and an appeal from the decision of the district court was allowed to be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States.

It appeared from the documents offered in evidence in this action that the Romeros had presented their claim to this commission, which had rejected it as not being a valid claim, and this rejection had been affirmed by the district court and by the Supreme Court in the case in the 1st of Wallace, mentioned above. There must undoubtedly have been, at the time of the enactment of the act of 1866, many cases 358] existing *in that part of the country, where claims of bona fide purchasers for value founded upon supposed rights or grants derived from the Mexican or Spanish government had been held to be invalid by the commission appointed under the act of 1851, and where, notwithstanding such decision, the claimants had remained in possession of the lands as originally acquired by them, there being no valid adverse right or title to the lands of which they were in possession, excepting that of the United States. This would have been the natural result arising from the difficulty in making formal and sufficient proof before the commission of valid rights and titles derived from the Mexican or Spanish government. It was only valid claims that the commission had power to allow. Where claims had been made and theretofore adjuged invalid by the Supreme Court of the United States, Congress had, in some instances, by private act, permitted those who where bona fide purchasers from the claimant whose claim had been adjudged invalid, or from his assigns, to enter the land so purchased according to the lines of the public surveys then provided for, at $1.25 per acre, to the extent to which the lands had been reduced to possession at the time of the adjudication by the Supreme Court. Such is the act, approved March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. at L. 808, chap. 116) entitled "An Act to Grant the Right of Pre-emption to Certain Purchasers on the 'Soscol Ranch' in the State of California." See also a similar act, approved June 17, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 136, chap. 133); also the act approved July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 372, chap. 218); also the act approved March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. at L. 534, chap. 115).

Other acts were also passed by Congress recognizing in effect the equitable rights of parties who were grantees of those who had claimed a right or title under the Mexican or Spanish government, and which right or title had subsequently been held to be invalid by the courts of our own government. The hardship to be relieved from by these special acts and by the general act of 1866 did not solely exist in the fact that there had been a formal grant from the Mexican authorities, which was in some manner defective, so that no valid claim or right could grow out of such grant, but it also existed when a claimant, in possession of land which he *had bona fide and for a[359 valuable consideration purchased of one who claimed his right or title from the Mexican or Spanish government by way of a grant therefrom, was nevertheless unable to prove such grant, and as a consequence could not prove any valid title or claim in himself. Whether such invalidity were on account of some defect in the proceeding which resulted in a defective grant, or whether it existed by reason of an inability to prove an actual grant, was not material, so long as the claim of title actually rested upon what was in good faith supposed to have been a valid claim under the government of Mexico, and so long as there was no valid adverse right or title other than that of the United States. Persons occupying lands which they possessed under such circumstances and by such a claim were entitled to considerate treatment from the government of the United States. They had in good faith paid a valuable consideration for the lands, of which they were in possession by virtue of such purchase, and they ought to have the first right to make good their title by purchase from the government at the lowest price named.

The defendants on the trial conceded these lands were, when the patent in this case was issued, public lands of the United States, subject to sale under the laws thereof, and that they did not intend to connect themselves in any manner or form with the title of the United States to the lands in question. There is no proof or offer of any proof in the record tending to show the existence of any adverse valid claim to the land, other than the United States, and the admission just alluded to, taken in connection with the absence of such proof, shows that when the patent issued there existed in fact no other adverse valid claim upon the land than that of the United States. Those who could not show actual grants from the Mexican government might nevertheless have equities quite as strong in their favor as those who could show an actual grant which was defective. The act of Congress should not be so construed as to except from its remedial provisions those who were without an actual grant while at the same time filling every other requirement of the act, unless the language used therein is open to no other interpretation.

*Such a construction ought to be put [360 upon a statute as will best answer the intention which the makers had in view, for qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice. In Bacon's Abridgment, Stat. 1, 5; Puffendorf, bk. 5, chap. 12; Rutherford, pp. 422, 527, and in Smith's Commentaries, 814, many cases are mentioned where it was held that matters embraced in the general words of statutes, nevertheless, were not within the statute, because it could not have been the intention of the lawmakers that they should be included. They were taken out of the statutes by an equitable construction. In some cases the letter of a legislative act is restrained by an equitable construction; in others it is enlarged; in others the construction is contrary to the letter. The equitable construction which restrains the letter of a statute is defined by Aristotle, as frequently quoted, in this manner: Æquitas est correctio legis generaliter latæ, qua parti deficit. Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 510 [5 L. R. A. 340], opinion, Earl, J.

Construing the act of Congress of 1866 under the circumstances above outlined, and in view of the general rules of construction already stated, we hold that the provisions of the 7th section of that act includes such a case as this. The purpose of the act is to quiet titles in California, and, as stated by the court below, it is a remedial statute and one entitled to a liberal construction in order to effect the purpose and object of its enactment. When the act, therefore, speaks of bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration of lands from Mexican grantees or assigns, which grants have subsequently been rejected, we do not think that the words "grantees" and "grants" should have such a rigid and technical construction as to require the actual existence of a formal grant from the government of Mexico, but we are of opinion the act should be construed in accordance with what we conceive to have been its plain purpose, which was to cover the case of those persons who in good faith and for a valuable consideration have purchased lands (and taken and retained their possession) from those who claimed and were supposed to be Mexican grantees, but whose claims had been subsequently rejected. Otherwise, it seems to us clear 361] that the purpose for which this *7th section was passed would be so circumscribed as to reduce it to much narrower limits than the known mischief to be remedied called for.

The circumstances existing at the time of the passage of this act necessarily lead to the belief that the purpose of its enactment was to remedy (by purchase of the land from the United States at the lowest rate) a defect in a title supposed to have been derived from the Mexican government, where the claimant had in good faith and for a valuable consideration purchased from one who claimed to be a Mexican grantee, or from his assigns, and where there was no adverse claim other than that of the United States. A remedial statute ought not to be so construed as to defeat in part the very purpose of its enactment. United States v. Hodson, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 395 [19: 937].

In the case now before us it appears there had been very strong parol evidence of the existence of an actual grant from the Mexican government, but it was not thought to be strong enough to overcome the absence of any record evidence of such a grant. We think that under the statute of 1866 record proof of the existence of a grant was not necessary in order to give the officers of the United States jurisdiction to issue the patent upon being satisfied of the existence of those facts in regard to which it was their province to determine. The act has received the same construction in the supreme court of California in the case of Bascomb v. Davis, 56 Cal. 152. The court there construed it so as to include those who in good faith and for a valuable consideration had purchased lands which were supposed to have been granted by the Mexican government, and who had used, improved, and continued in the actual possession of the lands as provided in the act. This construction by the California court is entitled to very high consideration, and especially is this so in a case where the act was directed to a condition of things in existence at the time of its passage and with which the courts of that state would be particularly familiar.

In Winona & St. Peter Railroad Co. v. Barney, 113 U. S. 618 [28: 1109], this court construed an act of Congress which alluded to lands "granted as aforesaid," as including lands purporting to have *been "granted as afore- [362 said," and this inclusion was made because the court was satisfied, taking all things into consideration, that such construction was what Congress meant. The court simply carried out that intention by supplying a word not found in the act.

For the reasons thus given we think this act includes those persons who in good faith and for a valuable consideration have purchased land from those who claimed and who were thought to be Mexican grantees or assigns, provided they fulfil the other conditions named in the act.

2. Coming to the conclusion we have, there is another objection made to the title on the part of the plaintiffs in error. They urge that the statute requires that the person who purchased the land should have made his purchase from the Mexican grantee or his assignee in good faith, and it is stated that as the defendant in error made his purchase from a remote grantee of the Romeros on the 15th of May, 1876, twenty years after the claim had been rejected by the commissioners appointed under the act of 1851, eighteen years after it had been rejected by the United States district court, and thirteen years after it had been rejected by this court, it was clear as a legal result from these facts that he could not be a purchaser in good faith.

It appears, however, that on the 8th of August, 1859, one S. P. Millett became a grantee and entered into the possession of the lands, used, improved, and cultivated them, and continued in the actual possession thereof according to the lines of the original purchase until 1868, and that the defendant in error claims through Millett by several mesne conveyances. Plaintiffs in error object that Millett was not a purchaser in good faith because he did not purchase until October, 1859, before which time the claim of the Romeros had been rejected by the commissioners and by the United States district court. An appeal from those decisions was pending at the date above mentioned before this court, and it was therein contended that the Romeros had a valid claim under the Mexican government such as should have been recognized by the commissioners and by the district court, and such as ought to be recognized by *the supreme [363 court. We do not think the facts thus stated show, as matter of law, that Millett could not have been a bona fide purchaser of these lands for a valuable consideration, and whether in fact he were such bona fide purchaser was a question to be determined by the government on issuing the patent, and an inquiry into that question of fact is precluded by the patent itself.

3. It is also objected that even if Millett were adjudged a purchaser in good faith from a Mexican grantee, he could not convey to another his right under the statute of 1866, but that it was a mere personal privilege which he might exercise to purchase the land at the minimum price established by law. We think that a person who was within the statute and who had the right to purchase land as provided therein was not confined to the actual purchase himself, but that he could assign or convey such right, and that his grantee, or assignee, immediate or remote, could, so far as this point is concerned, exercise the same right of purchase which he had before he conveyed or assigned.

In Thredgill v. Pintard, 53 U. S. 12 How. 24 [13: 877], the court recognized the right of an individual in possession of land and who was entitled to a pre-emption right therein to convey such right to another.

In Webster v. Luther, 163 U. S. 331 [41: 179], it was held that persons entitled, under the Revised Statutes, § 2304, to enter a homestead, who may have theretofore entered under the homestead laws a quantity of land less than 160 acres, and who had the right under § 2306 to make an additional entry for the deficiency, could transfer such right by a proper conveyance.

In the above cases the general rule of law which discourages all restraints upon alienation was recognized, and the assignment of a right before entry was held valid, one of the reasons for such holding being that there was no restriction against such assignment contained in the act creating the right. Nor is any such restriction to be found in the act of 1866.

Upon this question it must be assumed that Millett was a purchaser in good faith. Being 364] such a purchaser he could *assign his right and title to another, and the rights under such assignment were not affected by the fact that the defendant in error did not purchase his title until many years after the final determination by this court that no formal, actual, or valid grant had ever been made by the Mexican government to the Romeros.

4. We are also of opinion that the rejection by the Secretary of the Interior of the first application made by the defendant in error for a patent, and the subsequent granting of a rehearing and the issuing of a patent thereafter by the Secretary, were all acts within the jurisdiction of that officer. The fact that a decision refusing the patent was made by one Secretary of the Interior, and, upon a rehearing, a decision granting the patent was made by another Secretary of the Interior, is not material in a case like this. It is not a personal but an official hearing and decision, and it is made by the Secretary of the Interior as such Secretary, and not by an individual who happens at the time to fill that office, and the application for a rehearing may be made to the successor in office of the person who made the original decision, provided it could have been made to the latter had he remained in office. The Secretary who made the first decision herein could have granted a rehearing and reversed his former ruling.

The case of United States v. Stone [Stone v. United States], 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 525 [17: 765], has no bearing adverse to this proposition. In that case it was stated that a patent is but evidence of a grant, and the officer who issues it acts ministerially and not judicially; that if he issues a patent for land reserved from sale by law, such patent is void for want of authority, but that one officer of the land office is not competent to cancel or annul the act of his predecessor; that is a judicial act and requires the judgment of a court. The power to cancel or annul in that case meant the power to annul a patent issued by a predecessor, and this court held no such power existed. The officer originally issuing it would have had no greater power to annul the patent than had his successor.

Neither does Noble v. Union River Logging Railroad Company, 147 U. S. 165 [37: 123], *touch the case. The principle therein de-[365 cided was in substance the same as in the Stone Case, supra. The control of the department necessarily ceased the moment the title passed from the government. It was not a question whether a successor was able to do the act which the original officer might have done, but it was the announcement of the principle that no officer, after the title had actually passed, had any power over the matter whatever. After the Secretary of the Interior had approved the map as provided for in the act of Congress under which the proceedings were taken by the company, the 1st section of that act vested the right of way in the company. This was equivalent to a patent, and no revocation could thereafter be permitted. See also Michigan Land & Lumber Company v. Rust, 168 U. S. 589, at 592 [ante, 591, at 592].

We have considered the other questions raised herein but do not think any error was committed in their disposition by the courts below. The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals must be affirmed.

Submitted January 5, 1898. Decided February 28, 1898.

APPEAL from a judgment of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California sustaining a demurrer and dismissing the complaint of Josiah S. Smith, plaintiff, to restrain the defendant, Joseph H. Naphtaly, from setting up or asserting any right or claim to certain land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry F. Crane for appellant.

Messrs. A. T. Britton and A. B. Browne for appellee.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case, counsel for the appellant concedes that if the court should hold that the sale of the land mentioned in the patent involved in the foregoing case were a valid sale, then the judgment in this case should be affirmed. As we do so hold, the judgment herein is therefore affirmed.

HARVEY HARDY, Sheriff, etc.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 366-398.)

The right of contract may be limited by the state police power—protection of health and morals—state statute limiting hours of labor in mines and making its violation a misdemeanor is valid—parties to contract.

1. The right of contract is subject to certain limitations which the state may lawfully impose in the exercise of its police power.
2. The protection of the health and morals, as well as of the lives, of citizens, is within the police power of the state legislature.
3. A state statute limiting the period of employment of workmen in underground mines, or in the smelting, reduction, or refining of ores or metals, to eight hours per day, and making its violation a misdemeanor, is a valid exercise of the police power of the state.
4. The fact that both parties are of full age and competent to contract does not necessarily deprive the state of the power to interfere, where the parties do not stand upon an equality, or where the public health demands that one party to the contract shall be protected against himself.

Argued October 21, 1897. Decided February 28, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Utah to review judgments of that court denying application of Albert F. Holden for his discharge upon two writs of habeas corpus and remanding him to the custody of the sheriff of Salt Lake County; he having been convicted of a misdemeanor and sentenced to pay a fine and be imprisoned until the fine was paid for a violation of the Utah law regulating hours of employment in underground mines, etc. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

These were writs of error to review two judgments of the supreme court of the state of Utah, denying applications of the plaintiff in error, Holden, for his discharge upon two writs of habeas corpus, and remanding him to the custody of the sheriff of Salt Lake county.

The facts in case No. 264 were substantially as follows: On June 20, 1896, complaint was made to a justice of the peace of *Salt [367 Lake City that the petitioner Holden had unlawfully employed "one John Anderson to work and labor as a miner in the underground workings of the Old Jordan mine in Bingham cañon, in the county aforesaid, for the period of ten hours each day; and said defendant, on the date aforesaid and continuously since said time, has unlawfully required said John Anderson, under and by virtue of said employment, to work and labor in the underground workings of the mine aforesaid for the period of ten hours each day, and that said employment was not in case of an emergency or where life or property was in imminent danger, contrary," etc.

Defendant Holden, having been arrested upon a warrant issued upon said complaint, admitted the facts set forth therein, but said he was not guilty because he is a native-born citizen of the United States, residing in the state of Utah; that the said John Anderson voluntarily engaged his services for the hours per day alleged, and that the facts charged did not constitute a crime, because the act of the state of Utah, which creates and defines the supposed offense, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States in these respects:

"It deprives the defendant and all employers and employees of the right to make contracts in a lawful way and for lawful purposes;

"It is class legislation, and not equal or uniform in its provisions;

"It deprives the defendant and employers and employees of the equal protection of the laws; abridges the privileges and immunities of the defendant as a citizen of the United States, and deprives him of his property and liberty without due process of law."

The court, having heard the evidence, found the defendant guilty as charged in the complaint, imposed a fine of $50 and costs, and ordered that the defendant be imprisoned in the county jail for a term of fifty-seven days, or until such fine and costs be paid.

Thereupon petitioner sued out a writ of habeas corpus from the supreme court of the state, annexing a copy of the proceedings before the justice of the peace, and praying his *discharge. The supreme court denied [368 his application, and remanded him to the custody of the sheriff, whereupon he sued out this writ of error, assigning the unconstitutionality of the law.

In the second case the complaint alleged the unlawful employment by Holden of one William Hooley to work and labor in a certain concentrating mill, the same being an institution for the reduction of ores, for the period of twelve hours per day. The proceedings in this case were precisely the same as in the prior case, and it was admitted that there was no distinction in principle between the two cases.

Messrs. Jeremiah M. Wilson, C. W. Bennett, R. Harkness, A. Howat, and W. M. Bradley, for plaintiff in error:

In both of these cases is involved the constitutionality of the same statute of Utah, the only difference being that in one of them the defendant Holden was convicted of a violation of § 1 of said act, while in the other he was prosecuted and convicted under the 2d section. We will, therefore, in this brief, consider them together.

The statute of Utah is entitled "An Act Regulating the Hours of Employment in Underground Mines and in Smelters and Ore Reduction Works."

Utah Sess. Laws 1896, p. 219.

The said statute of Utah involved herein is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and is not a valid exercise of the police power of the state.

We ask the attention of the court to some of the most conspicuous of the authorities bearing upon the general question as to the scope of this police power, and as to the subjects relating to which it may properly be invoked.

We have not found in any of the text-books or cases an authoritative statement defining and limiting the exact scope and range of this power. In fact, this court itself in the case of Stone v. Mississippi, Harris, 101 U. S. 814 (25: 1079), has declined to specifically define it; but in the case of New York v. Miln, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 102, 139 (9: 648, 662), will be found probably as concise and comprehensive a general definition of the term as could be given The court says:

"We are aware that it is at all times difficult to define any subject with proper precision and accuracy; if this be so in general, it is emphatically so in relation to a subject so diversified and multifarious as the one which we are now considering [the police power]. If we were to attempt it, we should say that every law came within this description which concerned the welfare of the whole people of a state, or any individual within it; whether it related to their rights or their duties; whether it respected them as men, or as citizens of the state; whether in their public or private relations; whether it related to the rights of persons or of property of the whole people of a state or of any individual within it." The court, however, is careful to add that this jurisdiction or power can only be exercised where it is not "surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States."

Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 192, 22 Am. Rep 71.

The police power of a state is coextensive with self-protection, and is applicably termed the law of overruling necessity. It is the inherent and plenary power in the state which enables it to prohibit all things hurtful to the comfort and welfare of society.

Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 84; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465 (24: 527); State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 211; Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 149, 62 Am. Dec. 625; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 107, 50 Am. Rep. 636; Cooley, Const. Lim. 719; Potter's Dwarr. Stat. 458; Austin v. Murray, 16 Pick. 126; Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 319, 12 Am. Rep. 694; Coe v. Schultz, 47 Barb. 64; Re Cheesebrough, 78 N. Y. 232.

To be valid, legislation enacted for the purpose of promoting the public health, morals, or welfare must be of such a character that it will affect and be for the benefit of the whole community, or at least the part of it which is brought into contact with the evils sought to be remedied. Such an enactment must not be so limited in its terms that it can and will, as in the present case, operate upon but one of many classes of employers and employees of the same general description, living and doing business under the same general conditions, even though the occupation in which they are engaged to themselves may be injurious. In other words, it must relate and have reference to the result to the health and welfare of the community of the act or omission or the condition sought to be prevented or remedied, and not to the result of such act or omission to the author or person who is responsible for such condition or engaged in the dangerous or injurious occupation—that is, provided such person is sui juris and does not come within the class of persons (such as women, children, etc.), over which, as has been held in some of the states, the state has the right, to a limited extent, to exercise control for their own good and welfare, and thus indirectly for the welfare of the public.

It is, therefore, not within the power of the legislature to prevent persons who are sui juris, and otherwise perfectly competent to contract, from entering into employment and voluntarily making contracts in relation thereto merely because the employment in which they are to engage, although perfectly legal and proper in itself, may be considered by the legislature to be dangerous or injurious to the health of the employee; and if such right to contract cannot be prevented, it certainly cannot be restricted by the legislature to suit its own ideas of the ability of the employee to stand the physical and mental strain incident to the work. The character of the work to be performed, the number of hours a day in which the employee shall work, and the amount of compensation to be paid therefor are purely and necessarily personal matters between the parties to the contract, and are regulated by the terms thereof and by the will of the employer, influenced by considerations as to the requirements of his business and the condition of the market for his products, etc., and it is clear that, so long as the employment does not interfere with the rights or health of others, the legislature cannot prevent it or regulate any of its terms.

If, for any reason, the condition of the market should become such that there was no sale or demand for the product of an iron mine, for example, and the owner, in consequence of this condition, should find that he was running his business at a loss, it would be ridicutous to say that he would not have a perfect right to lay off some of his hands altogether, or to work them all half time, or arbitrarily to reduce the number of working hours of all to any extent he might think necessary or advisable; and if he could do that, we do not see why he could not, for the purpose of meeting an increased demand for the product of his mines and the competition from other sources, or if for any reason the condition of the market warranted it, increase the number of hours of his workmen to ten or any other number more than eight that they might be willing to work or contract with him for.

A case here directly in point is that of Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636, where the court had under consideration a law of New York prohibiting the manufacture of cigars and the preparation of tobacco in any form in tenement houses, etc. In the opinion the court says: "To justify this law it would not be sufficient that the use of tobacco may be injurious to some persons, or that its manipulation may be injurious to those who are engaged in its preparation and manufacture; but it would have to be injurious to the public health."

But, however this may be, it is well settled that, when relating to business enterprises, the business or occupation at which such regulations are directed must be affected with a "public interest," and that the regulation must be for the protection or benefit of the public generally, as we have above contended, and not of an individual or segregated class of individuals under the circumstances we have mentioned.

This court, in the case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 126 (24: 84), defines the property that is subject to policy regulations as follows: "Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence, and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created."

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 179; Cooley, Const. Lim. 720; People v. Jackson & M. Pl. Road Co. 9 Mich. 307.

In the case of United States v. Martin, 94 U. S. 400 (24: 128), in which this court was called upon to construe § 3738 of the Revised Statutes, providing that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for employees of the government, is was held that said statute was "in the nature of a direction from a principal to his agent, that eight hours is deemed to be a proper length of time for a day's labor, and that his contracts shall be based on that theory," but the court distinguishes between such a direction and the principle involved in the case at bar, as follows:

"The English statute books are full of assizes of bread and ale, commencing as early as the reign of Henry II., and regulations of labor and many such are to be found in the statutes of the several states. It is stated by Adam Smith, as the law in his day, that in Sheffield no master cutler or weaver or hatter could have more than two apprentices at a time, and so lately as 8 Geo. III. an act, which remained unrepealed until 1825, was passed, prohibiting, under severe penalties, all master tailors in London, or within 5 miles of it, from giving, or their workmen from accepting, more than two shillings sevenpence halfpenny a day, except in the case of general mourning. Smith, Wealth of Nations, 6th Oxford ed. of 1869, 125. A different theory is now almost universally adopted. Principals, so far as the law can give the power, are entitled to employ as many workmen, and of whatever degree of skill, and at whatever price, they think fit, and, except in some special cases, as of children or orphans, the hours of labor and the price to be paid are left to the determination of the parties interested. The statute of the United States does not interfere with this principle."

An enactment of the legislature, made in pursuance of the police power of a state, or a police regulation, must be for the purpose of enforcing a duty and to punish acts or omissions which may be right or wrong according to the time, place, or manner of doing them; that is, the exercise of what would otherwise be a right at a time, place, or in a manner, injurious to the public, is prohibited. A general criminal law is to punish something wrong in itself, without regard to the time, place, or manner of doing it, and of course such a law, whether enacted by original or delegated authority, is not a police regulation.

The violation of the maxim sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas covers every case in which the exercise of the police power would be valid or legitimate; and we think no case of a valid police regulation can be found which will not come under this maxim, and which does not refer to the limitation of the exercise of what, under proper circumstances, would be a right, and only becomes a wrong because of its excessive exercise or consequent injury to the health, welfare, or morals of the public. Police regulations are therefore not enacted for the purpose of punishing wrongs, as such, but to enforce duties to the public in respect to matters which can only become wrongs sub modo. The right to destroy property to stay a conflagration, and in case of war, etc., is also distinguishable, and is based upon the maxim salus populi suprema lex. So of the right of eminent domain; though exercised for a public use, it is based on compensation. In a police regulation, there is only restraint for the public welfare.

The owner of the property or business undoubtedly has the right on his own property and in his own business to work as many hours per day as he chooses, to manufacture whatever articles he may choose to manufacture, to operate a mine, or to do anything which he may deem necessary to the conduct of his business, whether the same be unwholesome or dangerous or not, provided the health, welfare, or morals of the public generally are not injuriously affected thereby.

If, therefore, the Constitution of the state requires the legislature to enact laws respecting the health of miners and others, the law, to be valid, must relate to the duty of the employer to his employees in the respects we have indicated, and must not interfere with the relation of the parties that rests solely on contract.

The present law has no relation to health or safety, either to the public or the persons affected, or, if so, only in a very remote degree; while its direct and principal effect is to interfere with the rights and liberties of the contracting parties.

It is apparent that if the police power extends to matters affecting contract relations and in which the public health, etc., is in no way concerned, there is practically no limit to its exercise, and all business conducted in the states, whether of a quasi public, public, or strictly private nature, could be made subject to such laws regulative thereof as the legislatures of the respective states might see fit to adopt, and the personal liberty of the citizens, secured to him by the Constitution of the United States, would be entirely subverted.

In this connection we desire to suggest that the constitutionality of this statute must be considered in the light of its effect upon the class of persons upon whom it operates, and upon the relation of the prohibition thercin contained to the general public. When this is taken into consideration it is apparent that, even if by any possibility it could fairly be said (as was assumed and said by the court below) that the enforcement of the provisiou contained in said measure could be conducive of the health or welfare of the employees enumerated therein, and in that respect is not unconstitutional, still it is so flagrantly violative of the rights and liberties of the citizens affected thereby—both of the employer and employee—that it is brought in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States, if not with the Constitution of Utah, and cannot for that reason be allowed to stand.

Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 268 (23: 548); Rutherford v. Greene, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 203 (4: 220).

It is said in the latter case: "Whatever the legislative power may be, its acts ought never to bc so construed as to subvert the rights of property, unless its intention so to do shall be expressed in such terms as to admit of no doubt, and to show a clear design to effect the object."

Even if this act can fairly be assumed to have been a measure adopted by the legislature of Utah for the protection of the health or welfare of the class of persons affected thereby, it is, nevertheless, unconstitutional, because, when actually applied, it is found to be in contravention of the principles, and destructive of the rights and liberties, of the citizen to which we have above pointed. To repeat the language of this court in Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 635 (29: 753), varying it slightly to suit the circumstances of this case, we have no doubt that the legislature, in enacting this statute, "was actuated by perfectly proper motives," but we presume that "the vast accumulation of public business brought before it sometimes prevents it, on a first presentation, from noticing objections which become developed by time and the practical application of the objectionable law."

The statute in question abridges privileges and immunities of the plaintiff in error to which he is entitled as a citizen of the United States.

The plaintiff in error in this case is a native-born citizen of the United States, and was at the time of his arrest, and now is, a citizen of the state of Utah, and as such was and is entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States as secured to them by the Constitution.

Among the privileges and immunities secured to the citizen by the 14th Amendment is the right "to pursue unmolested a lawful employment in a lawful manner."

Live Stock Dealers & B. Asso. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 1 Abb. (U. S.) 388, 389.

Incidental to this there is, of course, the further right to enter into contracts relating to the character of the services to be performed, the amount of compensation to be paid and received therefor, and the period of time or the number of hours per day required to perform such labor.

The allowance to the employer of labor, and the working man, of perfect freedom and liberty in this respect is absolutely and manifestly essential in this age of constant progress in business affairs and of great and increasing competition, to enable the employer and laborer, alike, to maintain life and to render any legitimate employment or business in which they may be engaged successful. Whatever may be the wisdom or necessity for enacting laws restrictive of the hours of labor of women, children, or orphans, or the advisability of enacting such laws with reference to the employees in the various kinds of business enterprises that are held to be affected with a public interest, it is perfectly obvious, because of their great diversity and the character and necessities of the different kinds of private business enterprises, that it would be impossible to devise a law or regulation limiting the hours of employment of such employees that would operate with any degree of equality or with anything like justice upon the employers and employees in all private business enterprises, or even those of the same general class.

In the Constitution of the state of Utah itself this distinction is recognized, and only the hours of work of employees of the "state, county, and municipal governments" are attempted to be regulated thereby, the law here in question being claimed to have been authorized and passed under the additional provision that "the legislature shall pass laws to provide for the health and safety of employees in factories, smelters, and mines." The law, however, fails to make any such provision with reference to employees in factories.

As we have seen, such laws as to public employees are regarded by the courts merely as directions from a principal to his agent, and as such are held to be competent; but, in the case of private employment or labor, as so aptly stated by this court, "principals, so far as the law can give the power, are entitled to employ as many workmen, and of whatever degree of skill, and at whatever price, they think fit, and, except in some special cases, as of children or orphans, the hours of labor and the price to be paid are left to the determination of the parties interested."

United States v. Martin, 94 U. S. 400 (24: 128).

Applying the principle last stated to the present case, it cannot be said that an act making it a misdemeanor for a private and independent mine operator to employ his workmen more than eight hours a day, except in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger, and subjecting him to fine and imprisonment in consequence of a violation of such provision, does not infringe or abridge the right of both the employer and laborer, to make contracts which persons and corporations in other lines of business may make, and that it does not abridge the privileges and immunities so secured to them as citizens of the United States.

We now turn to some of the authorities supporting our present contention, from which it will be seen that, while the courts do not attempt specifically and in detail to enumerate and define all of these privileges and immunities, they are practically unanimous in holding that the right to pursue, in a lawful manner, a lawful vocation or trade, unmolested by laws in any way restrictive of that right, is a privilege that is protected and secured to the citizen by the Constitution of the United States.

Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 430 (20: 453); Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 97 (21: 415).

It is said in the dissenting opinion of Justice Field in the latter case: "The privileges and immunities designated are those which of right belong to the citizens of all free governments Clearly among these must be placed the right to pursue a lawful employment in a lawful manner, without other restraint than such as equally affects all persons."

The right to follow any of the ordinary callings of life is one of the privileges of a citizen of the United States.

Ex parte Kuback, 85 Cal. 274, 9 L. R. A. 482.

A city cannot be justified in making it a misdemeanor for any of its citizens to contract with another for services to be rendered because the contract is that he shall work more than a limited number of hours per day.

Ex parte Kuback, 85 Cal 274, 9 L. R. A. 482.

It is not competent for the legislature to single out the mining, manufacturing, and smelting industries of the state and impose upon them restrictions with reference to the hours of their employment from which other employers of labor are exempt.

Re Eight Hours Bill, 21 Colo. 29.

The right of parties to make their own contracts is a right guaranteed by our Bill of Rights and protected by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

When the subject of contract is purely and exclusively private, unaffected by any public interest or duty to person, society, or government, and the parties are capable of contracting, there is no condition existing upon which the legislature can interfere for the purpose of prohibiting the contract or controlling the terms thereof.

The right to labor is, of all others, after the right to live, the fundamental, inalienable right of man of which he cannot be deprived under the guise of law, or otherwise, except by usurpation or force.

Re Tiburcio Parrott, 1 Fed. Rep. 481.

This statute is also violative of the provision of the 14th Amendment that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

What we have already said is sufficient to show that under the operation of the law all other persons in the state, no matter in what business or occupation they may be engaged, are left entirely at liberty to make whatever contracts they please in respect of the character of the work to be performed, the amount to be paid therefor, and the number of hours that shall constitute a day's work in all occupations which by the law of the land are properly the subjects of contract.

The act in the case at bar, in §§ 1 and 2, says that eight hours shall constitute a day's work only for those who are employed in underground mines or workings, smelters and other institutions for the reduction or refining of ores, and, in § 3, says, that "any person, body corporate, agent, manager, or employer who shall violate any of the provisions of §§ 1 and 2 of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." This comparatively small class of people is in terms singled out by the legislature, made to bear this unjustifiable and unequal burden, and deprived of liberties and rights of property that are enjoyed by every other citizen in the state who is engaged in any of the vast number of employments not enumerated in the act, and which by the law of the land they are protected in the enjoyment of and have the right in the courts to enforce.

This free and unrestricted right to engage in any calling that is permitted under the law, and to make necessary and lawful contracts with reference thereto, is one of the fundamental and inalienable rights of the citizen, without which, of course, no condition of social, commercial, or financial prosperity could exist in a community or state that is in any way dependent on other communities or states for an interchange of commodities or commerce, and must therefore be free in this country to all alike upon the same conditions. The right to pursue "such callings" without let or hindrance, except that which is applied to all persons of the same age, sex, and condition, is a distinguishing privilege of citizens of the United States, and an essential element of that freedom which they claim as their birthright for "the property which every man has is his own labor, and, as it is the original foundation of all other property, so it is the most sacred and inviolable.

Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 746 (28: 585); 1 Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, chap. 10.

It is no reply to this petition to say, as was said by counsel for the state in the court below, that the right of contract of the plaintiff in error is not really abridged by this law because if as much work cannot be accomplished by the same number of laborers in eight hours a day as in ten a greater number of men can be employed, or that two sets of workmen can be employed, the one to begin after the other has completed its allotted time.

Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 439 (6: 685).

If the legislature can prohibit the employment of laborers in mines and smelters for more than eight hours a day, it can prohibit such employment for more than one or any other number of hours.

Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 635 (29: 746, 753).

The due process of law of which the plaintiff in error claims to have been denied is the arbitrary deprivation by the legislature, without trial or constitutional right, of those liberties and rights of property which were possessed by him before the passage of the act, and which are possessed by all other citizens of the state engaged in any other business or occupation and in the enjoyment of which they are protected in the courts by the law of the land.

Rep. 869; Janes v. Reynolds, 2 Tex. 251; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 432; Vanzant v. Waddel, 2 Yerg. 269.

Blackstone, in his classification of fundamental rights, says: "The third absolute right inherent in every Englishman is that of property, which consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land."

All laws, therefore, which impair or trammel these rights, which limit one in his choice of a trade or profession, or confine him to work or live in a specified locality, or exclude him from his own house, or restrain his otherwise lawful movements, are infringements upon the fundamental rights of liberty, which are under constitutional protection.

The manner in which the law discriminates against one class of employers and employees and in favor of all others places it in opposition to the guaranties hereinbefore discussed, and renders it invalid.

The privilege of contracting is both a liberty and a property right, and if A is denied the right to contract and acquire property in a manner which he has hitherto enjoyed under the law, and which B, C, and D are still allowed by the law to enjoy, it is clear that he is deprived of both liberty and property to the extent that he is thus denied the right to contract.

From the above it will be seen that in Colorado, Nebraska, California, and Illinois laws substantially similar to that in question have been held unconstitutional and void by the highest courts of those states, and that in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Missouri, West Virginia, Maryland, Arkansas, Texas, Vermont, and many of the remaining states of the Union, laws so nearly analogous in principle to this statute that we deem them conclusive of the question have likewise been so held.

Indeed, the three essential and indispensable elements of that perfectly free and unrestricted right of the citizen to contract with reference to all lawful pursuits in which he may desire to engage, which is guaranteed and protected by the Constitution of the United States, and to which we have above pointed, namely, the right of the employer and the employee to agree upon (1) the character of the services to be performed, (2) the amount to be paid for such service, and (3) the number of hours per day during which the service is to continue, are constantly grouped together in the authorities, and are manifestly so inseparably connected with each other that the destruction or abridgment of one is a destruction or abridgment of the whole of said right of contract; and, therefore, any decision holding that such destruction or abridgment of one of these elements is unconstitutional must necessarily apply to and control all questions as to the constitutionality of the others.

We have nowhere found a decision of any court upholding such a law as the one here involved, or any law analogous thereto, except in the cases we have enumerated, and which we contend are clearly distinguishable from the present case, namely: (a) cases where the law was enacted for the purpose of limiting the hours of employment of public employees, in which case this court has held that such a law is valid because merely in the nature of a direction from a principal to his agent; (b) cases where such laws are enacted with regard to employments affected with a public interest; and (c) in the case of statutes which, although limiting the hours of employment, are enacted for the protection of the health or safety of women, children, insane persons, and the like, which last are generally, though not universally (Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79), regarded as a valid exercise of the police power for the reasons we have already stated.

Relying, therefore, upon these authorities, and upon the indication of the opinion of this court above quoted from the case of the United States v. Martin, 94 U. S. 400 (24: 128), we respectfully submit that the judgment and order of the court below remanding plaintiff in error to the custody of the defendant, and denying his discharge from such custody, should be reversed.

Messrs. Charles J. Pence and John H. Murphy, for defendant in error:

When the constitutionality of a statute is questioned the presumption always exists in favor of the validity of the law until its unconstitutionality is shown clearly and beyond doubt, and if there be a doubt in the mind of the court it must be determined in favor of the validity of the statute.

The right of the judiciary to declare a statute void and to arrest its execution is one which is coupled with a responsibility so grave that it is never to be exercised except in very clear cases. One department of the government is bound to presume that another has acted rightly. The party who wishes us to pronounce a law unconstitutional takes upon himself the burden of proving beyond a doubt that it is so.

That the law may seem unreasonable, oppressive, or absurd, or that there may be objections to its policy or expediency, is not sufficient to justify its judicial repeal. These are matters for which the legislature must shortly answer to its constituents who can correct them. It must be in direct conflict with some expressed prohibition of the Constitution.

Few laws reach directly the whole community. We have seen no decision holding that a law must reach and affect directly every citizen. Each law is designed and necessarily so framed as to correct some particular evil or to enforce some particular right. While, as a whole, the statutes furnish fair protection against wrong, each statute by itself covers but a small field and directly affects but few persons.

Statutes to remedy a particular evil must, of necessity, apply only to the particular class of persons committing the offense.

Counsel argues that though it may be a health regulation it is unconstitutional because "it restricts the earnings of the employee to what he may be able to obtain from his employer for eight hours' work, and prevents him from earning the additional pay which he would be entitled to if he worked more than eight hours a day."

Even if this were the necessary effect of the law it would be a proper health regulation for preserving to a citizen his ability to work and support himself is not only humane but is preventing a burden on the people.

But there is nothing in the Utah statute to prevent his working as many hours as he may wish on the surface.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves the constitutionality of an act of the legislature of Utah of March 30, 1896, chap. 72, entitled "An Act Regulating the Hours of Employment in Underground Mines and in Smelters and Ore Reduction Works." The following are the material provisions:

"Sec. 1. The period of employment of workingmen in all underground mines or workings shall be eight hours per day, except in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger.

"Sec. 2. The period of employment of workingmen in smelters and all other institutions for the reduction or refining of ores or metals shall be eight hours per day, except in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger.

"Sec. 3. Any person, body corporate, agent, manager, or employer, who shall violate any of the provisions of sections one and two of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The supreme court of Utah was of opinion that if authority in the legislature were needed for the enactment of the statute in question, it was found in that part of article 16 of the Constitution of the state, which declared that "the 381]legislature shall *pass laws to provide for the health and safety of employees in factories, smelters, and mines." As the article deals exclusively with the rights of labor, it is here reproduced in full as exhibiting the authority under which the legislature acted, and as throwing light upon its intention in enacting the statute in question (Laws 1896, p. 219):

"Sec. 1. The rights of labor shall have just protection through laws calculated to promote the industrial welfare of the state.

"Sec. 2. The legislature shall provide by law for a board of labor, conciliation, and arbitration which shall fairly represent the interests of both capital and labor. The board shall perform duties and receive compensation as prescribed by law.

"Sec. 3. The legislature shall prohibit:

"1. The employment of women, or of children under the age of fourteen years, in underground mines.

"2. The contracting of convict labor.

"3. The labor of convicts outside prison grounds, except on public works under the direct control of the state.

"4. The political and commercial control of employees.

"Sec. 4. The exchange of blacklists by railroad companies, or other corporations, associations, or persons is prohibited.

"Sec. 5. The right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall never be abrogated, and the amount recoverable shall not be subject to any statutory limitation.

"Sec. 6. Eight hours shall constitute a day's work on all works or undertakings carried on or aided by the state, county, or municipal governments; and the legislature shall pass laws to provide for the health and safety of employees in factories, smelters, and mines.

"Sec. 7. The legislature, by appropriate legislation, shall provide for the enforcement of the provisions of this article."

The validity of the statute in question is, however, challenged upon the ground of an alleged violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it abridges the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; deprives both the employer and the *laborer of his property [382 without due process of law, and denies to them the equal protection of the laws. As the three questions of abridging their immunities, depriving them of their property, and denying them the protection of the laws, are so connected that the authorities upon each are, to a greater or less extent, pertinent to the others, they may properly be considered together.

Prior to the adoption of the 14th Amendment there was a similar provision against deprivation of life, liberty, or property without due process of law incorporated in the 5th Amendment; but as the first eight amendments to the Constitution were obligatory only upon Congress, the decisions of this court under this amendment have but a partial application to the 14th Amendment, which operates only upon the action of the several states. The 14th Amendment, which was finally adopted July 28, 1868, largely expanded the power of the Federal courts and Congress, and for the first time authorized the former to declare invalid all laws and judicial decisions of the states abridging the rights of citizens or denying them the benefit of due process of law.

This amendment was first called to the attention of this court in 1872, in an attack upon the constitutionality of a law of the state of Louisiana, passed in 1869, vesting in a slaughter-house company therein named the sole and exclusive privilege of conducting and carrying on a live-stock landing and slaughter-house business, within certain limits specified in the act, and requiring all animals intended for sale and slaughter to be landed at their wharves or landing places. Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36 [21: 394]. While the court in that case recognized the fact that the primary object of this amendment was to secure to the colored race, then recently emancipated, the full enjoyment of their freedom, the further fact that it was not restricted to that purpose was admitted both in the prevailing and dissenting opinions, and the validity of the act was sustained as a proper police regulation for the health and comfort of the people. A majority of the cases, which have since arisen, have turned, not upon a denial to the colored race of rights therein secured to 383]them, but upon alleged *discriminations in matters entirely outside of the political relations of the parties aggrieved.

These cases may be divided, generally, into two classes: First, where a state legislature, or a state court, is alleged to have unjustly discriminated in favor of or against a particular individual or class of individuals, as distinguished from the rest of the community, or denied them the benefit of due process of law; second, where the legislature has changed its general system of jurisprudence by abolishing what had been previously considered necessary to the proper administration of justice, or the protection of the individual.

Among those of the first class, which, for the sake of brevity, may be termed unjust discriminations, are those wherein the colored race was alleged to have been denied the right of representation upon juries (Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303 [25: 664]; Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313 [25: 667]; Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339 [25: 676]; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370 [26: 567]; Bush v. Kentucky, 107 U. S. 110 [27: 354]; Gibson v. Mississippi, 162 U. S. 565 [40: 1075]), as well as those wherein the state was charged with oppressing and unduly discriminating against persons of the Chinese race (Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27 [28: 923]; Soon Hing v. Cowley, 113 U. S. 703 [28: 1145]; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 [30: 220], and Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275 [23: 550], and those wherein it was sought under this Amendment to enforce the right of women to suffrage and to admission to the learned professions. Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 162 [22: 627]; Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 130 [21: 442].

To this class are also referable all those cases wherein the state courts were alleged to have denied to particular individuals the benefit of due process of law secured to them by the statutes of the state (Re Converse, 137 U. S. 624 [34: 796]; Arrowsmith v. Harmoning, 118 U. S. 194 [30: 243]), as well as that other large class, to be more specifically mentioned hereafter, wherein the state legislature was charged with having transcended its proper police power in assuming to legislate for the health or morals of the community.

Cases arising under the second class, wherein a state has chosen to change its methods of 384]trial to meet a popular demand *for simpler and more expeditious forms of administering justice, are much less numerous, though of even greater importance, than the others. A reference to a few of these cases may not be inappropriate in this connection. Thus in Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90 [23: 678], which was an action brought by a colored man against the keeper of a coffee-house in New Orleans for refusing him refreshments in violation of the Constitution of the state securing to the colored race equal rights and privileges in such cases, a statute of the state provided that such cases should be tried by jury, if either party demanded it, but if the jury failed to agree the case should be submitted to the judge, who should decide the same. It was held that a trial by jury was not a privilege or immunity of citizenship which the states were forbidden to abridge, but the requirement of due process of law was met if the trial was had according to the settled course of judicial proceedings. "Due process of law," said Chief Justice Waite, "is process due according to the law of the land. This process in the states is regulated by the law of the state." This law was held not to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Similar rulings with regard to the necessity of a jury, or of a judicial trial in special proceedings, were made in Kennard v. Louisiana, Morgan, 92 U. S. 480 [23: 478]; McMillan v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37 [24: 335]; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97 [24: 616]; Walston v. Nevin, 128 U. S. 578 [32: 544]; Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265 [27: 552].

In Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516 [28: 232], it was held that due process of law did not necessarily require an indictment by a grand jury in a prosecution by a state for murder. The Constitution of California authorized prosecutions for felonies by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, without an indictment by a grand jury, in the discretion of the legislature. It was held that conviction upon such an information, followed by sentence of death, was not illegal under the 14th Amendment.

In Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68 [30: 578], it was held that a statute of a state which provided that, in capital cases, in cities having a population of over 100,000 inhabitants, the state *shall be allowed fifteen peremptory 385 challenges to jurors, while elsewhere in the state it was allowed only eight peremptory challenges, did not deny to a person tried for murder, in a city containing over 100,000 inhabitants, the equal protection of the laws enjoined by the 14th Amendment, and that there was no error in refusing to limit the state's peremptory challenges to eight.

In Missouri P. Railway Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205 [32: 107], it was said that a statute in Kansas abolishing the fellow-servant doctrine as applied to railway accidents, did not deny to railroads the equal protection of the laws, and was not in conflict with the 14th Amendment. The same ruling was made with reference to statutes requiring railways to erect and maintain fences and cattle guards, and make them liable in double the amount of damages claimed for the want of them.

In Hallinger v. Davis, 146 U. S. 314 [36: 986], it was held that a state statute conferring upon an accused person the right to waive a trial by jury and to elect to be tried by the court, and conferring power upon the court to try the accused in such case, was not a violation of the due process clause of the 14th Amendment.

So, in Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436 [34: 519], it was held that the law providing for capital punishment by electricity was not repugnant to this Amendment. And in Duncan v. Mis- souri, 152 U. S. 377 [38:485], it was said that the prescribing of different modes of procedure and the abolition of courts, and the creation of new ones, leaving untouched all the substantial protections with which the existing law surrounds persons accused of crime, are not considered within the constitutional inhibition. See also Re Medley, Petitioner, 134 U. S. 160 [33:835], and Holden v. Minnesota, 137 U. S. 484 [34:734].

An examination of both these classes of cases under the 14th Amendment will demonstrate that, in passing upon the validity of state legislation under that Amendment, this court has not failed to recognize the fact that the law is to a certain extent a progressive science; that in some of the states methods of procedure which, at the time the Constitution was 386] *adopted, were deemed essential to the protection and safety of the people, or to the liberty of the citizen, have been found to be no longer necessary; that restrictions which had formerly been laid upon the conduct of individuals, or of classes of individuals, had proved detrimental to their interests; while, upon the other hand, certain other classes of persons, particularly those engaged in dangerous or unhealthful employments, have been found to be in need of additional protection. Even before the adoption of the Constitution, much had been done toward mitigating the severity of the common law, particularly in the administration of its criminal branch. The number of capital crimes in this country, at least, had been largely decreased. Trial by ordeal and by battle had never existed here, and had fallen into disuse in England. The earlier practice of the common law, which denied the benefit of witnesses to a person accused of felony, had been abolished by statute, though so far as it deprived him of the assistance of counsel and compulsory process for the attendance of his witnesses, it had not been changed in England. But to the credit of her American colonies let it be said, that so oppressive a doctrine had never obtained a foothold there.

The present century has originated legal reforms of no less importance. The whole fabric of special pleading, once thought to be necessary to the elimination of the real issue between the parties, has crumbled to pieces. The ancient tenures of real estate have been largely swept away, and land is now transferred almost as easily and cheaply as personal property. Married women have been emancipated from the control of their husbands and placed upon a practical equality with them with respect to the acquisition, possession, and transmission of property. Imprisonment for debt has been abolished. Exemptions from execution have been largely added to, and in most of the states homesteads are rendered incapable of seizure and sale upon forced process. Witnesses are no longer incompetent by reason of interest, even though they be parties to the litigation. Indictments have been simplified, and an indictment for the most serious of crimes is now the simplest of all. In 387] several of the states grand *juries, formerly the only safeguard against a malicious prosecution, have been largely abolished, and in others the rule of unanimity, so far as applied to civil cases, has given way to verdicts rendered by a three-fourths majority. This case does not call for an expression of opinion as to the wisdom of these changes, or their validity under the 14th Amendment, although the substitution of prosecution by information in lieu of indictment was recognized as valid in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516 [28:232]. They are mentioned only for the purpose of calling attention to the probability that other changes of no less importance may be made in the future, and that while the cardinal principles of justice are immutable, the methods by which justice is administered are subject to constant fluctuation, and that the Constitution of the United States, which is necessarily and to a large extent inflexible and exceedingly difficult of amendment, should not be so construed as to deprive the states of the power to so amend their laws as to make them conform to the wishes of the citizens as they may deem best for the public welfare without bringing them into conflict with the supreme law of the land.

Of course, it is impossible to forecast the character or extent of these changes, but in view of the fact that, from the day Magna Charta was signed to the present moment, amendments to the structure of the law have been made with increasing frequency, it is impossible to suppose that they will not continue, and the law be forced to adapt itself to new conditions of society, and, particularly, to the new relations between employers and employees, as they arise.

Similar views have been heretofore expressed by this court. Thus in the case of Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 31 [25:989, 992], it was said by Mr. Justice Bradley: "We might go still further, and say, with undoubted truth, that there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent any state from adopting any system of laws or judicature it sees fit for all or any part of its territory. If the state of New York, for example, should see fit to adopt the civil law and its method of procedure for New York city and the surrounding counties, and the common law and its methods of procedure for the rest of the *state, there is nothing in the [388 Constitution of the United States to prevent its doing so. This would not of itself, within the meaning of the 14th Amendment, be a denial to any person of the equal protection of the laws. . . . The 14th Amendment does not profess to secure to all persons in the United States the benefit of the same laws and the same remedies. Great diversities in these respects may exist in two states separated only by an imaginary line. On one side of this line there may be a right of trial by jury, and on the other no such right. Each state prescribes its own modes of judicial proceeding. If diversities of laws and judicial proceedings may exist in the several states without violating the equality clause in the 14th Amendment, there is no solid reason why there may not be such diversities in different parts of the same state."

The same subject was also elaborately discussed by Mr. Justice Matthews in delivering the opinion of this court in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 530 [28:232, 237]: "This flexibility and capacity for growth and adaptation is the peculiar boast and excellence of the common law. . . . The Constitution of the United States was ordained, it is true, by descendants of Englishmen, who inherited the traditions of English law and history; but it was made for an undefined and expanding future, and for a people gathered and to be gathered from many nations and of many tongues. And while we take just pride in the principles and institutions of the common law, we are not to forget that in lands where other systems of jurisprudence prevail, the ideas and processes of civil justice are also not unknown. Due process of law, in spite of the absolutism of continental governments, is not alien to that code which survived the Roman Empire as the foundation of modern civilization in Europe, and which has given us that fundamental maxim of distributive justice—suum cuique tribuere. There is nothing in Magna Charta, rightly construed as a broad charter of public right and law, which ought to exclude the best ideas of all systems and of every age; and as it was the characteristic principle of the common law to draw its inspiration from every foun-389 tain of justice, we* are not to assume that the sources of its supply have been exhausted. On the contrary, we should expect that the new and various experience of our own situation and system will mould and shape it into new and not less useful forms." We have seen no reason to doubt the soundness of these views. In the future growth of the nation, as heretofore, it is not impossible that Congress may see fit to annex territories whose jurisprudence is that of the civil law. One of the considerations moving to such annexation might be the very fact that the territory so annexed should enter the Union with its traditions, laws, and systems of administration unchanged. It would be a narrow construction of the Constitution to require them to abandon these, or to substitute for a system, which represented the growth of generations of inhabitants, a jurisprudence with which they had had no previous acquaintance or sympathy.

We do not wish, however, to be understood as holding that this power is unlimited. While the people of the state may doubtless adopt such systems of laws as best conform to their own traditions and customs, the people of the entire country have laid down in the Constitution of the United States certain fundamental principles to which each member of the Union is bound to accede as a condition of its admission as a state. Thus, the United States are bound to guarantee to each state a republican form of government, and the 10th section of the 1st article contains certain other specified limitations upon the power of the several states, the object of which was to secure to Congress paramount authority with respect to matters of universal concern. In addition, the 14th Amendment contains a sweeping provision forbidding the states from abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and denying them the benefit of due process or equal protection of the laws.

This court has never attempted to define with precision the words "due process of law," nor is it necessary to do so in this case. It is sufficient to say that there are certain immutable principles of justice which inhere in the very idea of free government which no member of the Union may disregard,* as that no man[390 shall be condemned in his person or property without due notice and an opportunity of being heard in his defense. What shall constitute due process of law was perhaps as well stated by Mr. Justice Curtis in Den, Murray's Lessees, v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 272, 276 [15:372, 374], as anywhere. He said: "The Constitution contains no description of those processes which it was intended to allow or forbid. It does not even declare what principles are to be applied to ascertain whether it be due process. It is manifest that it was not left to the legislative power to enact any process which might be devised. The article is a restraint on the legislative as well as on the executive and judicial powers of the government, and cannot be so construed as to leave Congress free to make any process 'due process of law,' by its mere will. To what principles, then, are we to resort to ascertain whether this process, enacted by Congress, is due process? To this the answer must be twofold. We must examine the Constitution itself, to see whether this process be in conflict with any of its provisions. If not found to be so, we must look to those settled usages and modes of proceeding existing in the common and statute law of England, before the emigration of our ancestors, and which are shown not to have been unsuited to their civil and political condition by having been acted on by them after the settlement of this country."

It was said by Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of this court in Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97 [24:616], that the words "law of the land," as used in Magna Charta, implied a conformity with the "ancient and customary laws of the English people," and that it was wiser to ascertain their intent and application by the "gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasoning on which such decisions may be founded." Recognizing the difficulty in defining, with exactness, the phrase "due process of law," it is certain that these words imply a conformity with natural and inherent principles of justice, and forbid that one man's property, or right to property, shall be taken for the benefit of another, or for the benefit of the state, without compensation; and *that[391 no one shall be condemned in his person or property without an opportunity of being heard in his own defense.

As the possession of property, of which a person cannot be deprived, doubtless implies that such property may be acquired, it is safe to say that a state law, which undertakes to deprive any class of persons of the general power to acquire property, would also be obnoxious to the same provision. Indeed, we may go a step further, and say that as property can only be legally acquired as between living persons by contract, that a general prohibition against entering into contracts with respect to property, or having as their object the acquisition of property, would be equally invalid.

The latest utterance of this court upon this subject is contained in the case of Allgeyer v.

Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 591 [41: 832, 836], in which it was held that an act of Louisiana which prohibited individuals within the state from making contracts of insurance with corporations doing business in New York, was a violation of the 14th Amendment. In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Peckham remarked: "In the privilege of pursuing an ordinary calling or trade, and of acquiring, holding, and selling property, must be embraced the right to make all proper contracts in relation thereto, and although it may be conceded that this right to contract in relation to persons or property or to do business within the jurisdiction of the state may be regulated and sometimes prohibited when the contracts or business conflict with the policy of the state as contained in its statutes, yet the power does not and cannot extend to prohibiting a citizen from making contracts of the nature involved in this case outside of the limits and jurisdiction of the state, and which are also to be performed outside of such jurisdiction."

This right of contract, however, is itself subject to certain limitations which the state may lawfully impose in the exercise of its police powers. While this power is inherent in all governments, it has doubtless been greatly expanded in its application during the past century, owing to an enormous increase in the number of occupations which are dangerous, or so far detrimental to the health of em-392]ployees as to demand *special precaution for their well-being and protection, or the safety of adjacent property. While this court has held, notably in the cases of Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97 [24: 616], and Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 [30: 220], that the police power cannot be put forward as an excuse for oppressive and unjust legislation, it may be lawfully resorted to for the purpose of preserving the public health, safety, or morals, or the abatement of public nuisances, and a large discretion "is necessarily vested in the legislature to determine, not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests." Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 136 [38: 385, 388].

The extent and limitations upon this power are admirably stated by Chief Justice Shaw in the following extract from his opinion in Commonwealth v. Alger, 7 Cush. 84:

"We think it a settled principle, growing out of the nature of well-ordered civil society, that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated that it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. All property in this commonwealth, as well that in the interior as that bordering on tide waters, is derived directly or indirectly from the government, and held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare. Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as will prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law, as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient."

This power legitimately exercised can neither be limited by contract nor bartered away by legislation.

While this power is necessarily inherent in every form of government, it was, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, but sparingly used in this country. As we were then almost *purely an agricultural people, the occa-[393 sion for any special protection of a particular class did not exist. Certain profitable employments, such as lotteries and the sale of intoxicating liquors, which where then considered to be legitimate, have since fallen under the ban of public opinion, and are now either altogether prohibited, or made subject to stringent police regulations. The power to do this has been repeatedly affirmed by this court. Stone v. Mississippi, Harris, 101 U. S. 814 [25: 1079]; Douglas v. Kentucky, 168 U. S. 488 [ante, 189]; Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 657 [37: 599]; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1 [32: 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232]; Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86 [34: 620].

While the business of mining coal and manufacturing iron began in Pennsylvania as early as 1716, and in Virginia, North Carolina, and Massachusetts even earlier than this, both mining and manufacturing were carried on in such a limited way and by such primitive methods that no special laws were considered necessary, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, for the protection of the operatives, but, in the vast proportions which these industries have since assumed, it has been found that they can no longer be carried on with due regard to the safety and health of those engaged in them, without special protection against the dangers necessarily incident to these employments. In consequence of this, laws have been enacted in most of the states designed to meet these exigencies and to secure the safety of persons peculiarly exposed to these dangers. Within this general catagory are ordinances providing for fire escapes for hotels, theaters, factories, and other large buildings, a municipal inspection of boilers, and appliances designed to secure passengers upon railways and steamboats against the dangers necessarily incident to these methods of transportation. In states where manufacturing is carried on to a large extent, provision is made for the protection of dangerous machinery against accidental contact, for the cleanliness and ventilation of working rooms, for the guarding of well holes, stairways, elevator shafts, and for the employment of sanitary appliances. In others, where mining is the principal industry, special provision is made for the shoring up of dangerous walls, for ventilation shafts, bore holes, escapement shafts, means of signaling the surface, for *the supply of fresh air and the elimi-[394 nation, as far as possible, of dangerous gases, for safe means of hoisting and lowering cages, for a limitation upon the number of persons permitted to enter a cage, that cages shall be covered, and that there shall be fences and gates around the top of shafts, besides other similar precautions. Stat. of Kansas, 1897, vol. 2, pp. 813-824; Kentucky Stat. (Barbour & Carroll) chap. 88, p. 951; Sup. Pub. Stat. of Massachusetts, 1889-1895, pp. 582, 746, 1163; Michigan Howells' Anno. Stat. §§ 9209*b et seq.*; Gen. Stat. of New Jersey, vol. 3, pp. 1900 et seq.; Rev. Stat. Code and Gen. Laws of New York, vol. 2, p. 2069; Brightly's Purdon's Digest Supp. Pennsylvania, pp. 2241 et seq.

These statutes have been repeatedly enforced by the courts of the several states; their validity assumed, and, so far as we are informed, they have been uniformly held to be constitutional.

In Daniels v. Hilgard, 77 Ill. 640, it was held that the legislature had power under the Constitution to establish reasonable police regulations for the operating of mines and collieries, and that an act providing for the health and safety of persons employed in coal mines, which requires the owner or agent of every coal mine or colliery employing ten men or more, to make or cause to be made an accurate map or plan of the workings of such coal mine or colliery, was not unconstitutional; and that the question whether certain requirements are a part of a system of police regulations adopted to aid in the protection of life and health, was properly one of legislative determination, and that a court should not lightly interfere with such determination unless the legislature had manifestly transcended its province. See also Litchfield Coal Co. v. Taylor, 81 Ill. 590.

In Commonwealth, Williams, v. Bonnell et 395]al. 8 Phila. 534, a law, *providing for the ventilation of coal mines, for speaking tubes, and the protection of cages was held to be constitutional and subject to strict enforcement. Commonwealth v. Conyngham, 66 Pa. 99; Durant v. Lexington Coal Min. Co. 97 Mo. 62.

But if it be within the power of a legislature to adopt such means for the protection of the lives of its citizens, it is difficult to see why precautions may not also be adopted for the protection of their health and morals. It is as much for the interest of the state that the public health should be preserved as that life should be made secure. With this end in view quarantine laws have been enacted, in most if not all of the states; insane asylums, public hospitals, and institutions for the care and education of the blind established, and special measures taken for the exclusion of infected cattle, rags, and decayed fruit. In other states laws have been enacted limiting the hours during which women and children shall be employed in factories; and while their constitutionality, at least as applied to women, has been doubted in some of the states, they have been generally upheld. Thus, in the case of Commonwealth v. Hamilton Manufacturing Co. 120 Mass. 383, it was held that a statute prohibiting the employment of all persons under the age of eighteen, and of all women laboring in any manufacturing establishment more than sixty hours per week, violates no contract of the commonwealth implied in the granting of a charter to a manufacturing company nor any right reserved under the Constitution to any individual citizen, and may be maintained as a health or police regulation.

Upon the principles above stated, we think the act in question may be sustained as a valid exercise of the police power of the state. The enactment does not profess to limit the hours of all workmen, but merely those who are employed in underground mines, or in the smelting, reduction, or refining of ores or metals. These employments when too long pursued the legislature has judged to be detrimental to the health of the employees, and, so long as there are reasonable grounds for believing that this is so, its decision upon this subject cannot be reviewed by the Federal courts.

*While the general experience of man-[396 kind may justify us in believing that men may engage in ordinary employments more than eight hours per day without injury to their health, it does not follow that labor for the same length of time is innocuous when carried on beneath the surface of the earth, when the operative is deprived of fresh air and sunlight, and is frequently subjected to foul atmosphere and a very high temperature, or to the influence of noxious gases, generated by the processes of refining or smelting.

We concur in the following observations of the supreme court of Utah [14 Utah, 98, 37 L. R. A. 108] in this connection:

"The conditions with respect to health of laborers in underground mines doubtless differ from those in which they labor in smelters and other reduction works on the surface. Unquestionably, the atmospheric and other conditions in mines and reduction works differ. Poisonous gases, dust, and impalpable substances arise and float in the air in stamp mills, smelters, and other works in which ores containing metals, combined with arsenic or other poisonous elements or agencies, are treated, reduced, and refined, and there can be no doubt that prolonged effort day after day, subject to such conditions and agencies, will produce morbid, noxious, and often deadly effects in the human system. Some organisms and systems will resist and endure such conditions and effects longer than others. It may be said that labor in such conditions must be performed. Granting this, the period of labor each day should be of a reasonable length. Twelve hours per day would be less injurious than fourteen, ten than twelve, and eight than ten. The legislature has named eight. Such a period was deemed reasonable. . . . The law in question is confined to the protection of that class of people engaged in labor in underground mines, and in smelters and other works wherein ores are reduced and refined. The law applies only to the classes subjected by their employment to the peculiar conditions and effects attending underground mining and work in smelters, and other works for the reduction and refining of ores. Therefore, it is not necessary to discuss or decide whether the legislature can fix the hours of labor *in other employ-[397 ments. Though reasonable doubts may exist as to the power of the legislature to pass a law, or as to whether the law is calculated or adapted to promote the health, safety, or comfort of the people, or to secure good order, or promote the general welfare, we must resolve them in favor of the right of that department of government."

The legislature has also recognized the fact, which the experience of legislators in many states has corroborated, that the proprietors of these establishments and their operatives do not stand upon an equality, and that their interests are, to a certain extent, conflicting. The former naturally desire to obtain as much labor as possible from their employees, while the latter are often induced by the fear of discharge to conform to regulations which their judgment, fairly exercised, would pronounce to be detrimental to their health or strength. In other words, the proprietors lay down the rules and the laborers are practically constrained to obey them. In such cases self-interest is often an unsafe guide, and the legislature may promptly interpose its authority.

It may not be improper to suggest in this connection that although the prosecution in this case was against the employer of labor, who apparently under the statute is the only one liable, his defense is not so much that his right to contract has been infringed upon, but that the act works a peculiar hardship to his employees, whose right to labor as long as they please is alleged to be thereby violated. The argument would certainly come with better grace and greater cogency from the latter class. But the fact that both parties are of full age and competent to contract does not necessarily deprive the state of the power to interfere where the parties do not stand upon an equality, or where the public health demands that one party to the contract shall be protected against himself. "The state still retains an interest in his welfare, however reckless he may be. The whole is no greater than the sum of all the parts, and when the individual health, safety, and welfare are sacrificed or neglected, the state must suffer."

We have no disposition to criticise the many 398] authorities* which hold that state statutes restricting the hours of labor are unconstitutional. Indeed, we are not called upon to express an opinion upon this subject. It is sufficient to say of them that they have no application to cases where the legislature had adjudged that a limitation is necessary for the preservation of the health of employees, and there are reasonable grounds for believing that such determination is supported by the facts. The question in each case is whether the legislature has adopted the statute in exercise of a reasonable discretion, or whether its action be a mere excuse for an unjust discrimination, or the oppression, or spoliation of a particular class. The distinction between these two different classes of enactments cannot be better stated than by a comparison of the views of this court found in the opinion in Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27 [28: 923], and Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703 [28: 1145], with those later expressed in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 [30: 220].

We are of opinion that the act in question was a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and the judgments of the Supreme Court of Utah are therefore affirmed.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION, Appt.,
v.
LEVI W. MEECH et al.

Evidence of trust in real estate—express agreement—land purchased by husband and deeded to wife—condition in will against contesting it—effect of contest.

1. There is no arbitrary rule requiring the direct testimony of any particular number of witnesses to the ultimate fact of an oral agreement for a trust in real estate, but the evidence of a single witness, corroborated in various ways, is sufficient, if it produces certainty in the mind that the agreement was made.
2. Where property conveyed to the wife is paid for by the husband, the existence of an express agreement, made prior to the vesting of title, which became a part of and controlled the conveyance, and nullified the presumption of an advancement, and indicated the disposition that was intended to be made of the property, does not destroy the resulting trust.
3. The doctrine of implied and resulting trusts applies to a purchase of land paid for by the husband but conveyed to his wife; and though there

Of conditions in a will against contesting any of the provisions thereof.

Chief Justice Marshall said: "Clauses of this description have always received such judicial construction as would comport with the reasonable intention of the testator. Even when the forfeiture of the legacy has been declared to be the penalty of not conforming to the injunction of the will, courts have considered it, if the legacy be not given over, rather as an effort to effect a desired object by intimidation, than as concluding the rights of the parties. If an unreasonable use be made of the power, one not foreseen, and which could not be intended, by the testator, it has been considered as a case in which the general power of courts of justice to decide on the rights of parties ought to be exercised." Pray v. Belt, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 680 (7: 313.)

There cannot be such a construction given to a clause of a will providing that a majority of the executors shall "decide in all cases, in case of any dispute or contention" and their decision "shall be final and conclusive without any resort to a court of justice," as will prevent a party who considers himself injured by the construction, from submitting his case to a court of justice. Idem.

A condition that a legatee shall not dispute the will is generally considered merely in terrorem, and will not operate as a forfeiture, by reason of the legatee having disputed the validity (see Powell v. Morgan, 2 Vern. 91; Loyd v. Spillet, 3 P. Wms. 344) of the will; but it is otherwise if the legacy on breach of such a condition be given over to another person. Cleaver v. Spurling, 2 P. Wms. 528.

A devise to a widow of the testator, during her widowhood and life: Held that such intention being in terrorem, the widow was entitled, there being is a presumption that it was intended as an advancement to her, yet such presumption may be overthrown by proof of an agreement that such was not the purpose of the conveyance.

4. The condition in a will that "the legatees acquiesce in" the will which expressly declares that certain real estate belongs to the testator, and it is devised by the will, although the title stands in his wife's name, is broken by legatees who contest the devise of that property on the ground that the testator did not own it.

5. When a testator declares in his will that his several bequests are made upon the condition that the legatees acquiesce in the provisions of his will, no legatee can, without compliance with that condition, receive his bounty or be put in a position to use it in the effort to thwart his expressed purposes.

Argued January 12, 1898. Decided February 28, 1898.

APPEAL from a decree of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia reversing the decree of the Supreme Court of that District and remanding the case with directions to dismiss a suit in equity brought by the Smithsonian Institution, plaintiff, against Levi W. Meech et al. to enforce certain rights claimed under the will of Robert S. Avery. Reversed, and case remanded with instructions to enter a decree in conformity with the opinion of this court.

See same case below, 8 App. D. C. 490.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

On June 4, 1895, the appellant, as plaintiff, filed its bill in the supreme court of the District of Columbia to enforce certain rights claimed under a will made by Robert S. Avery, on July 22, 1893. In this will, after sundry bequests to his own relatives, is the following:

"I bequeath to the sister and brothers of my late wife one thousand dollars (1,000) to be equally divided between them. I have already given these last over a thousand dollars which my wife inherited from her father, also clothing and other gifts, thus equalizing substantially my gifts to her family and to mine. These bequests are all made upon the condition that the legatees acquiesce in this will, and I hereby bequeath the share or shares of any disputing this will to the residuary legatee hereinafter named.

"All the rest and residue of my estate, of whatsoever nature, real, personal, or mixed, and wheresoever situate, I hereby give, devise, and bequeath unto the Smithsonian Institute, a body corporate by virtue of the laws of the no devise over. Parsons v. Winslow, 6 Mass. 169, 4 Am. Dec. 107; Precedents of Wills, 416.

Sometimes a testator imposes on a devisee or legatee a condition that he shall not dispute the will. Such a condition is regarded as in terrorem only, at least where the subject of disposition is personal estate; and therefore, a legatee will not, by having contested the validity or effect of the will, forfeit his legacy, where there was probabilis causa litigandi; (a) unless it seems the legacy be given over upon breach of the condition; (b) this doctrine has never been applied to devises of real estate. 1 Jarman, Wills, 850, citing Powell v. Morgan, 2 Vern. 90; Loyd v. Spillet, 3 P. Wms. 344; Morris v. Burroughs, 1 Atk. 404; Cleaver v. Spurling, 2 P. Wms. 528. As to what amounts to a compliance with particular requisitions, see Duke Montague v. Lord Beaulieu, 3 Bro. P. C. Tomlins' ed. 227; Roe, Sampson, v. Down, 2 Chitty, 529; Doe, Duke Norfolk, v. Hawke, 2 East. 481. Whether neglect amounts to refusal, see 2 East, 487, and Lord Ellenborough's judgment in Doe, Kenrick, v. Lord Beauclerk, 11 East, 667.

Legatees opposing probate of a will which provides that any beneficiary opposing it, or making controversy concerning it, shall forfeit his interest, are not thus deprived of their bequests, it not appearing but that the opposition was in good faith and not vexatious. Jackson v. Westerfield, 61 How. Pr. 399, citing Rhodes v. Muswell Hill Land Co. 29 Beav. 560; Powell v. Morgan, 2 Vern. 90; Morris v. Burroughs, 1 Atk. 404; Loyd v. Spillet, 3 P. Wms. 345.

Clauses in wills which impose restraints upon proper inquiry into testamentary capacity, and the legality and validity of the dispositions of property, should not be favored. Idem.

A condition not to contest the will is valid as regards realty, with or without a gift over upon breach; as regards personalty, it is valid if there is a gift over; if not, it is considered in terrorem and void. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 483, citing Cooke v. Turner, 15 Mees. & W. 727; Thompson v. Gaut, 14 Lea, 310; Bradford v. Bradford, 19 Ohio St. 546, 2 Am. Rep. 419; Mallet v. Smith, 6 Rich. Eq. 12, 60 Am. Dec. 107; Hoit v. Hoit, 42 N. J. Eq. 388, 59 Am. Rep. 43; 2 Jarman, Wills, 5th ed. 59; Theobald, Wills, 2d ed. 455; Powell v. Morgan, 2 Vern. 90; Loyd v. Spillet, 3 P. Wms. 344; Morris v. Burroughs, 1 Atk. 399; Cleaver v. Spurling, 2 P. Wms. 528; Cage v. Russel, 2 Vent. 352; Stevenson v. Abington, 11 Week. Rep. 935; Donegan v. Wade, 70 Ala. 501.

In Chew's Appeal, 45 Pa. 232, the court, by Thompson, J., said, in speaking of a condition affecting both real and personal property: "It seems to be well settled that where such a provision is merely denounced against disputing a will or its provisions without a devise over, it will only be considered in terrorem, and not as fixing on the devisee's share intestacy; and this shows the tendency of the law against giving efficiency to such provisions. But where there is a devise over, in case of a violation of the provisions, to some person named, or that the share thus limited shall fall into the residue of the estate for distribution, the share so limited will pass to its intended devisee, or to the estate upon breach of the conditions. 2 Wms. Exrs. 1147; 1 Russell, Legacies, 795. It also seems to be the result of authorities that if there exist probabilis causa litigandi, that the nonobservance of the conditions will not be forfeitures. Russell, Legacies, 795. Undoubtedly, I think, no provision could be formed to oust the supervisory power of the law over such conditions and limitations, to control them within their legitimate sphere, which is generally to prevent vexatious litigation."

In Thompson v. Gaut, 14 Lea, 315, and Bradford v. Bradford, 19 Ohio St. 546, 2 Am. Rep. 419, it was held that the condition was good both as to real and personal property, whether there was a gift over or not.

Under such a condition, one who aids and advises in a suit instituted by another forfeits his interest. Donegan v. Wade, 70 Ala. 501.

A will expressed as a condition to the payment of legacies to the beneficiaries thereunder, that neither of them should, directly or indirectly, institute or become an acting party to any proceeding to set aside, "interfere with," or make null any provision of the will or the codicils, and that any such act or proceeding by him should deprive him of his legacy. On the hearing of a petition by a United States, of which institution Samuel P. Langley is now secretary, having its legal residence in the District of Columbia, unto it and its successors forever.

"Having always had a love for the sciences, and having acquired most of my property while toiling in humble capacities to extend and diffuse knowledge, I have concluded that 400] *the residuary gift above made to the Smithsonian Institution will best express my interest in science. As my labors have been directed to the invention and use of phonetic type, I desire, but do not require, that the income derived by the Smithsonian Institution from this gift may be applied, so far as it may determine, to promoting publications in such type of scientific publication, especially of such publications as may relate to phonetic type and printing. I also desire, but by no means require, that such part of said income as the said institution shall determine shall be applied to the publication of lectures and treatises upon and concerning those mechanical laws governing an etherial medium which are treated of in atomic chemistry, and which are supposed to govern phenomena of electricity, magnetism, light, and heat. Prizes might be given for essays on these subjects and upon such other kindred subjects as may meet the approval of the institution. I would like, however, to have published first the multiplying table and also IV-plate logarithms, publication of the table of squares, cubes, square roots, cube roots, reciprocals, prime numbers, and factors, some of which I have written out. If the institution shall approve, the fund derived from the residuary bequest shall be called 'the Avery fund' or 'the fund contributed by Robert S. Avery and his wife Lydia T. Avery, for the extension of the sciences,' and all publications made from the fund shall bear this inscription.

"The property known as part of lot 2 (two) in square 787 in the city of Washington, D. C., being premises No. 326 A street S. E., is my property, although the title stands in my wife's name. I include it in the residuary bequest to the Smithsonian Institution."

The testator died childless on September 12, 1894. The will was probated February 2, 1895. He and his wife had lived for many years in Washington, he being in the employ of the government in the coast survey office. During these years he lived a quiet and retired life, devoting himself to scientific research, and experimenting chiefly in the matter of legatee to revoke the probate of the will, it appeared that after the commencement of the proceedings certain legatees and next of kin of the testatrix, not including the petitioner and other contestants, had executed an agreement, the object of which was stated to be to avoid any controversy between themselves in relation to testatrix's estate, and the obvious purpose of which was to secure their legacies to the legatees signing it, and to the contestants, in case the will should be set aside. Held, that the condition in the will against contesting it was valid; that a legatee executing the agreement became thereby a party to the proceeding to set the will aside, thus depriving herself of her legacy in case the will should be sustained. Re Stewart, 1 Connoly, 412; Bank v. Camp, 3 Dem. 278; Grote's Estate, 2 How. Pr. N. S. 140.

A testator gave bequests to his grandchildren and to some of his children, and the residue he gave equally to his children and grandchildren. A codicil stated that he was not indebted to any of his children, and that if any of them presented a claim against his estate, neither the child nor his descendants should share in the estate. A son presented a claim against the estate and it was allowed. Held, that the condition of the codicil was unreasonable; that it was a condition subsequent and did not defeat the legacy to the son, nor that to his children, for the reason that a valid provision for infants could not be defeated because their father did not observe the condition. Re Vandevort, 62 Hun, 612.

Appearing at the probate of a will, filing objections thereto, and cross-examining witnesses upon subjects which it is the surrogate's duty to inquire into, by a legatee, does not work a forfeiture of his legacy, although the will provides that if he "prevents or opposes the execution" of the will the legacy shall go elsewhere. Re Bratt, 10 Misc. 491.

A legatee under a will providing that if he "prevents or opposes" its execution the legacy shall go elsewhere forfeits his legacy by commencing an action against the executor individually for the conversion of property bequeathed to other legatees, although he establishes his ownership in the action. Re Bratt, 10 Misc. 491.

A legatee under a will providing that if he "prevents or opposes" its execution the legacy shall go elsewhere forfeits such legacy by failing to comply with a direction of the testatrix in relation to her place and manner of burial, with which he has ample opportunity to comply after learning thereof. Re Bratt, 10 Misc. 491.

A devisee under a will providing that anyone who opposes its provisions shall forfeit all claims to participation therein does not, by filing a bill for its true construction and the enforcement of his rights thereunder, seek to thwart the designs of the testatrix so as to forfeit his claims under the will. Black v. Herring, 79 Md. 146.

A provision of a will that, should any legatee be dissatisfied with any gift therein made, the gift shall be wholly withheld, is inoperative to forfeit a legacy to one who files objections to the probate. Re Jackson, 47 N. Y. S. R. 443.

A condition subsequently devesting an estate given to testator's grandson if any attempt is made to remove him from the custody of the executors is imperative in the absence of a limitation over, where testator was aided in preparation of the will by counsel. Re White, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 207.

A clause of a will declaring that testator is in no wise indebted to any of his children, and providing that any bequests or devises to any son or daughter shall be null and void if such son or daughter presents any claim against the estate, is inoperative to create a forfeiture of a legacy to a son who presents a claim against the estate for a valid debt, —especially where there is no gift over. Re Vandevort, 62 Hun, 612.

An infant's right under a will which provides for forfeiture of the right of any beneficiary who contests it is not forfeited by a contest instituted by a guardian ad litem, although the infant is personally present and testifies as a witness. Bryant v. Tracy, 27 Abb. N. C. 183.

A bequest to a son of testator's wife by a former marriage, upon condition that she shall elect to take under the will, and not take under the intestate laws, is made on a condition precedent, and is not in terrorem as to her or against public policy. Carr's Estate, 138 Pa. 352.

A legacy to infants, otherwise valid, cannot be forfeited by a provision that it shall be null and void if their father fails to observe a direction of the will. Re Vandevort, 62 Hun, 612.

phonetic type. His wife was younger than he, and was, until shortly before her death, on 401]November 18, 1890, in apparently *good health. While they were both living, and on April 20, 1885, the real estate described in the last paragraph quoted from the will was purchased, the title being conveyed to Mrs. Avery.

The bill alleged that the lot was paid for with the money of Robert Avery; that the title was taken in the name of Mrs. Avery because it was supposed that she would outlive her husband and upon an understanding and agreement that the property should, after their deaths, pass to the Smithsonian Institution in pursuance of a mutual desire to make their gift to this institution as large as possible; that notwithstanding these facts the defendants, other than the executrix, claimed title to the property as the heirs of Mrs. Avery, and had demanded possession. The prayer was for a finding and decree that the equitable title was in Robert Avery, and passed to the plaintiff by his last will; that the defendants be enjoined from claiming any title thereto, and that the executrix be directed to treat the $1,000 bequeathed to the sister and brothers as forfeited for breach of condition annexed to said legacy and as having fallen into the residuum. After answer, testimony was taken and the case was heard before Justice Hagner of the supreme court, who rendered a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill, so far as respects the lot, but denying the relief sought as to the legacy on condition of the defendants executing a release of all claims to the realty. On appeal by all of the defendants, except the executrix, the court of appeals reversed the decree of the supreme court and remanded the case with directions to dismiss the bill. 8 App. D. C. 490. Whereupon the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Mr. Frank W. Hackett for appellant.
Mr. Franklin H. Mackey for appellees.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

The legal title to this property passed by the 402]conveyance *in 1885 to Mrs. Avery. She died without will. Prima facie, therefore, the title then passed to her heirs, the appellees. The plaintiff insists that in fact the purchase price was paid by Mr. Avery and paid under an oral agreement, whereby a resulting trust was created which changed the course of the title, and the first questions are, Whose money paid for the lot? and Was there such an agreement, and, if so, What were its terms?

That the money which was used in making payment for the lot was the money of Mr. Avery is not seriously questioned. Both Mr. and Mrs. Avery lived very economically, and this money was accumulated out of savings from the salary he received from the government. At the time of their marriage Mrs. Avery had a small amount of money on deposit in a savings bank in Connecticut, and the books of the bank showed that no part of that amount was drawn out at or near the time of this conveyance. Her repeated declarations were to the same effect, and that Mr. Avery's money had paid for the property.

The trial court also found that there was an oral agreement—an agreement made at the time the property was conveyed to Mrs. Avery—that she should hold the property during her lifetime, and that she should make a will by which it should pass at her death to the Smithsonian Institution. The court of appeals held that the testimony did not establish the alleged agreement so clearly as to justify a court of equity in recognizing it as against the legal effect of the conveyance. We are constrained to differ with the court of appeals and to agree with the justice of the supreme court. In a careful and exhaustive opinion Justice Hagner reviewed the evidence, and his conclusions therefrom commend themselves to our judgment. In view of this opinion it seems unnecessary to recapitulate all the testimony, and we shall content ourselves with stating the salient features thereof.

Mr. Avery was for some thirty-two years in the employ of the government, and an enthusiast in the scientific studies which he was pursuing in connection with such service. Prior to the purchase of the lot in controversy, and on September *13, 1882, he had made 403]a will, in which, after giving to his "wife Lydia T. Avery, if she outlives me, in trust while she lives, all my real estate and personal property . . . to hold and to use for her support as long as she lives, and to keep in good condition for its final disposition," he declared:

"Having always had a love for the sciences, and having acquired most of my property while toiling in humble capacities to extend and diffuse knowledge, I have concluded to giving all my real and personal property, with such exceptions as I may make hereafter in this will or in codicils annexed thereto, to the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to provide for its safe keeping and to use the income from it in extending the sciences by publishing," etc.

And again:

"This fund may be called 'the Avery fund, or 'the fund contributed by Robert S. Avery and his wife Lydia T. Avery for the extension of the sciences,' and all publications made with this fund must have a note thereon stating that they have been thus published.

"After the death of my wife, the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution will be expected to select an executor of this will and provide for making the fund as useful as possible, limiting its use as much as they can to the objects specified."

His wife was fifteen or twenty years younger than he, and the expectation of both was that she would outlive him, though in fact she died some four years before he did, he living to be 86 years of age. After her death, and on December 20, 1892, he prepared a codicil to the will of 1882, in which he recited that the conveyance of the property in question was made to his wife with his consent and upon the express understanding and condition that she should make a will in his favor, and that he had as evidence of this filed several affidavits of her statements in respect to the matter. Subsequently he executed the will of July 22, 1893, under which this suit was brought. The wills and codicil above referred to furnish indisputable evidence that prior to the purchase of 404] *the real estate in controversy Mr. Avery intended that all his property, after certain legacies were paid, should go to the Smithsonian Institution, and that he understood that when the deed of this property was made to his wife it was upon the agreement described. That the agreement was made is clearly and positively testified to by one witness, Leland P. Shidy, who was associated in the government service with Mr. Avery, was the intimate friend of both Mr. and Mrs. Avery, living in the house with them from time to time during the years from 1873 to her death. We quote from his testimony:

"Q. Do you recollect the circumstance of the purchase by Mr. Avery of the property No. 326 A street southeast, in this city?

"A. Yes; I do. I was at their house at the time when they began talking about making the purchase, and they discussed it, in the first place, as to the advisability of getting the property at all, and after that was decided they discussed as to how the deed had better be made out, and Mrs. Avery thought it would be best to put the deed in her name, although her husband's money was paying for it exclusively, and he thought best to do so and had the deed made out in her name.

"Q. Did Mrs. Avery state any reason why the deed should be made out in her name?

"A. Yes. She wanted it in her name, in the first place, because she wanted to have the control of that property, as it was immediately contiguous to her own home, and then she thought she would be pretty certain to outlive her husband, and that it would be better in case of his death to have the title in her name than in his name.

"Q. State what final disposition, if any, was agreed upon by these two persons in your presence.

"A. It was agreed that she should have the property during her lifetime, and that she should make a will transferring it at her death to the Smithsonian Institute.

"Q. I understand that this conversation which you are now testifying to took place at or about the time of the actual purchase and 405] *the making of the deed Was any reference made to the ownership of this property that you can now recollect subsequent to the date when it was bought?

"A. After that they referred to it in a number of interviews while I was present, and every time they alluded to it with the same understanding—that is, that the property was to be hers during her lifetime and was to be disposed of at her death, in accordance with the will of Mr. Avery, with the rest of his property."

In addition there was the testimony of several witnesses of repeated conversations with Mrs. Avery, in which she made statements to the same effect. In a lease of the property made in 1887 Mr. Avery was named as the lessor. The receipts for rent given monthly for several years were signed by him alone, and so signed in her presence. There is nothing to contradict or discredit this evidence. While it may be true that no witness but the one was present at the time the agreement was entered into between Mr. and Mrs. Avery, yet his testimony is corroborated in the various ways to which we have referred. There is no arbitrary rule requiring the direct testimony of any particular number of witnesses to the ultimate fact. It is enough that there be a certainty in respect to it, and that certainty may result from an accumulation of direct and indirect evidences. The law is content if from a perusal of the entire record the mind is sure that there was a distinct agreement as claimed. That Mr. Avery understood that the agreement was made as stated the documentary evidence places beyond doubt; that it was in fact made, Mr. Shidy's testimony attests; and that Mrs. Avery understood that it was so made is evident, not merely from Mr. Shidy's testimony, but from her statements to many others. The will executed in 1882, and before the purchase of this lot, discloses his intent that all his property, save a few specific bequests, should go to the Smithsonian, and that the fund created thereby should bear his wife's as well as his own name, and the evidence makes it clear that she shared in his desire to make this fund as large as possible. While we agree to the proposition that parol testimony to overthrow the legal effect *of conveyances must be clear and satis- [406 factory, yet we think this case comes within the scope of that rule, and that it is certain that just such an agreement was made between husband and wife as the appellant asserts. Even if it were a criminal case, we should not hesitate to hold that the evidence was sufficient to establish the fact beyond a reasonable doubt. It is true Mr. Avery in the codicil speaks of the agreement on the part of Mrs. Avery as one to make a will in his favor, while Mr. Shidy says that the agreement was that she should make a will transferring the property after her death to the Smithsonian, but this slight difference is immaterial and does not discredit the testimony. The Smithsonian was to be the ultimate beneficiary, and the manner in which this should be accomplished was merely a matter of detail, in respect to which the memory of the witnesses might differ. Indeed, Mr. Shidy does not purport to give the exact language used, but merely states the substance of the agreement.

We pass, therefore, to the further question: If it is true that the purchase price was paid by Mr. Avery, and the title conveyed to Mrs. Avery under an oral agreement, such as is described, will equity enforce this as against those claiming the record title?

The court of appeals was of the opinion that the agreement on the part of Mrs. Avery created an express trust, which, resting only in parol, was invalid under the statute of frauds. It recognized the doctrine that an implied or resulting trust arises by operation of law, whenever one person buying and paying for an estate has the title placed in the name of another; but held that when the title is conveyed to a wife or child, or other person for whom the one paying the purchase money is under an obligation, legal or moral, to provide, no presumption of a trust arises, and that it is incumbent on one who claims the existence of such a trust to establish it by clear, positive, and unequivocal proof, and that this had not been done in the present case. It did not substantially disagree with the trial court on the propositions of law laid down by him, but differed mainly as to the strength and effect of the evidence.

407] *The general proposition is unquestioned that, where upon a purchase of property the conveyance of the legal title is to one person while the consideration is paid by another, an implied or resulting trust immediately arises, and the grantee in the conveyance will be held as trustee for the party from whom the consideration proceeds.

"This rule has its foundation in the natural presumption, in the absence of all rebutting circumstances, that he who supplies the purchase money intends the purchase to be for his own benefit, and not for another, and that the conveyance in the name of another is a matter of convenience and arrangement between the parties for collateral purposes, and this rule is vindicated by the experience of mankind." 1 Perry, Tr. 4th ed. § 126.

The nature of this trust may be shown by parol evidence. This is in express accord with the provisions of the statute of frauds. Comp. Stat. D. C. 231, §§ 8, 9. The 1st of these sections requires that all declarations or creations of trust or confidence in respect to real estate shall be manifested and proved by some writing. Section 9 reads:

"Provided, always, That where any conveyance shall be made of any lands or tenements by which a trust or confidence shall or may arise or result by the implication or construction of law, or be transferred or extinguished by an act or operation of law, then and in every such case, such trust or confidence shall be of the like force and effect as the same would have been if this statute had not been made; anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

There is no statute in force in this District, such as is found in some states, putting an end to implied and resulting trusts. It is true that when the consideration is paid by a husband and the conveyance made to his wife there is a presumption that such a conveyance was intended for her benefit; but this is not a presumption of law but of fact, and can be overthrown by proof of the real intent of the parties.

"Whether a purchase in the name of wife or child is an advancement or not is a question of pure intention, though presumed in the first instance to be a provision and settlement; 408]* therefore, any antecedent or contemporaneous acts or facts may be received, either to rebut or support the presumption, and any acts or facts so immediately after the purchase as to be fairly considered a part of the transaction may be received for the same purpose. And so the declarations of the real purchaser, either before or at the time of the purchase, may be received to show whether he intended it as an advancement or a trust. Such declarations are received, not as declarations of a trust by parol or otherwise, but as evidence to show what the intention was at the time." 1 Perry, Tr. 4th ed. § 147; see also 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1041, and cases cited in notes.

This is in accord with the general proposition, so often enunciated, that the statute of frauds was designed to prevent frauds, and that courts of equity will not permit it to be used to accomplish that which it was designed to prevent. As said in Wood v. Rabe, 96 N. Y. 414, 425 [48 Am. Rep. 640]:

"There are two principles upon which a court of equity acts in exercising its remedial jurisdiction. . . . One is that it will not permit the statute of frauds to be used as an instrument of fraud, and the other, that when a person through the influence of a confidential relation acquires title to property, or obtains an advantage which he cannot conscientiously retain, the court, to prevent the abuse of confidence, will grant relief."

And in Haigh v. Kaye, L. R. 7 Ch. 469, 474:

"The words of Lord Justice Turner, in the case of Lincoln v. Wright, 4 De G. & J. 16, where he said: 'The principle of this court is that the statute of frauds was not made to cover fraud,' express a principle upon which this court has acted in numerous instances, where the court has refused to allow a man to take advantage of the statute of frauds to keep another man's property which he has obtained through fraud."

If Mrs. Avery had, during her lifetime, conveyed this property to her sister and brothers it would have been a fraudulent breach of trust, and the like result follows if, now that she has died without executing a will, her heirs are permitted to take the property which was conveyed to her, not *as an advancement, [409 but on an agreement that it should subsequently pass to this plaintiff.

The existence of an express agreement does not destroy the resulting trust. It was not an agreement made by one owning and having the legal title to real estate by which an express trust was attempted to be created, but it was an agreement prior to the vesting of title—an agreement which became a part of and controlled the conveyance; and evidence of its terms is offered, not for the purpose of establishing an express trust, but of nullifying the presumption of an advancement and to indicate the disposition which the real owner intended should be made of the property.

In Robinson v. Leflore, 59 Miss. 148, 151, it was said:

"If the facts make out a case of resulting trust independently of the agreement, relief will not be denied because of the agreement; it being well settled that an invalid agreement cannot destroy an otherwise good cause of action, and this is no less true of resulting trusts than of other legal rights." Keller v. Kunkel, 46 Md. 565.

It may not be amiss to notice a few of the authorities. Sherman v. Sherman, 9 Mackey, 330, is in point. In that case the husband made an agreement with his wife to buy real estate in her name, and that she should execute a will devising it to him. He bought one piece of real estate in her name, and she made a will so devising it. Subsequently he, in like manner, bought another piece, and, under the supposition that the will covered this after-acquired property, she made no new will, but died intestate as to that property, and it was ruled that a minor daughter, who inherited the title, held it in trust for him. In Livingston v. Livingston, 2 Johns. Ch. 537, it appeared that husband and wife agreed orally that he should purchase a lot in her name and build a house thereon, and that he should be reimbursed the cost thereof out of the proceeds of another house and lot of which she was seised, which should be sold for that purpose. The husband having executed the agreement upon his part, the contract failed by the sudden death of the wife, who left infant children, to whom the legal estate in both lots descended; 410]and *it was held that the agreement should be carried into effect, and the lot which originally belonged to the wife was ordered to be sold and the husband reimbursed out of the proceeds. In his opinion the chancellor said (p. 539):

"The presumption would undoubtedly be, in the first instance, that the conveyance to the wife was intended as an advancement and provision for her. This presumption was admitted in the case of Kingdon v. Bridges, 2 Vern. 67, but I do not see why it may not be rebutted, as has been done in this case, by parol proof. In Finch v. Finch, 15 Ves. Jr. 43, it was held that though, when a purchase is made in the name of a person who does not pay the purchase money, the party paying it is considered in equity as entitled, yet if the person whose name is used be a child of the purchaser, it is, prima facie, an advancement, but that it was competent for the father to show, by proof, that he did not intend advancement, but used the name of his child only as trustee."

Cotton v. Wood, 25 Iowa, 43. Here the facts were that the husband purchased a lot and had the same conveyed to his wife under an agreement that she would convey it to him, or to whomsoever he may assign his interest therein, upon his request. The wife died without making any conveyance, and it was held that the husband might maintain a suit to compel a conveyance to him by her heirs, the court saying:

"Where, upon the purchase of property, the consideration is paid by one, and the legal title conveyed to another, a resulting trust is thereby raised, and the person named in the deed will hold the property as trustee of the party paying the consideration. See Hill, Trustees, p. 91, and authorities cited in notes; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1201. But if the person to whom the conveyance is made be one to whom the party paying the consideration is under obligation, natural or moral, to provide, the transaction will be regarded prima facie as an advancement, and the burden will rest on the one who seeks the trust for the benefit of the payee of the consideration, to overcome the presumption in favor of the legal title by sufficient evidence. This presumption, though strong, is not 411]conclusive. *Hill, Trustees, 97, and notes; Sunderland v. Sunderland, 19 Iowa, 328; Livingston v. Livingston, 2 Johns. Ch. 540; 2 Story's Eq. Juris. sec. 1203; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 173, 174, 204; Welton v. Divine, 20 Barb. 9; Guthrie v. Gardner, 19 Wend. 414; Harder v. Harder, 2 Sandf. Ch. 17. See also Gray v. Jordan, 87 Me. 140; Milner v. Freeman, 40 Ark. 62; Hudson v. White, 17 R. I. 519; Persons v. Persons, 25 N. J. Eq. 250.

Somewhat analogous is Re Duke of Marlborough [1894] 2 Ch. 133, in which it appeared that the Duchess of Marlborough conveyed certain property to her husband, that he mortgaged the property for the purpose of raising money with which to pay his debts, she joining in the mortgage. Upon his death the Duchess claimed to be entitled to the property, subject to the mortgage, on the ground that it was part of the arrangement between them that he should reconvey to her, and it was held that she was entitled to such reconveyance.

We think it clear from these authorities and many others that might be cited (see White & Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, 4th ed. vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 314, and following, where the authorities are collated and the question discussed at length), that the doctrine of an implied and resulting trust applies to a case in which the husband advances the purchase price for property which is conveyed to his wife, and though it be true there is a presumption that the conveyance was intended as an advancement for her benefit, yet such presumption is subject to overthrow by proof of an agreement that such was not the purpose of the conveyance. And so the case comes back to the question of fact in respect to which we have already expressed our conclusions, whether there was sufficiently clear and positive evidence that this conveyance to Mrs. Avery was not intended as an advancement, but was made simply for the purposes of convenience and upon the agreement that this lot, together with other property belonging to Mr. Avery, should pass after both were dead to the Smithsonian Institution.

The remaining question arises upon the condition named in *the will, and its effect [412 upon the legacy to the sister and brothers of Mrs. Avery. That these legatees did not acquiesce in the will is clear, not alone from the fact that prior to any suit they made demand for the possession of the realty, but also from the further fact that after the decree in the trial court, which, while denying any right to the real estate, at the same time provided for their receipt of the legacy upon filing a written relinquishment of all claims to the real estate, they persisted in carrying on the litigation by appeal to the court of appeals, insisting there as here upon their right to the property. It is obvious that in inserting this condition the testator had in mind the specific property hereinbefore considered. In the first will, made prior to the purchase of the property, no such provision is found. He was under no apprehension of any dispute as to the proposed disposition of his entire estate. But in a second codicil thereto executed after the death of his wife, and when, by her failing to execute a will as agreed upon, it became apparent that some question might be made concerning the ownership of this property, he did incorporate a somewhat similar provision. There is, however, a marked difference between the language there used and that here found. That language was, "these gifts are made on the condition that no attempt be made to break this will, and that if such an attempt be made those who engage in it are to lose their claims to the gifts here made to them." That might be construed to forbid, under the penalty of losing the bequests, a contest of the will, any "disputing of the will," in the ordinary and natural meaning of those words, by denying that it was a lawful will, duly executed and attested by a testator of sound mind and not acting under undue influence. The language here used is that "these bequests are all made upon the condition that the legatees acquiesce in this will, and I hereby bequeath the share or shares of any disputing this will to the residuary legatee hereinafter named." In other words, acquiescence in the will as a will, and in all its provisions, is the condition upon which the legatees can take their bequests. It is not confined to mere acquiescence in his se-413]lection of the residuary *legatee, but in his declaration as to the title to any named property and his devise of that property. No legatee is to receive a bequest who shall controvert that which he has stated to be a fact, or attempt to prevent that specific disposition of any property which he has made. And in case of a failure to comply with this condition the bequest is given over to the residuary legatee. The authorities fully warrant this conclusion.

"When legacies are given to persons upon conditions not to dispute the validity of, or the dispositions in wills or testaments, the conditions are not in general obligatory, but only in terrorem. If, therefore, there exist probabilis causa litigandi, the nonobservance of the conditions will not be forfeitures. Powell v. Morgan, 2 Vern. 90; Morris v. Burroughs, 1 Atk. 404; Loyd v. Spillet, 3 P. Wms. 344. The reason seems to be this: a court of equity does not consider that the testator meant such a clause to determine his bounty, if the legatee resorted to such a tribunal to ascertain doubtful rights under the will, or how far his other interests might be affected by it; but merely to guard against vexatious litigation. But when the acquiescence of the legatee appears to be a material ingredient in the gift, which is made to determine upon his controverting the will or any of its provisions, and in either of those events the legacy is given over to another person, the restriction no longer continues a condition in terrorem, but assumes the character of a conditional limitation. The bequest is only quousque, the legatee shall refrain from disturbing the will; and, if he controvert it, his interest will cease and pass to the other legatee." 1 Roper, Legacies, 2d Am. ed. 795.

In Cooke v. Turner, 14 Sim 493, the testator, after giving to his daughter certain benefits out of his real estate, revoked them and gave the estates over in case his daughter should dispute his will, or his competency to make it, or should refuse to confirm it when required by his executors. The daughter refused to confirm the will, and a suit having been instituted to establish it the daughter disputed its va-414]lidity and the *competency of her father to make it. It was held that the clause of revocation was valid; that the gift over took effect, and that the benefits given by the will to the daughter were forfeited by that which had taken place.

It is said in 2 Redfield on Wills, p. 298, in treating of the rule as to conditions against disputing the will, that "acceptance of the legacy renders the condition binding on the legatee upon the well-known doctrine of election." Election is thus defined by Sir William Grant, master of the rolls, in Andrew v. Trinity Hall, 9 Ves. Jr. 525, 533: "Where one legatee under a will insists upon something, by which he would deprive another legatee, under the same will, of the benefit to which he would be entitled, if the first legatee permitted the whole will to operate."

This thought finds apt illustration in the case at bar. These legatees insist that the devise of this particular real estate to the plaintiff shall not stand; that it was not the property of the testator, and could not lawfully be devised by him, and therefore that the plaintiff shall not take the property which the testator proposed to give it. If, however, they had accepted this legacy burdened with the condition named, might it not fairly be said that they elected to acquiesce in the will and in the disposition specifically made by the testator of this property? Redfield in the same volume, on page 370, after citing Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 337, in which this subject was considerably discussed, states as one of the propositions therein established:

"Although the testator has no legal power to dispose of the property of another, yet if he assumes to do so by his will, and such person accepts a devise or bequest under the will, it will be a confirmation of such disposition of his own property by the testator."

In McElfresh v. Schley, 2 Gill, 181, 200 [41 Am. Dec. 415], the court said:

"It is only carrying out a plain intent of the testator, and giving to the residuary devisee that which the testator intended, and forbidding the heir from taking property not designed for him. From the earliest case on the subject the rule is, that a man shall not take a benefit under a will, and *at the same[415 time defeat the provisions of the instrument. If he claims an interest under an instrument, he must give full effect to it, so far as he is able to do so. He cannot take what is devised to him, and at the same time, what is devised to another, although, but for the will, it would be his; hence he is driven to his election to say which he will take." See also 1 Jarman, Wills, 415; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1076.

The propositions thus laid down fully commend themselves to our approval. They are good law and good morals. Experience has shown that often after the death of a testator unexpected difficulties arise, technical rules of law are found to have been trespassed upon, contests are commenced wherein not infrequently are brought to light matters of private life that ought never to be made public, and in respect to which the voice of the testator cannot be heard either in explanation or denial, and as a result the manifest intention of the testator is thwarted. It is not strange, in view of this, that testators have desired to secure compliance with their dispositions of property and have sought to incorporate provisions which should operate most powerfully to accomplish that result. And when a testator declares in his will that his several bequests are made upon the condition that the legatees acquiesce in the provisions of his will, the courts wisely hold that no legatee shall without compliance with that condition receive his bounty, or be put in a position to use it in the effort to thwart his expressed purposes.

The decree of the Court of Appeals will be reversed, and the case remanded to that court with instructions to enter a decree in conformity with this opinion.

The CHIEF JUSTICE did not sit in this case, and took no part in its consideration and judgment.

v.

MARION NATIONAL BANK of Lebanon, Kentucky.

Forfeiture by national bank—usurious interest.

1. The forfeiture by a national bank, declared by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5198, of the entire interest on a note, bill, or evidence of debt, for taking or reserving a greater rate of interest than is allowed by § 5197, is not waived or avoided by giving a separate note for the interest, or by giving a renewal note in which is included the usurious interest.

2. Within the meaning of said § 5198, usurious interest is not paid when included in a renewal note, so as to produce the effect that in a suit on the renewal note calling for interest from its date only the interest accruing on the apparent principal of that note is subject to forfeiture.

Submitted January 21, 1898. Decided February 21, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the Commonwealth of Kentucky to review a judgment of that court construing certain provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to National Banks. Reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 92 Ky. 607.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. J. McDermott and H. W. Rives for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. J. Lisle for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was twice before the court of appeals of Kentucky. The first judgment of the court of original jurisdiction was reversed in that court, and the cause was remanded for further proceedings. 92 Ky. 607.

The present appeal brings up for review the final judgment rendered by the court of appeals of Kentucky on a second appeal to that court.

The case requires the construction of certain provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to national banking associations.

Section 5197 authorizes a national banking association to take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state, territory, or district where the bank is located, and no more, except that where by the laws of any state a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized or existing in any such state. When no rate is fixed by the laws of the state, territory, or district, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding 7 per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt has to run.

Section 5198 provides: "The taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a rate of interest greater than is allowed by the preceding section, when knowingly done, shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. In case the greater rate of interest has been paid, the person by whom it has been paid, or his legal representatives, may recover back, in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid from the association taking or receiving the same; provided *such action is commenced within [418 two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred. That suits, actions, and proceedings against any association under this title may be had in any circuit, district, or territorial court of United States held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any state, county, or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located having jurisdiction in similar cases."

The last section clearly makes a difference between interest which a note, bill, or other evidence of debt held by a national bank, "carries with it or which has been agreed to be paid thereon," and interest which has been "paid." Interest included in a renewal note, or evidenced by a separate note, does not thereby cease to be interest within the meaning of § 5198 and become principal.

If a bank, which violates that section, sues upon the note, bill, or other evidence of debt held by it, the debtor may insist that the entire interest, legal and usurious, included in his written obligation and agreed to be paid, but which has not been actually paid, shall be either credited on the note, or eliminated from it, and judgment given only for the original principal debt, with interest at the legal rate from the commencement of the suit. We say "entire interest," because such are the words of the statute, based on the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 95, 108, chap. 106, § 30), whereas the prior statute of February 25, 1863 (12 Stat. at L. 665, 678, chap. 58, § 46), declared that the knowingly taking, reserving, or charging a greater rate of interest than was allowed should be held and adjudged a forfeiture of "the debt or demand" on which usurious interest was taken, reserved, or charged.

NOTE.—As to usury by national banks, see note to Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 23: 196.

That taking interest in advance is not usury, see note to Fleckner v. Bank of United States, 5: 631.

That usury in a substituted security revives original; valid claim is not invalidated by being included in a usurious security, see notes to Newell v. Nixon, 18: 305.

As to new securities for usurious loan, when valid, see note to Walker v. Bank of Washington, 11: 494.

That purchase of obligation at less than face value is not usury, see note to Nichols v. Pearson, 8: 623.

Lex loci as to usury, see note to Slacum v. Pomery, 3: 205.

The forfeiture declared by the statute is not waived or avoided by giving a separate note for the interest, or by giving a renewal note in which is included the usurious interest. No matter how many renewals may have been made, if the bank has charged a greater rate of interest than the law allows, it must, if the forfeiture clause of the statute be relied on, and the matter is thus brought to the attention of the court, lose the entire interest which the 419] note carries or which *has been agreed to be paid. By no other construction of the statute can effect be given to the clause forfeiting the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt carries, or which was agreed to be paid, but which has not been actually paid.

It is said that, within the meaning of the statute, interest is "paid" when included in a renewal note, and when suit is brought upon the last note, calling for interest from its date, only the interest accruing on the apparent principal of that note is subject to forfeiture. We think that the statute cannot be so construed. If, within the meaning of the statute, interest is "paid" simply by including it in a renewal note, it would follow that as soon as the usurious interest is included in a renewal note, the borrower or obligor could sue the lender or obligee and "recover back . . . twice the amount of interest thus paid," when he had not, in fact, paid the debt nor any part of the interest as such. This cannot be a sound interpretation of the statute. The words "in case the greater rate of interest has been paid," in § 5198, refer to interest actually paid, as distinguished from interest included in the note and only "agreed to be paid." If, for instance, one executes his note to a national bank for a named sum as evidence of a loan to him of that amount to be paid in one year at 10 per cent interest, such a rate of interest being illegal, and if renewal notes are executed each year for five successive years, without any money being in fact paid by the borrower —each renewal note including past interest, legal and usurious—the sum included in the last note, in excess of the sum originally loaned, would be interest which that note carried or which was agreed to be paid, and not, as to any part of it, interest paid.

It is difficult to tell from the record when there were actual payments of usurious interest as such. Sometimes interest is said to have been paid when it is evident that it was only included in a renewal note. But that, as we have said, was not payment within the meaning of the statute. Driesbach v. National Bank, 104 U. S. 52 [26: 658]. If the note when sued on includes usurious interest, or inter-420] est upon usurious interest, *agreed to be paid, the holder may, in due time, elect to remit such interest, and it cannot then be said that usurious interest was paid to him. McBroom v. Scottish Mortgage & Land Investment Co. 153 U. S. 318, 328 [38: 729, 733]; Stevens v. Lincoln, 7 Met. 525, 528; Saunders v. Lambert, 7 Gray, 484, 486; Stedman v. Bland, 4 Ired. L. 296, 299. If at any time the obligee actually pays usurious interest as such, the usurious transaction must be held to have then, and not before, occurred, and he must sue within two years thereafter.

It is proper to state that the judgment before us for review was not in accordance with the views of the court of appeals of Kentucky as expressed when the case was first before that court on appeal. 92 Ky. 607. The ruling then made by that court was not followed in the subsequent case of Sydner v. Mount Sterling National Bank, 94 Ky. 231, in which the language of Judge Acheson in Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Mercer v. Hoagland, 7 Fed. Rep. 159, 161, was approved, as follows: "By the terms of the act of Congress [the national bank act] the charging of such rates of interest [in excess of the legal rate] worked a forfeiture of the entire interest which the several notes carry with them. Now such forfeiture was not waived by the giving of subsequent notes, although as respects them the agreed rate of interest was a legal rate. They were mere renewals, and given without any new consideration. Nor did the new notes operate as payment of the debts for which they were given. In so far, then, as the notes in suit embrace the forfeited interest, they are without consideration. Moreover, it is an established principle that if there be usury in the original transaction it affects all consecutive securities, however remote, growing out of it; and neither the renewal of an old nor the substitution of a new security between the same parties can efface the usury. The bank incorporated in the new notes usurious interest previously charged, as a part of the new principal, and this illegal consideration pervaded the whole subsequent series of notes. Upon fresh renewal interest was charged upon usurious interest which had entered into the prior notes as principal."

*It was contended in the court of ap- [421
peals of Kentucky in the present case that its ruling, when the case was first before it, was different from its subsequent ruling in Sydner v. Mount Sterling National Bank. That court conceded that the two cases were not in harmony on the question whether the bank could recover the usurious interest embraced in the renewal notes.

"Nevertheless," the court said [18 Ky. L. Rep. 186], "we hold that the judgment on the former appeal is the law of this case." It was the latter view which made it necessary for the appellants to prosecute the present appeal.

As the judgment in this case did not proceed upon the principles herein stated, but rested upon an erroneous interpretation of the statute, it must be reversed. The necessary calculations can be made in the state court.

For the reasons stated the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

SAVINGS & LOAN SOCIETY, Appt.,
v.
MULTNOMAH COUNTY, State of Oregon, and Penumbra Kelly, Sheriff Thereof.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 421-432.)

Taxation of mortgagee's interest in the land—tax law of Oregon—does not contravene United States Constitution.

1. The taxation of mortgaged real estate by taxing the mortgagee's interest therein to him, and the rest to the mortgagor, is not a double taxation, nor does it make such discrimination between mortgagors and mortgagees, nor between resident and nonresident mortgagees, as to deny the latter the equal protection of the laws.
2. The tax law of Oregon of 1882, by which the mortgage and the debt secured thereby are taxed, as real estate, to the mortgagee, and the mortgagor is entitled to deduct such debt from his assessment, does not, when applied to mortgages owned by citizens of other states and in their possession outside of the state of Oregon, deprive them of their property without due process of law.
3. Although the right which the mortgage transfers in the land covered thereby is not the legal title, but only an equitable interest and by way of security for the debt, this interest, like any other interest, legal or equitable, may be taxed to its owner (whether resident or nonresident) in the state where the land is situated, without contravening any provision of the United States Constitution.

Argued October 29, 1897. Decided March 7, 1898.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Oregon dismissing a suit in equity brought by the Savings & Loan Society against Multnomah County, Oregon, et al., for an injunction against the sale of land for taxes and for a decree that the statute of Oregon, as applied to mortgages owned and held by a person outside of the state, is contrary to the Constitution of the United States. Affirmed.

See same case below, 60 Fed. Rep. 31.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Milton W. Smith and Walter S. Perry for appellant.

Messrs. John H. Hall, W. T. Hume, and John H. Mitchell for appellee.

422] *Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill in equity, filed in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon, by the Savings & Loan Society, a corporation and citizen of the state of California, against Multnomah county, a public corporation in the state of Oregon, and one Kelly, the sheriff and ex officio the tax collector of that county, and a citizen of that state, showing that in 1891 and 1892 various persons, all citizens of Oregon, severally made their promissory notes to secure the payment of various sums of money, with interest, to the plaintiff at his office in the city of San Francisco and state of California, amounting in all to the sum of $531,000; and to further secure the same debts, executed to the plaintiff mortgages of divers parcels of land owned by them in Multnomah county; that the mortgages were duly recorded in the office of the recorder of conveyances of that county; that the notes and mortgages were immediately delivered to the plaintiff, and have ever since been without the state of Oregon, and in the possession of the plaintiff at San Francisco; that afterwards, in accordance with the statute of Oregon of October 26, 1882, taxes were imposed upon all the taxable property in Multnomah county, including the debts and mortgages aforesaid; that, the taxes upon these debts and mortgages not having been paid, a list thereof was placed in the hands of the sheriff, with a warrant directing him to collect the same as upon execution, and he advertised for sale all the debts and mortgages aforesaid; and that the statute was in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, as depriving the plaintiff of its property without due process of law, and denying to it the equal protection of the laws. The bill prayed for an injunction against the sale; and for a decree declaring that the statute was contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and therefore of no effect, and that all the proceedings before set out were null and void; and for further relief.

The defendants demurred generally; and the court *sustained the demurrer, and dis [423 missed the bill. 60 Fed. Rep. 31. The plaintiff appealed to this court.

The ground upon which the plaintiff seeks to maintain this suit is that the tax act of the state of Oregon of 1882, as applied to the mortgages owned and held by the plaintiff in California, of lands in Oregon, is contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, as depriving the plaintiff of its property without due process of law, and denying to it the equal protection of the laws.

The statute in question makes the following provisions for the taxation of mortgages: By § 1 "a mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or other obligation whereby land and real property situated in no more than one county in this state is made security for the payment of a debt, together with such debt, shall, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, be deemed and treated as land or real property." By § 2 the mortgage, "together with such debt, shall be assessed and taxed to the owner of such security and debt in the county, city, or district in which the land or real property affected by such security is situated;" and may be sold, like other real property, for the payment of taxes due thereon. By § 3 that person is to be deemed the owner who appears to be such on the record of the mortgage, either as the original mortgagee, or as an assignee by transfer made in writing upon the margin of the record. By § 4 no payment on the debt so secured is to be taken into consideration in assessing the tax, unless likewise stated upon the record; and the debt and mortgage are to be assessed for the full amount appearing by the record to be owing, unless in the judgment of the assessor the land is not worth so much, in which case they are to be assessed at their real cash value. By §§ 5, 6, 7, it is made the duty of each county clerk to record, in the margin of the record of any mortgage, when requested so to do by the mortgagee or owner of the mortgage, all assignments thereof and payments thereon; and to deliver annually to the assessor abstracts containing the requisite information as to unsatisfied mortgages recorded in his office. By § 8 a debt secured by mortgage of land 424] in a county of this state "shall, *for the purposes of taxation, be deemed and considered as indebtedness within this state, and the person or persons owing such debt shall be entitled to deduct the same from his or their assessments in the same manner that other indebtedness within the state is deducted." And by § 9 "no promissory note or other instrument of writing which is the evidence of a debt that is wholly or partly secured by land or real property situated in no more than one county in this state shall be taxed for any purpose in this state, but the debt evidenced thereby, and the instrument by which it is secured, shall, for the purpose of assessment and taxation, be deemed and considered as land or real property, and together be assessed and taxed as hereinbefore provided." Oregon Laws of 1882, p. 64. All these sections are embodied in Hill's Annotated Code of Oregon, §§ 2730, 2735-2738, 2753–2756.

The statute applies only to mortgages of land in not more than one county. By the last clause of § 8, all mortgages, "hereafter executed, whereby land situated in more than one county in this state is made security for the payment of a debt, shall be void." The mortgages now in question were all made since the statute, and were of land in a single county; and it is not suggested in the bill that there existed any untaxed mortgage of lands in more than one county.

The statute, in terms, provides that "no promissory note or other instrument of writing, which is the evidence of" the debt secured by the mortgage, "shall be taxed for any purpose within this state;" but that the debt and mortgage, "shall, for the purpose of assessment and taxation, be deemed and considered as land or real property" in the county in which the land is situated, and be there taxed, not beyond their real cash value, to the person appearing of record to be the owner of the mortgage,

The statute authorizes the amount of the mortgage debt to be deducted from any assessment upon the mortgagor; and does not provide for both taxing to the mortgagee the money secured by the mortgage, and also taxing to the mortgagor the whole mortgaged property, 425] as did the statutes of other *states, the validity of which was affirmed in Augusta Bank v. Augusta, 36 Me. 255, 259; Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Lott, 54 Ala. 499; Appeal Tax Court v. Rice, 50 Md. 302; and Goldgart v. People, Goar, 106 Ill. 25.

The right to deduct from his assessment any debts due from him within the state is secured as well to the mortgagee as to the mortgagor, by a provision of the statute of Oregon of October 25, 1880 (unrepealed by the statute of 1882, and evidently assumed by § 8 of this statute to be in force), by which "it shall be the duty of the assessor to deduct the amount of indebtedness, within the state, of any person assessed, from the amount of his or her taxable property." Oregon Laws of 1880, p. 52; Hill's Code, § 2752.

Taking all the provisions of the statute into consideration, its clear intent and effect are as follows: The personal obligation of the mortgagor to the mortgagee is not taxed at all. The mortgage and the debt secured thereby are taxed, as real estate, to the mortgagee, not beyond their real cash value, and only so far as they represent an interest in the real estate mortgaged. The debt is not taxed separately, but only together with the mortgage; and is considered as indebtedness within the state for no other purpose than to enable the mortgagor to deduct the amount thereof from the assessment upon him, in the same manner as other indebtedness within the state is deducted. And the mortgagee, as well as the mortgagor, is entitled to have deducted from his own assessment the amount of his indebtedness within the state.

The result is that nothing is taxed but the real estate mortgaged, the interest of the mortgagee therein being taxed to him, and the rest to the mortgagor. There is no double taxation. Nor is any such discrimination made between mortgagors and mortgagees, or between resident and nonresident mortgagees, as to deny to the latter the equal protection of the laws.

No question between the mortgagee and the mortgagor, arising out of the contract between them, in regard to the payment of taxes, or otherwise, is presented or can be decided upon this record.

*The case, then, reduces itself to the [426 question whether this tax act, as applied to mortgages owned by citizens of other states and in their possession outside of the state of Oregon, deprives them of their property without due process of law.

By the law of Oregon, indeed, as of some other states of the Union, a mortgage of real property does not convey the legal title to the mortgagee, but creates only a lien or encumbrance as security for the mortgage debt; and the right of possession, as well as the legal title, remains in the mortgagor, both before and after condition broken, until foreclosure. Oregon General Laws of 1843-1872, § 323; Hill's Code, 326; Anderson v. Baxter, 4 Or. 105, 110; Semple v. Bank of British Columbia, 5 Sawy. 88, 394; Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242 [28: 415]; Sellwood v. Gray, 11 Or. 534; Watson v. Dundee & T. Invest. Co. 12 Or. 474; Thompson v. Marshall, 21 Or. 171; Adair v. Adair, 22 Or. 115.

Notwithstanding this, it has been held, both by the supreme court of the state, and by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon, that the state has the power to tax [illegible] and held by citizens and residents of other states, of lands in Oregon. Mumford v. Sewall, 11 Or. 67; Dundee Mortgage Trust Invest. Co. v. School Dist No. 1, 10 Sawy. 72; Crawford v. Linn County, 11 Or. 482; Dundee Mortgage Trust Invest. Co. v. Parish 11 Sawy. 92; Poppleton v. Yamhill County, 18 Or. 377, 383 [7 L. R. A. 449]; Savings & Loan Society v. Multnomah County, 60 Fed Rep. 31.

In Mumford v. Sewall, Judge Waldo, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "All subjects, things as well as persons, over which the power of the state extends, may be taxed. . . . A mortgage, as such, is incorporeal property. It may be the subject of taxation. . . . Concede that the debt accompanies the respondent's person and is without the jurisdiction of the state. But the security she holds is Oregon security. It cannot be enforced in any other jurisdiction. It is local in Oregon absolutely as the land which it binds. . . . Since the power of the state over the mortgage is as exclusive and complete as over the land mortgaged, the mortgage is 427] subject to *taxation by the state, unless there is constitutional limitation to the contrary." 11 Or. 68, 69.

"In Mumford v Sewall," said Judge Deady in Dundee Mortgage-Trust Invest. Co. v. School District No. 1, "the court held that a mortgage upon real property in this state is taxable by the state without reference to the domicil of the owner, or the situs of the debt or note secured thereby. And this conclusion is accepted by this court as the law of this case. Nor do I wish to be understood as having any doubt about the soundness of the decision. A mortgage upon real property in this state whether considered as a conveyance of the same, giving the creditor an interest in or right to the same, or merely a contract giving him a lien thereon for his debt and the power to enforce the payment thereof by the sale of the premises, is a contract affecting real property in the state, and dependent for its existence, maintenance, and enforcement upon the laws and tribunals thereof, and may be taxed here as any other interest in, right to, or power over land. And the mere fact that the instrument has been sent out of the state for the time being, for the purpose of avoiding taxation thereon or otherwise, is immaterial." 10 Sawy. 63, 64.

The authority of every state to tax all property, real and personal, within its jurisdiction, is unquestionable. M'Culloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316, 429 [4: 579, 607]. Personal property, as this court has declared again and again, may be taxed, either at the domicil of its owner, or at the place where the property is situated, even if the owner is neither a citizen nor a resident of the state which imposes the tax. Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 490, 499 [22: 189, 193]; State Railroad Tax Cases [Taylor v. Secor], 92 U. S. 575, 607 [23: 669, 671]; Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 524 [29: 715, 717]; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 22, 27 [35: 613, 616, 618 [3 Inters. Com. Rep. 595]. The state may tax real estate mortgaged, as it may all other property within its jurisdiction, at its full value. It may do this, either by taxing the whole to the mortgagor, or by taxing to the mortgagee the interest the ein represented by the mortgage, and to the mortgagor the remaining interest in the land. And it may, for the purposes of taxation, either treat the mortgage debt as personal property, to be taxed like other choses in *action, to the creditor at his domicil; or treat the mortgagee's interest in the land as real estate, to be taxed to him, like other real property, at its situs. Firemen's F. Ins. Co. v. Commonwealth, 137 Mass. 80, 81; State, Vanatta, v. Runyon, 41 N. J. L. 98, 105; Darcy v. Darcy, 51 N. J. L. 140, 145 [2 L. R. A. 350]; People, Jefferson, v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 576, 585; Common Council v. Assessors [Detroit v. Detroit Bd. of Assessors], 91 Mich. 78, 92 [16 L. R. A. 59]. 428

The plaintiff much relied on the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Field in Cleveland, Painesville, & Ashtabula Railroad v. Pennsylvania, reported under the name of Case of the State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 300, 323 [21: 179, 188]. It becomes important therefore to notice exactly what was there decided. In that case, a railroad company, incorporated both in Ohio and in Pennsylvania, had issued bonds secured by a mortgage of its entire road in both states; and the tax imposed by the state of Pennsylvania, which was held by a majority of this court to be invalid, was a tax upon the interest due to the bondholders upon the bonds, and was not a tax upon the railroad, or upon the mortgage thereof, or upon the bondholders solely by reason of their interest in that mortgage. The remarks in the opinion, supported by quotations from opinions of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, that a mortgage, being a mere security for the debt, confers upon the holder of the mortgage no interest in the land, and where held by a nonresident, is as much beyond the jurisdiction of the state as the person of the owner, went beyond what was required for the decision of the case, and cannot be reconciled with other decisions of this court and of the supreme court of Pennsylvania.

This court has always held that a mortgage of real estate, made in good faith by a debtor to secure a private debt, is a conveyance of such an interest in the land as will defeat the priority given to the United States by act of Congress in the distribution of the debtor's estate. United States v. Hooe, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 73 [2: 370]; Thelusson v. Smith, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 396, 426 [4: 271, 278]; Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co. 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 386, 441 [7: 189, 213].

In Hutchins v. King, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 53, 58 [17: 544, 546], Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, said that "the interest of *the mortgagee is now generally treated [429 by the courts of law as real estate, only so far as it may be necessary for the protection of the mortgagee and to give him the full benefit of his security." See also Waterman v. Mackenzie, 138 U. S. 252, 258 [34: 923, 927]. If the law treats the mortgagee's interest in the land as real estate for his protection, it is not easy to see why the law should forbid it to be treated as real estate for the purpose of taxation.

The leading quotation, in 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 323 [21: 188], from the Pennsylvania reports, is this general statement of Mr. Justice Woodward: "The mortgagee has no estate in the land, any more than the judgment creditor. Both have liens upon it, and no more than liens." Witmer's Appeal, 45 Pa. 455, 463 [84 Am. Dec. 505]. Yet the same judge, three years later, treated it as unquestionable that a mortgage of real estate in Pennsylvania was taxable there, without regard to the domicil of the mortagee. Maltby v. Reading & Columbia Railroad Co. 52 Pa. 140, 147.

The effect of a mortgage as a conveyance of an interest in real estate in Pennsylvania has been clearly brought out in two judgments delivered by Mr. Justice Strong, the one in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and the other in this court.

Speaking for the same judges who decided Witmer's Appeal, above cited, and in a case decided less than two months previously, reported in the same volume, and directly presenting the question for adjudication, Mr. Justice Strong said, of mortgages of real estate; "They are in form defeasible sales, and in substance grants of specific security, or interests in land for the purpose of seeurity. Ejectment may be maintained by a mortgagee, or he may hold possession on the footing of ownership, and with all its ineidents. And though it is often decided to be a security or lien, yet, so far as it is necessary to render it effective as a security, there is always a recognition of the fact that it is a transfer of the title." Britton's Appeal, 45 Pa. 172, 177, 178. It should be remembered that in the eourts of the state of Pennsylvania, for want of a court of chancery, an equitable title was always held sufficient to 430]*sustain an action of ejectment. Simpson v. Ammons, 1 Binn. 175; Youngman v. Elmira & Williamsport Railroad Co. 65 Pa. 278, 285, and cases there cited.

Again, in an action of ejeetment, eommenced in the circuit eourt of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, Mr. Justice Strong, delivering the unanimous opinion of this court, said: "It is true that a mortgage is in snbstauce but a security for a debt, or an obligation, to which it is eollateral. As between the mortgagor and all others than the mortgagee, it is a lien, a security, and not an estate. But as between the parties to the instrument, or their privies, it is a grant which operates to transmit the legal title to the mortgagee, and leaves the mortgagor only a right to redeem. . . . Courts of equity," he went on to say, "as fully as courts of law, have always regarded the legal title to be in the mortgagee until redemption, and bills to redeem are entertained upon the principle that the mortgagee holds for the mortgagor when the debt secured by the mortgage has been paid or tendered. And such is the law of Pennsylvania. There, as elsewhere, the mortgagee, after breach of the condition, may enter or maintain ejectment for the land." Applying these principles, it was held that one claiming under the mortgagor, having only an equitable title, could not maintain an action of ejectment against one in possession under the mortgagee, while the mortgage remained in existence, or until there had been a redemption; because an equitable title would not sustain an action of ejectment in the courts of the United States Brobst v. Brock [Doe, Brobst, v. Roe], 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 519, 529, 530 [19: 1002, 1004, 1005].

In a later case in Pennsylvania, Chief Justice Agnew, upon a full review of the authorities in that state, said: "Ownership of the debt carries with it that of the mortgage; and its assignment or succession in the event of death vests the right to the mortgage in the assignee or the personal representative of the deceased owner. But there is a manifest differenee between the debt, which is a mere chose in action, and the land which secures its payment. Of the former there can be no possession, except that of the writing which evidences the *obligation to pay; but of [431 the latter, the land or pledge, there may be. The debt is intangible, the land tangible. The mortgage passes to the mortgagee the title and right of possession to hold till payment shall be made." Tryon v. Munson, 77 Pa. 250, 262.

In Kirtland v. Hotchkiss 42 Conn. 426 affirmed by this court in 100 U. S. 491 [25: 558], the point adjudged was that debts to persons residing in one state, secured by mortgage of land in another state, might, for the purposes of taxation, be regarded as situated at the domicil of the creditor. But the question whether the mortgage could be taxed there only was not involved in the case, and was not decided, either by the supreme court of Connecticut or by this court.

In many other cases cited by the appellant, there was no statute expressly taxing mortgages at the situs of the land; and, although the opinions in some of them took a wider range, the only question in judgment in any of them was one of the construction, not of the constitutionality, of a statute—of the intention, not of the power, of the legislature. Such were: Davenport v. Mississippi & Missouri Railroad Co. 12 Iowa, 539; Latrobe v. Baltimore, 19 Md. 13; People v. Eastman, 25 Cal. 601; State v. Earl, 1 Nev. 394; Arapahoe County Comrs. v. Cutter, 3 Colo. 349; People, Jefferson, v. Smith, 88 N. Y. 576; Grant v. Jones, 39 Ohio St. 506; State v. Smith, 68 Miss 79; Holland v. Silver Bow County Commissioners, 15 Mont. 460 [27 L. R. A. 797].

The statute of Oregon, the constitutionality of which is now drawn in question, expressly forbids any taxation of the promissory note, or other instrument of writing, which is the evidence of the debt secured by the mortgage; and, with equal distinctness, provides for the taxation, as real estate, of the mortgage interest in the land. Although the right which the mortgage transfers in the land covered thereby is not the legal title, but only an equitable interest and by way of security for the debt, it appears to us to be clear upon principle, and in accordance with the weight of authority, that this interest, like any other interest, legal or equitable, may be taxed to its owner (whether resident or nonresident) in the state*where[432 the land is situated, without contravening any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Decree affirmed.

Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice White dissented.

Mr. Justice McKenna, not having been a member of the court when this case was argued, took no part in the decision.

Questions reviewable—injunction, when cannot be granted by state court—Federal question—jurisdiction of state court—power to execute decree.

1. Questions as to the time within which, and the grounds upon which, a bill of review can be maintained in a state court, and whether the plaintiffs are chargeable with knowledge of a prior suit, are not reviewable by this court on writ of error to a state court.
2. An injunction against enforcing remedies adjudged by decree of a Federal court cannot be granted by a state court, when the Federal court had complete jurisdiction which attached long before the suit began in the state court.
3. Whether due effect has been given by a state court to a judgment or decree of a Federal court is a Federal question within the jurisdiction of this court, on writ of error to the state court.
4. The jurisdiction of a state court to grant an injunction against enforcing a decree of a circuit court of the United States cannot be based on the fact that after the decree was rendered a judgment of another court, on which the decree was founded, had been set aside for fraud.
5. To deprive a court of the power to execute its decrees is to essentially impair its jurisdiction.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

The Lebanon Springs Railroad Company was organized in the year 1852, and, by virtue of various acts of the legislatures of New York and Vermont, was authorized to construct and maintain a railroad extending from Chatham, New York, to Bennington, Vermont. On the 1st day of July, 1867, the said company duly executed and delivered to the Union Trust Company of New York a mortgage of that date on all its property, rights, and franchises, to secure the payment of bonds to the amount of $2,000,000, which bonds were then or soon after sold to a great number of persons. In January, 1870, the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company consolidated with the Bennington & Rutland Railroad Company, under the name and style of the Harlem Extension Railroad Company. The new company, on April 1, 1870, executed and delivered to the said Union Trust Company a mortgage on its road and franchises to secure bonds to the amount of $4,000,000. Of these bonds there were sold to outside parties to the amount of $1,500,000. The *remainding $2,500,000 of [434 bonds were reserved to take up and be exchanged for the $2,000,000 of bonds of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company and for $500,000 of bonds which had been issued by the Bennington & Rutland Railroad Company, but such exchange never took place, and accordingly only $1,500,000 of the said bonds of the Harlem Extension Railroad Company were ever issued. Both said mortgages were duly recorded in the proper counties in the states of New York and Vermont.

On February 22, 1872, the interest upon the said bonds of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company falling due after January, 1869, not having been paid, the Union Trust Company of New York began an action in the supreme court of New York to foreclose the mortgage of that company, in which action the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company and the Harlem Extension Railroad Company were made defendants.

On November 15, 1872, the Union Trust Company of New York filed bills in the court of chancery in the state of Vermont to foreclose both of said mortgages, in which actions the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company and the Harlem Extension Railroad Company were made defendants, and said defendants duly appeared in that court prior to December 1, 1872.

While the above-mentioned actions were pending, and on December 18, 1872, the Harlem Extension Railroad Company and the Pine Plains & Albany Railroad Company, a corporation of the state of New York, consolidated their roads, property, and capital stock, under the name of the Harlem Extension Railroad Company; and on December 19, 1872, the New York, Boston, & Northern Railroad Company and the said last-named, the Harlem Extension Railroad Company, duly consolidated their roads, property, and capital stock, and thus formed one company under the name of the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company.

The above-mentioned foreclosure suits were so proceeded with that, in the said action in the supreme court of New York, a judgment of foreclosure of the said mortgage given by the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, and for a 435] sale of *its road, property, and franchises within the state of New York, and of all its right, title, and interest to the railroad and franchises within the state of Vermont, was rendered on December 10, 1872; and on January 25, 1873, the property and franchises mentioned were sold to one William Butler Duncan for the price of $100,000 and, on said day, Charles S. Fairchild, the referee appointed by the court to effect the sale, executed and delivered to one James C. Hull his deed of conveyance of the said road, property, and franchises, bearing date the said 25th January, 1873, and said deed was duly recorded in the clerks' offices for the counties of Rensselaer and Columbia.

On the 7th day of December, 1872, decrees of foreclosure of the mortgage of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company and of the Harlem Extension Railroad Company's mortgage, and directing a sale, were rendered; and in pursuance of such decrees the said road, property, and franchises within the state of Vermont were, by Daniel McEwen, a special master in chancery, appointed by the court for that purpose, sold on January 20, 1873, to one Charles G. Lincoln, for the sum of $50,000 and deeds of conveyance of that date were made and delivered to said Lincoln by the said master in chancery.

On January 28, 1873, Hull and Lincoln, the respective purchasers at the said foreclosure sales, executed and delivered to the said William Butler Duncan and to one Trevor W. Park a bond in the sum of $5,000,000, and a mortgage to secure the same on all the roads, property, and franchises of the Harlem Extension Railroad Company, including those of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company and of the New York & Vermont Railroad Company.

On January 30, 1873, Hull and wife, by their deed executed and delivered that day, conveyed all said roads, property, and franchises, 436] situated in the *state of New York, to the said, the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company, subject, however, to said mortgage to Duncan and Park; and, on the same day, Lincoln, by a deed executed and delivered by him, conveyed said roads, property, and franchises, situated in the state of Vermont, to the said the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company, subject to the said mortgage to Duncan and Park, and to the said $500,000 mortgage on the old Bennington & Rutland Railroad.

The New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company paid the sum of $807,077.05 on account of the moneys due on said bond and mortgage, which had become wholly due and payable on or before February 1, 1875, but has never paid the remainder of the money due on said bond and mortgage.

On March 15, 1873, the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company executed and delivered a certain other mortgage in the amount of $12,250,000 to Seligman, Sherman, and Brown as trustees. This mortgage covered the above-mentioned railroad and other properties. On the 1st day of April, 1873, the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company executed and delivered still another mortgage on the said railroad and other things in the amount of $12,750,000 in which the New York Loan & Indemnity Company was named as trustee. Enough of the bonds of the said last two mortgages were sold to realize $6,000,000, which were received and disbursed by Seligman and Brown. The said railroad was operated by and on behalf of the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company until some time in November, 1873, when said company leased the road to the Central Vermont Railroad Company, by which it was operated until August 20, 1877, when said last-mentioned company withdrew from the possession of and abandoned the road. In the meantime the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company had failed to fulfil its obligations and had become wholly insolvent, and said railroad, when surrendered and abandoned by its lessee, lay unoccupied and unoperated until some time in September, 1877, when it was taken possession of by one Russell C. Root, who subsequently, in November, 1877, delivered possession thereof to a corporation called the Harlem Extension Railroad South Coal Transportation Company, a corporation of the state of New York, and of which said Root was president, *and which continued [437 to operate said railroad until it came into the possession of John W. Vau Valkenburgh as hereinafter stated.

On September 7, 1889, one Marvin Sackett, claiming to be the owner of bonds to the amount of $8,700, issued as before mentioned, by the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, brought an action in the supreme court of New York against the said Russell C. Root, the Harlem Extension Railroad South Coal Transportation Company, the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company and Daniel Butterfield, as receiver of the said last-mentioned company, praying for the sale of the whole of the said railroad property and franchises. He claimed to bring the action in behalf of himself and all others, bondholders of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, similarly situated, who held any of the $2,000,000 of the bonds of said company. He alleged in his complaint the fact of the mortgage, to secure his bonds, among others, to the Union Trust Company of New York, its actions to foreclose the sales under them, the aforesaid sales to Hull and Lincoln, and their mortgage to Park and Duncan, and the conveyance by the latter to the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company, and that Hull and Lincoln and Park and Duncan, acted throughout all those matters as the agents and representatives, and for the use and benefit of the bondholders of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company.

The summons and complaint were served upon the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company and upon Butterfield as receiver, but they did not appear. Russell C. Root and the Harlem Extension Railroad South Coal Transportation Company were also served, and they put in joint answers on September 25, 1880. On October 1, 1880, the complainant Sackett moved for the appointment of a receiver, and on October 7, John W. Van Valkenburgh was appointed and filed his bond as receiver.

On November 12, 1880, one Bloodgood and six others, claiming to own a majority of the bonds of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, 438] moved for leave to be made *parties to the action. This motion was, on January 10, 1881, denied, but the plaintiff was directed to serve papers and notices of every kind on one F. L. Westbrook, who was by the owner authorized to appear as counsel of the said Bloodgood and the other six bondholders, upon all trials, hearings, and motions. On November 6, 1880, Park and Duncan made an application to the court to be made parties to the action, alleging that they were the owners of over $300,000 of bonds of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, and of over $600,000 of bonds of the Harlem Extension Railroad Company, and that they were the mortgagees under the mortgage made by Hull and Lincoln. This application was not granted. One Henry A. Tilden, who claimed to own thirty of the bonds of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, was associated with Sackett in the bringing of said action, and appeared by counsel. On October 11, 1880, the receiver filed a petition, setting forth that he had no funds with which to equip or operate the road, and asking that he might be allowed to borrow $25,000 on certificates for that purpose, and on October 25, 1880, the court made an order authorizing the receiver to borrow $25,000 on certificates, which were declared to be a first lien on the net profits of the railroad company. On February 23, 1881, the receiver filed a petition setting forth that there were large arrears of taxes, for which sales had taken place of portions of the road, that there was a necessity for the purchase of rails and superstructures, and praying that he might be authorized to issue certificates to raise the necessary moneys to redeem such portions of the road as had been sold for taxes and to purchase rails and make other necessary repairs. Notice of this petition was filed on Hamilton Ward, attorney general of the state of New York; on McClellan and Brown, attorneys for Sackett, the plaintiff; on P. W. Ostremder, attorney for R. C. Root, defendant, and on F. W. Westbrook, attorney designated to receive notices on behalf of Bloodgood and others.

On March 5, 1881, the court, after hearing Edward Newcomb, of counsel for said receiver, and F. L. Westbrook, of counsel in opposition thereto, appointed James H. Jones, an 439]*expert, to examine the rails, ties, bridges, roadbed, trestles, telegraph poles, and all matters pertaining to the running of the Lebanon Springs Railroad, to the end that he should make a report to the court of the true condition of the Lebanon Springs Railroad, with his opinion thereon as to what was necessary and requisite for the protection of said property and the safety and successful running of said railroad; that said report be made to said receiver, and that said receiver should return said report, together with a detailed statement of moneys received and expended by him, with such other information he should have in relation to said railroad; and further directing that said reports and papers should be served on F. L. Westbrook ten days prior to the hearing on said report before the court.

On March 19, 1881, James H. Jones made an elaborate report to the receiver, stating that he had, in pursuance of his appointment, made a careful examination of the said railroad, its rails, ties, bridges, roadbed, trestles, telegraph poles, and all matters appertaining to the running and management thereof; that he found the rails of iron worn to such an extent as to render the running of trains, even at an ordinary rate of speed, extremely dangerous; that to render the track safe for ordinary use would require from 2,500 to 3,000 tons of new rails to replace the poorer conditioned of the old ones; that the ties were badly decayed, to replace which would require about 87,000 new ties; that the road required new ballasting; that the bridges and trestles were in an unsafe condition, all needing repair; that to repair the bridges and trestles and abutments would require an expenditure of some $19,000; that new telegraph poles to the number of 2,030 were required; that, in fine, to put said road in a condition to render its operation safe and successful would require about $320,000. This report was returned to court by the receiver, with a statement of his receipts and expenditures to date, and on April 4, 1881, the court, after considering said reports and hearing counsel for the receiver, and no one appearing in opposition thereto, ordered the receiver to put said road in repair as recommended by the report of James H. Jones, and *author- [440 ized him to issue receiver's certificates, dated April 2, 1881, with interest at 6 per cent for the aggregate amount of $350,000, the same to be signed by said John W. Van Valkenburgh, as receiver of said Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, and a certificate on each thereof duly to be signed by an officer of the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company of New York city. It was further ordered that the said receiver should negotiate said certificates, and with the money arising therefrom pay and discharge the $25,000 of certificates theretofore authorized by the order of October 25, 1880, and to purchase all necessary materials for the repairs of said road, and pay and discharge all necessary expenses incident to said repairs. It was further ordered that said receiver's certificates of indebtedness should be declared to be a debt of the receiver incurred for the benefit and protection of said Lebanon Springs Railroad and its owners and the bondholders thereof, and said certificates were declared and decreed to be a first lien on the railroad and every kind of property owned by the company, to be recognized as such in any reorganization of the company or in its consolidation with any other company; and in case of any sale of the said railroad, the property in the hands of the receiver, and the franchises, under any decree of the supreme court, the said certificates are to be first paid from the first moneys realized thereupon by the receiver, unless sooner paid and canceled by him from the earnings of the railroad; but in case said railroad and property in the hands of the receiver and franchises, on any sale thereof, does not bring sufficient to pay the full amount and interest then due on the outstanding negotiated certificates, then such unpaid amount shall remain as a first lien on the road, property, and franchises in the hands of the purchaser.

On January 12, 1885, a final decree of sale was made, appointing George McClellan as referee to make such sale, and providing, among other things, that sale should be made subject to the payment of the undue principal and interest of the receiver's certificates, and that the purchaser of the railroad and franchises should take said railroad, property, and franchises, subject to the unpaid portion of 441] said certificates, *which should be assumed by such purchaser as part of the consideration of the purchase.

On June 29, 1885, George McClellan, the referee, reported to the court that he had effected sale, in accordance with the terms of the decree of sale, to one William Foster, Jr., trustee, for the sum of $155,000, and that, among the terms of the sale, it was stipulated that William Foster, Jr., trustee, should take the property and assets, subject to the payment of the undue principal and interest of the receiver's certificates.

Subsequently, the referee executed and delivered to William Foster, Jr., and Rowland N. Hazard, as purchaser, a deed of conveyance, and received from them $155,000, the amount of their bid; and it appears that, out of the amount of said purchase money, there was then paid about $60,000, the interest then due on said certificates. Afterwards, it appears by the record that Foster and Hazard conveyed the railroad, property, and franchises to the New York, Rutland, & Montreal Railway Company, to which company Reynolds, who had succeeded Van Valkenburgh as receiver, surrendered possession of the railroad. The balance of the purchase money was used and applied as directed by the judgment in the said Sackett suit.

The principal of said certificates became due on the 1st day of April, 1886, and was not paid. Thereupon, in the month of April, 1886, the Central National Bank of Boston brought an action in the supreme court of New York in behalf of itself as well as other holders of receiver's certificates, against William Foster, Jr., Rowland N. Hazard, the New York, Rutland, & Montreal Railway Company, and the American Loan & Trust Company of New York. All of the defendants in said action appeared and answered. After issue was joined, the said action was, on the petition of the defendants, duly removed into the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of New York.

The complaint alleged, in substance, that the plaintiff is a banking association duly organized and incorporated under the laws of the United States, located and doing business in the city of Boston, in the commonwealth of 442] Massachusetts. *It alleged the making of an order on or about April 2, 1881, by the New York supreme court in the Sackett suit, whereby one John W. Van Valkenburgh, as receiver of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, was authorized and directed to issue under his hand receiver's certificates of indebtedness, dated April 2, 1881, with interest at 6 per cent, of $500 each, payable in five years, interest payable January 1 and July 1 in each year, to the aggregate amount of $350,000, such certificates and the interest coupons thereto attached made payable at the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company in the city of New York, and whereby it was further ordered that the receiver negotiate said certificates to the amount aforesaid, and with the moneys arising thereupon pay and discharge certain previous certificates theretofore authorized by an order of the same court, and from the moneys arising from said certificates, that said receiver purchase all necessary materials for the repairs of said railroad, and to pay and discharge all necessary expenses incident to the repairs thereof, and all other expenses attending the running and successful managing and operating of said railroad, together with such indebtedness as might be found due to claimants by the referee named in said order; that it was further provided in said order that the said receiver's certificates of indebtedness to the amount therein directed to be issued, be and the same were thereby declared to be a debt of the said receiver, incurred for the benefit and protection of the said Lebanon Springs Railroad and its owners and bondholders, and said certificates to the amount of $350,000 were by said order declared to be a first lien on the railroad and all and every kind of property owned by said railroad company or in the possession of the receiver thereof, and that said certificates were to be recognized as such in any reorganization of the company, and that in case of any sale of the railroad, the property in the hands of the receiver, and franchises under any decree of the supreme court, said certificates were to be first paid from the first moneys realized therefrom by said receiver, unless sooner paid and canceled by him from the earnings of said railroad. It was further provided in said order that in case said railroad property in the hands of *the receiver and[443 franchises on any sale thereof should not bring sufficient to pay the full amount of principal and interest then due on the outstanding negotiated certificates in said order authorized to be issued, then the purchaser of said railroad and the property in the hands of the receiver and franchises, should assume, as a first lien thereon, so much of said principal as at that time should remain outstanding and unpaid with interest thereon, referring to the original order or the record thereof.

The complaint further alleged that the said Van Valkenburgh, as receiver, under and in pursuance of said order, did issue and negotiate such certificates of indebtedness in the manner and form by said order provided to the amount of $350,000, and that he duly applied the moneys received from said certificates to the uses and purposes mentioned and in said order authorized; that the plaintiff is now and has for several years last past been the owner and holder of said certificates, amounting in the aggregate to $250,000 of principal thereof, and that the certificates issued and negotiated by the receiver which are not held by plaintiff are held by divers persons and corporations, many of whose names are unknown to the plaintiff.

The complaint further alleged that in the said Sackett suit the plaintiff appeared by its attorneys on the trial of the issues and made proof in regard to the issuing of said certifi cates and its title thereto, and that such proceedings were had therein that a judgment was rendered on or about January 12, 1885, by which it was, among other things, adjudged and decreed that the said certificates, amount ing in the aggregate to $350,000, were ratified and confirmed and declared to be a first lien on the railroad and its property, as provided in the said order, for the amount of principal and interest unpaid thereon, subject to the payment of certain costs and expenses in said judgment provided for, and whereby it was further adjudged and decreed that the property, franchises, and rights of the said railroad company as described in a certain mortgage therein referred to, and in the judgment in said Sackett suit, and all the rights, title, and interest 444] of any and *of all the parties to the said action, including all property and assets in the hands of said receiver, be sold at public auction under the direction of a referee therein named, for the benefit of the first-mortgage bondholders of said railroad company issued July 1, 1867, for the amount of $2,000,000, and that said sale be made subject to the payment of the undue principal and interest of the said receiver's certificates, and that the purchaser or purchasers of said railroad property and franchises should take the said railroad property and franchises subject to the unpaid principal and interest on the said receiver's certificates, and should assume, as part of the consideration of the purchase, the payment thereof, and from the avails of said sale, after the payment of certain expenses therein provided for, the said referee should pay the amount of interest due on said receiver's certificates; that under and in pursuance of said judgment, the referee named therein did advertise for sale on the 12th day of June, 1885, and did sell at public auction, the premises, rights, franchises, and property in said judgment mentioned and described, to the defendants, William Foster, Jr., and Rowland N. Hazard, who became the purchasers thereof for the price of $155,000, and that the said William Foster, Jr., acting on behalf of himself and said Hazard, did pay the referee 5 per cent of the purchase price, and did subscribe a certain contract of sale, which was also subscribed by said referee, whereby, among other things, he did, for himself and said Hazard, assume and agree to pay the amount of said principal and interest on said certificates of indebtedness as part of the consideration of said purchase; that the balance of said $155,000 was thereafter paid by the purchasers to the referee, and that the referee did thereafter duly execute and deliver to the defendants Foster and Hazard a deed of said premises and property in said judgment described, and paid from the said $155,000 the interest then due on said certificates, amounting to about $60,000.

Plaintiff further alleged in said complaint that said referee's deed was duly accepted by the defendants Foster and Hazard, and that in and by the deed the grantees therein, the defendants Hazard and Foster, took said premises 445]and property *subject to the unpaid principal and interest on the receiver's certificates, as required by the judgment aforesaid; that the principal of said certificates with interest from January 1, 1886, became due and payable on the 2d day of April, 1886, and that on that day the said certificates, amounting to $250,000, held by the plaintiff, were duly presented to the Farmer's Loan & Trust Company of the city of New York, where the same were payable, and payment thereof was demanded, but the same was refused, and that the whole of said principal with interest from the 1st day of January, 1886, is now due and unpaid. The complaint then gives a description of the railroad premises mentioned in the judgment in the Sackett suit and in the referee's deed; alleges that the defendants or some of them are now in possession of the property above described, and are using and operating the same for railroad purposes, and that all the defendants have or claim to have some interest in or lien upon said premises or some part thereof, which interest or lien, if any, has accrued subsequently to the lien of said certificates, and that there is now justly due the plaintiff upon said certificates held by it the sum of $250,000, with interest from January 1, 1886.

The complaint then prays that the unpaid principal and interest of said receiver's certificates may be adjudged to be a lien upon said premises; asks for the usual judgment of foreclosure, for a receiver, and for a sale, and that out of the moneys arising from the sale of said premises, plaintiff and other holders of said certificates who may come in and prove their title thereto and the amount due thereon may be paid the amount due on said certificates with interest and costs, so far as the amount of such moneys properly applicable thereto will pay the same, and that the defendants Hazard and Foster may be adjudged to pay any deficiency that may remain after applying said moneys so applicable thereto, and for general relief.

The defendants all appeared and answered. Hazard and Foster answered separately, admitting their purchase substantially as alleged in the complaint, controverting some of the other allegations, and setting up as a distinct defense that they *acquired the property men [446 tioned in the plaintiff's complaint with notice that the receiver's certificates were outstanding and of the sum justly due therefor, and that they have ever since been and now are ready and willing to pay the sum justly due on account of said receiver's certificates, but that they are advised and believe that the plaintiff is not entitled to receive payment thereof; that when the said property came into the hands of these defendants, it was subject to a lien for the amount actually due from the receiver and his successor in the trust for the amount of said receiver's certificates, but for no other or greater amount; and that these defendants when they acquired the property succeeded to all the rights of the prior owners of the property as well as to their obligations; that in accepting the deed of the premises, they intended only to obligate themselves to pay the amount actually due from the receiver on account of such certificates, with proper interest, and no other or greater sum by way of profit, and defendants aver that they incurred no greater or other obligations in the premises.

The defendant the New York, Rutland, &

Montreal Railway Company also put in a separate answer. It alleged, among other things, that defendants Foster & Hazard had conveyed and transferred to it all of the property and franchises conveyed to them by the referee in the Sackett suit subject to the payment of the sum justly due by said receiver, but not subject to any greater sum, and it controverts the allegations as to the amounts due on the receiver's certificates.

The American Loan & Trust Company also answered separately, setting up that it was the holder of a mortgage executed to it by the New York, Rutland, & Montreal Railway Company, and denying knowledge or information as to the matters charged in the bill.

The case came on for a hearing on pleadings and proofs, and after full argument, on March 24, 1887, a decree was passed, of which the following is a copy (omitting the description of the property, which is the same as that contained in the complaint in this action):

"It was ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows:

447] *"That the certificates of indebtedness issued by John W. Van Valkenburgh, as receiver of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, under and in pursuance of an order of the supreme court of the state of New York, bearing date the 2d day of April, 1881, made in an action in said supreme court, wherein one Marvin Sackett was plaintiff, and Russell C. Root and others were defendants, amounting in the aggregate to $350,000, are a lien upon the premises and property described in the bill of complaint herein, in the hands of the defendants herein, and of any persons claiming through or under the defendants Rowland N. Hazard and William Foster, Jr., the purchasers of said premises and property, at a sale thereof made under and in pursuance of the judgment rendered in said action in said supreme court on or about the 12th day of January, 1885; and that the complainant, the Central National Bank of Boston, is the holder and owner of certain of said certificates, amounting in the aggregate to $250,000 of principal thereof, upon which there is now due and unpaid to the complainant the said sum of $250,000, with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum thereon from the 1st day of January, 1886.

"That it be referred to William Lansing, Esq., of the city of Albany, who is hereby appointed a master pro hac vice in this cause to examine, ascertain, and report who are the holders other than the complainant of said certificates of indebtedness, and how much remains due and unpaid thereon. And the said master is hereby authorized and directed to give notice by advertising in two daily newspapers published in the city of Albany in said district, requiring the holders of said certificates to produce the same before the said master at his office in the city of Albany, at such time as he shall designate (which shall be at least twenty days after the first publication of said notice), and make proof as to their title thereto, and the amount due thereon; and the said master is also authorized and directed to inquire, ascertain, and report what would be the just proportion and amount for the said other holders of said certificates to contribute to the expenses of this suit.

"That the premises and property described in the bill of complaint in this cause, as hereinafter set forth, or such part *thereof as is [448 sufficient to satisfy the amount due and unpaid on such certificates, and expenses of sale and the costs of this suit, and which may be sold separately without material injury to the parties interested, be sold at public auction in the county of Rensselaer, in said district, by or under the direction of Worthington Frothingham, Esq., who is hereby appointed a referee for said purpose; that the said referee give public notice of the time and place of such sale according to law and the practice of this court; that the complainant or any other party to this suit may become a purchaser on such sale, that the said referee execute to the purchaser or purchasers a deed or deeds of the premises and property sold; that out of the moneys arising from such sale, after deducting the amount of his fees and expenses on such sale, the said referee pay to the complainant or its solicitors the amount of its costs and disbursements to be taxed herein; that he also pay to the complainant or its solicitors the amount due to it on said certificates as aforesaid, together with the interest thereon from the 1st day of January, 1886; and that he pay to the holders of the other said certificates respectively the amount of principal and interest due thereon, as the same may be found and reported by the said master as aforesaid; but if the moneys arising from such sale, after the payment of said costs and expenses as aforesaid, shall not be sufficient to pay the said certificates with interest in full, then that the said referee pay and distribute the said moneys, after the payment of the fees, expenses, costs, and disbursements above mentioned, to the said certificate holders, including the complainant, pro rata, in proportion to the amount of principal and interest due to said certificate holders respectively; that the said referee bring the surplus moneys arising from the said sale, if any there shall be, into court within twenty days after the same be received, to be there subject to the order of the court; that the said referee make a report of such sale, and file the same with the clerk of this court with all convenient speed; that if the proceeds of such sale be insufficient to pay the amount due to the complainant as aforesaid, with interest and costs as aforesaid, and also to pay the other certificate holders the amount due to *them respectively, as may be ascer- [449 tained by said master as aforesaid, the said referee specify the amount of such deficiency in his report of sale, and that the defendants Rowland N. Hazard and William Foster, Jr., pay to the complainant, and to the other of said certificate holders, the residue of the indebtedness on said certificates remaining unsatisfied after the sale of said property and the application of the proceeds pursuant to the directions contained herein; and that the complainant and the other of said certificate holders, to be ascertained as aforesaid, have execution thereof; and that the purchaser or purchasers at such sale be let into possession on the production of the said referee's deed and a certified copy of the order or decree confirming the said referee's report of sale.

"And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants and all persons claiming under them, or any or either of them, after the filing of the notice of pendency of this suit, be forever barred and foreclosed of all right, title, interest, and equity of redemption in the said premises so sold, or any part thereof. The following is a description of the premises and property hereinbefore referred to and thereby directed to be sold, as contained in a certain mortgage made by the said the Labanon Springs Railroad Company to the Union Trust Company, and which were conveyed by the deed executed by George McClellan, referee, to the defendants William Foster, Jr, and Rowland N. Hazard, referred to in the bill of complaint herein.

"Leave is hereby reserved to the complainant and to the other certificate holders above referred to, or any of them, to apply upon the foot of this decree for the appointment of a receiver to take immediate possession of the property above described, and to keep the same until the sale under this decree shall be consummated by the delivery to the purchaser or purchasers at such sale of a referee's deed or deeds, and to deliver the property so sold to such purchaser or purchasers, with the powers usually possessed by receivers in such cases."

Subsequently, in pursuance of the decree, 450]the holders of the *certificates appeared before the special master and made proof of their ownership thereof, and said master, on February 7, 1888, made a report accordingly, finding the names of the holders thereof and the amounts due them respectively.

On March 23, 1892, in pursuance of an order of sale made by the said circuit court of the United States, Worthington Frothingham, as referee, sold the said premises and property described in the complaint (and described in the deed of George McClellan, referee, to Foster and Hazard) to William Foster, Jr., for the sum of $7,500, and on April 25, 1892, executed and delivered a deed therefor to the said William Foster, Jr.

On December 8, 1890, Aaron R. Stevens, Harper W. Rogers, Nancy E. Wilbur, Andrew A. Douglas, as trustee, under the will of W. H. Douglas, deceased, and Ida S. Harrison, for themselves and other holders and owners of bonds issued by the Lebanon Springs Company and the Harlem Extension Railroad Company, filed a petition or bill of complaint in the supreme court of New York against the Union Trust Company of New York, James C. Hull, William Butler Duncan, John G. McCullough, as administrator of the goods, chattels, and credits of Trenor W. Park, deceased; the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company, Jesse Seligman, John Crosby Brown, William Watts Sherman, Daniel Butterfield, as receiver of the property of the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company; Marvin Sackett, Russell C. Root, the Harlem Extension Railroad South Coal Transportation Company, the Central National Bank of Boston, Peter Butler, as receiver of the property of the Pacific National Bank of Boston, the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company, and others

In this petition there is a history of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company and the Harlem Extension Railroad Company, and of the several legal proceedings whereby the roads, property, and franchises of these companies became vested in the New York, Rutland, & Montreal Railway Company, which is substantially the same with that heretofore made in this statement. But the petition assailed the action brought *by Sackett in[451 1880, and which resulted in the sale to Foster and Hazard in 1885, as fraudulent and collusive, and alleged that "the suit by Sackett was brought and conducted, not with the intention of realizing the said property for the benefit of the bondholders or any of them, or of himself as bondholder, but collusively and with the intent that he and others should receive large sums of money from the said property under color of the payment of claims, which, even if valid, were subordinate to said mortgages, and with the intent that said railroad and property should be acquired by others free from the lien of said mortgages, and without realizing anything to the holders of said bond."

The petition further alleged that "afterwards the defendant, the Central National Bank of Boston, claiming to own such certificates to the amount of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, stated at par of the principal of the same, brought an action in this court against the defendants Foster and Hazard, the New York, Rutland, & Montreal Railway Company and the American Loan & Trust Company; that in that action the plaintiff prayed for the sale of the said railroad and property for the satisfaction of the certificates; that said action was removed into the circuit court of the United States, and such proceedings have been had therein that a decree has passed whereby it is provided that the said railroad and property be sold by a master of that court for the payment of the said certificates."

The prayers for relief were as follows:

"1. That it may be adjudged that the owners of the bonds issued by the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company have a first lien upon the said railroad and property, and the owners of the bonds issued by the Harlem Extension Railroad Company a second lien thereon, in preference of all others. That the bond and mortgage executed by the defendants Hull and Lincoln to the defendant Duncan and the said Park is held for the benefit of the owners of said bonds and represents their interest solely, and that defendants Brown and Seligman redeliver the same.

"2. That the judgment in the action brought in this court *by the defendant the Union[452 Trust Company, and the decrees in the two actions brought by that company in the court of chancery of Vermont, be now specifically enforced, and the mortgage by the said Hull and Lincoln be now foreclosed, and that the said railroad and property be sold under said judgments and decrees, and said mortgage of Hull and Lincoln, for the benefit of this plaintiff and all other of the owners of the Lebanon Springs and Harlem extension bonds, and that all of the defendants in this action be barred and foreclosed of all right, title, interest, and equity of redemption, of, in, and to the said railroad and property and any part of the same.

"3. That it may be adjudged that the certificates issued by the said Van Valkenburgh were beyond the power of this court to issue and are of no validity except to bind the interest represented by the eight bonds of the said Marvin Sackett, and the interests of the defendants in the action brought by said Sackett.

"4. That all of the defendants in this action and all other persons be enjoined, as well temporarily by order as permanently by judgment, from interfering with any part of the said railroad or property.

"5. That a receiver be appointed, with the usual powers of receivers, to take possession of, preserve, and operate said railroad and property until further order of the court.

"6. That the plaintiffs have such other and further relief as to the court shall seem just, besides costs."

To this petition the Central National Bank of Boston filed its separate answer, in which, after admitting certain allegations in the petition, relative to the history of the railroad companies, the said defendant set forth the proceedings in the suit of Sackett, including the appointment of Van Valkenburgh as receiver, the authority given such receiver by the court to issue and negotiate the said certificates, and the purchase by the defendant of $250,000 of said certificates for full value. The answer further alleged, in response to the petition, that the suit was brought by Sackett for himself as bondholder and on behalf of all other 453]bondholders; that other *bondholders, representing all, or nearly all, the bonds issued by the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, had knowledge of the pendency of said suit by Sackett, and were represented by attorneys and counsel, although not nominally made parties to the action; that Foster and Hazard became purchasers at the sale, and that, by the terms of the sale, they had assumed the payment of the unpaid portion of said certificates as part of the consideration of the purchase; and further alleged that said judgment of the supreme court of New York had never been appealed from, reversed, or in any way vacated or modified, and was binding and conclusive, not only upon the parties to said action, but upon the other holders of said bonds issued by the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company. The answer then proceeded to set forth proceedings in the circuit court of the United States, including the decree of March 24, 1887, and to pray, among other things, that the petition should be dismissed upon the merits, and that a decree may be rendered recognizing the rights of the defendant, the Central National Bank of Boston, as a holder of said certificates as such rights had been theretofore established by the decree of the circuit court of the United States.

The American Loan & Trust Company filed its separate answer, admitting some and denying other allegations of the petition. Hazard and Foster also filed a separate answer on their own behalf, in which they allege that the Sackett suit was brought and pursued in behalf of all the bondholders; that they, Foster and Hazard, had purchased the railroad property and franchises in good faith, and that by the judgment, decree, and sale in said suit all the rights of said bondholders, plaintiffs in this suit, were cut off and barred, and that they, Foster and Hazard, had thereby acquired a good and valid title to said property and franchises, and thereupon they prayed that the complaint be dismissed and that a decree be rendered establishing their rights as purchasers of said road under said judgment and decree.

The New York, Rutland, & Montreal Railway Company likewise filed a separate answer, denying the principal allegations of the petition, and praying that the rights of said company *as purchaser of said road from [454 Foster and Hazard should be confirmed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

Certain other individual defendants, holders of receivers' certificates, likewise answered, denying these allegations of the petition which assailed the validity of the proceedings in the Sackett suit, and praying that the said petition should be dismissed Separate answers were likewise filed by Seligman and Brown, and by William R. Duncan substantially to the same effect.

Upon the first trial of this action judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, dismissing it on the merits. On appeal that judgment was reversed by the general term and a new trial ordered. Stevens v. Union Trust Co. 57 Hun, 498.

At the new trial judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs on November 10, 1891, and this judgment, having been affirmed by the general term, was taken on appeal to the court of appeals, whose judgment, rendered November 27, 1894, affirmed that of the court below. 144 N. Y. 50. This writ of error was then sued out.

Upon sale made by John L. Henning, as referee, under the judgment of the supreme court in this case, pending the appeals, there was executed and delivered to said William Foster, Jr., by said referee a deed of conveyance of the railroad, property, and franchises dated May 16, 1892; and, as already stated, on March 23, 1892, the railroad was sold and conveyed to William Foster, Jr., by the referee appointed by the decree of the United States court.

After the judgment of November 10, 1891, William Foster, Jr., brought an action in the supreme court of New York against the Central National Bank and other holders of certificates, seeking to set aside that portion of the decree of the United States circuit court of March 24, 1887, which adjudged that Foster, either alone or with Hazard, pay the Central Bank and other certificate holders the deficiency that might exist in the payment of the certificates after the application of the proceeds of the sale of the road, and to annul and enjoin the decree that execution issue for such deficiency; and that this action, so brought by Foster, has been removed, on *the peti-[455 tion of the Central National Bank, to the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of New York, where it is now pending

Messrs. Charles E. Patterson, W. S. B. Hopkins, Matthew Hale, Henry D. Hyde,

Alpheus T. Bulkeley, and William A. Sargent, for plaintiffs in error:

The court below erred in attempting to enjoin the enforcement of a decree of the circuit court of the United States.

McKim v. Voorhies, 7 Cranch, 279 (3:342); Riggs v. Johnson County, 6 Wall. 166 (18:768); United States, Moses, v. Keokuk, 6 Wall. 514 (18:933); Davenport v. United States, Lord, 9 Wall. 409 (19:704); Washington County Supers. v. Durant, 9 Wall. 415 (19:732); Amy v. The Supervisors, 11 Wall. 136 (20:101).

Where jurisdiction has once been obtained by a Federal court over property, by being brought within its custody, it continues until the purpose of the seizure is accomplished, and cannot be impaired or affected by any legislation of the state or by any proceedings subsequently commenced in the state court.

The court below had no right to inquire into the merits of the case which was decided by the circuit court of the United States.

Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 141, 157, 158 (30:614, 621); Covell v. Heyman, 111 U. S. 176 (28:390).

The injunction contained in the judgment against the enforcement of the decree of the United States circuit court cannot be sustained upon the ground taken by the court of appeals in its opinion, that the court had authority to control all persons and things within its own territorial limits, and that therefore the court might act in personam upon the parties before it, and direct them by injunction to proceed no further with that suit.

Riggs v. Johnson County Comrs. 6 Wall. 166 (18:768); United States, Moses, v. Keokuk, 6 Wall. 514 (18:933).

Mr. Edward Winslow Paige, for defendants in error:

The plaintiffs in error are not in the position to question the validity of the injunction.

Brobst v. Brock, 10 Wall. 519 (19:1002); Union Trust Co. v. Southern Inland Nav. & Improv. Co. 130 U. S. 570 (32:1045).

The injunction was correctly adjudged; equity required that the parties to this action should not be permitted to proceed with the sale under the decree of the circuit court of the United States.

New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30, 45; Barry v. Brune, 8 Hun, 395; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 17 N. Y. 592, 601.

It was against equity and good conscience that the sale in the Central Bank's suit should proceed.

All parties and privies, no matter how remote in the chain of title, by taking title under the Sackett suit, submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the court below.

Hale v. Clauson, 60 N. Y. 339, 341.

The judgments and decrees of the circuit court of the United States, sitting in a particular state, in the courts of that state, are to be accorded such effect and such effect only, as would be accorded in similar circumstances to the judgments and decrees of a state tribunal of equal authority.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error ask us to reverse the decree of the court of appeals affirming that of the supreme court of New York, because the action of Stevens and others as a bill of review, or a bill in the nature of a bill of review, was not brought within the time limited by the practice of the courts for entertaining such bills; that, under the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of New York, bills for review have no place for errors appearing upon the face of the record; that the only remedy for such errors is by appeal; that, in so far as it is contended that the decree in the Sackett case was obtained by a fraudulent assertion or suppression of facts, the party aggrieved must move promptly upon the discovery of the fraud or of new facts; that the bill and the evidence adduced to sustain it do not disclose such a case of fraud or of newly discovered evidence, but do show a case free from actual fraud, and only, at the most, irregular by reason of a failure to include all the proper parties; that the parties complainant are to be visited with a knowledge of the proceedings in the Sackett suit by reason of the protracted and notorious character of the proceedings, and because knowledge of the proceedings in the Sackett suit must further be imputed to them, because they are represented in the effort to impugn the validity of that decree by counsel who had appeared for Sackett in his suit; and that hence the present suit should, on the well-456] established *rules regulating bills of review and bills to impeach decrees on the ground of after-discovered evidence, have been dismissed.

Without expressing any opinion on such allegations of error, it is sufficient to say that they raised questions for the consideration of the court of appeals of the state of New York, and that the disposition made of them by that court is binding upon us.

But those assignments of error which allege that the judgment of the supreme court of the state of New York, and of the court of appeals in affirming it erred in failing to give proper effect to the decree of the circuit court of the United States, and in granting a final injunction restraining the appellants from availing themselves of the provisions of such decree, certainly do present questions which are within our jurisdiction to consider.

Referring to the previous somewhat extended statement of the facts, we may briefly recapitulate a few of the principal dates. In August, 1880, Marvin Sackett brought his suit in the supreme court of the state of New York, on behalf of himself and all other holders and owners of bonds of certain railroad companies against Root, the Harlem Extension Railroad South Coal Transportation Company, the New York, Boston, & Montreal Railway Company and David Butterfield, receiver of said company, praying for the appointment of a receiver and for a sale of the railroad and franchises for the benefit of the bondholders. On October 11, 1880, a receiver was appointed and qualified.

On April 2, 1881, on petition of the receiver, and after a report by an expert disclosing the necessity for expenditure to make the road safe and to enable trains to be run, an order was made by the court authorizing the receiver to issue and negotiate $350,000 in certificates, the same to be a first lien. The certificates were sold, and the proceeds expended under the approval of the court. On June 12, 1885, sale was made of the road and deed delivered to Foster and Hazard for $155,000, subject to the payment of the unpaid portion of the principal and interest of the certificates.

457] *On April 9, 1886, the Central National Bank of Boston brought suit in the supreme court of New York, on its own behalf and that of others as owners of the certificates, against Foster, Hazard, the New York, Rutland, & Montreal Railway Company, and the American Loan & Trust Company. On March 24, 1887, the suit having been transferred on the petition of the defendants to the circuit court of the United States, after full hearing and argument the latter court rendered a final decree, establishing the rights of the Central National Bank of Boston and of others as owners of said certificates, declaring the latter to be a first lien, decreeing that Foster and Hazard were liable for any deficiency if sale should fail to realize enough to pay certificates. On March 23, 1892, sale under said decree to Foster for $7,500, and on April 25, 1892, deed of conveyance by referee to Foster. On December 8, 1890, Stevens and others brought their suit in the supreme court of New York against the Central National Bank of Boston, the other holders of certificates, Foster, Hazard, and others, to set aside decree in case of Sackett and to enjoin proceedings in the circuit court of the United States. On November 11, 1891, judgment setting aside sale in the case of Sackett and finally enjoining the Central National Bank of Boston and others, plaintiffs in the circuit court of the United States, from selling under the decree of the Federal court.

On May 16, 1892, sale and conveyance were made by referee under the decree in the present suit to Foster. On May 9, 1893, judgment of the general term, and November 27, 1894, judgment of the court of appeals, was rendered, affirming the judgment of the supreme court.

It will be perceived, on an inspection of these dates, that when the present suit was brought a final judgment had been rendered in the circuit court of the United States, establishing the title and rights of the holders of the certificates, directing a sale by a referee, and adjudging the personal liability of Foster and Hazard for an unpaid portion of said certificates after the application of the proceeds of sale; that when the judgment of the supreme court was entered in the present case, *and without awaiting the result of the[458 appeal to the court of appeals, a sale was had in which Foster became the purchaser on a bid of $7,500; and that Foster was likewise the purchaser at the sale on the decree of the circuit court.

The record does not disclose what application was made of the purchase money paid by Foster on his respective purchases at the two sales, but it may be easily conjectured that, after the payment of the costs and of the expenses of the sales, little or nothing would be left applicable to the bonds and certificates. Thus the singular result, thus far reached, of this protracted and expensive litigation, is that Foster, who had with Hazard been the purchaser at the Sackett sale, has become the owner of the railroad upon the payment of a merely nominal sum, and that the bondholders and the owners of the certificates have realized nothing. And it further thus appears that ever since May 16, 1892, the controversy has really been between the holders of the receiver's certificates and Foster, who has, for a trifling sum, become the owner of a railroad as improved by money procured by the sale of the certificates.

It may be that Foster, when he bought under the decree of sale in the present suit, did so in pursuance of some arrangement with the bondholders and as their trustee. But whether Foster, when he bought under the decree of the circuit court of the United States, subjected himself to that feature of the decree that made him personally liable for the unpaid portion of the certificates, and precluded himself from relying on the decree of the supreme court of New York setting aside the Sackett sale, and whether the setting aside the sale in the Sackett suit would invalidate receiver's certificates issued years before and whose proceeds had gone into the improvement of the property, and whether, in case of Foster's inability to respond to his personal obligation, the unpaid portion of the certificates would be a lien on the railroad in his hands and those of his vendees, are questions for the circuit court of the United States, which cannot be withdrawn from its determination by the subsequent proceedings in the supreme court of New York. Any confusion that might otherwise have arisen by reason of conflicting views [459] between the Federal and state *courts has been prevented by the fact that Foster, who himself originally invoked the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, has become the purchaser of the railroad under the decrees of both courts, whereby the only substantial controversy that remains is between him, as such purchaser, and the holders of the certificates.

Those portions of the decree of the supreme court of New York and of the court of appeals which sought to compel the complainants in the suit pending in the circuit court of the United States to come into the state court and to there relitigate their titles to the certificates and the amounts thereof, and which sought to restrain them by injunction from proceeding under the final decree of sale of the circuit court, and from enforcing the other remedies adjudged to them by that decree, were, in our opinion, erroneous. Due effect was not thereby given to the judgment or decree of the circuit court, at least in so far as that decree had established the ownership and amounts of the certificates, and the injunction was a plain interference with the proceedings in another court which had full and complete jurisdiction over the parties and the subject-matter of the suit, and which jurisdiction had attached long before the suit in the supreme court had been begun.

It will suffice to cite a few of the cases:

"It is a doctrine of law, too long established to require a citation of authorities, that, where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause, and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, till reversed, is regarded as binding in every other court; and that, where the jurisdiction of a court, and the right of a plaintiff to prosecute his suit in it, have once attached, that right cannot be arrested or taken away by proceedings in another court. These rules have their foundation, not merely in comity, but on necessity. For, if one may enjoin, the other may retort by injunction, and thus the parties be without remedy; being liable to a process for contempt in one, if they dare to proceed in the other. Neither can one take property from the custody of the other by replevin or any other process, for this would pro- [460] duce a conflict extremely *embarrassing to the administration of justice. In the case of Kennedy v. The Earl of Cassillis [2 Swanst. 321], Lord Eldon at one time granted an injunction to restrain a party from proceeding in a suit pending in the court of sessions of Scotland, which, on more mature reflection, he dissolved; because it was admitted, if the court of chancery could in that way restrain proceedings in an independent foreign tribunal, the court of sessions might equally enjoin the parties from proceeding in chancery, and thus they would be unable to proceed in either court. The fact, therefore, that an injunction issues only to the parties before the court, and not to the court, is no evasion of the difficulties that are the necessary result of an attempt to exercise that power over a party who is a litigant in another and independent forum." Peck v. Jenness, per Mr. Justice Grier, 48 U. S. 7 How. 612, 624 [12: 841, 846].

"State courts are exempt from all interference by the Federal tribunals, but they are destitute of all power to restrain either the process or proceedings in the national courts. Circuit courts and state courts act separately and independently of each other, and in their respective spheres of action the process issued by the one is as far beyond the reach of the other as if the line of division between them 'was traced by landmarks and monuments visible to the eye.' Appellate relations exist in a class of cases between the state courts and this court, but there are no such relations between the state courts and the circuit courts. Viewed in any light, therefore, it is obvious that the injunction of a state court is inoperative to control, or in any manner to affect the process or proceedings of a circuit court, not on account of any paramount jurisdiction in the latter courts, but because, in their sphere of action, circuit courts are wholly independent of the state tribunals." Riggs v. Johnson County [United States, Riggs, v. Johnson County Supers.], 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 166 [18: 768].

Whether due effect has been given by a state court to a judgment or decree of a court of the United States is a Federal question within the jurisdiction of this court, on a writ of error to the supreme court of the state. Crescent City Live Stock L. & S. H. Company v. Butchers' Union Slaughter-House & L. S. L. Company, 120 U. S. 141 [30: 614].

The exemption of the authority of the courts of the United *States from interference [461] by legislative or judicial action of the states is essential to their independence and efficiency. Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 450 [16: 749]; Buck v. Colbath, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 334 [18: 257]; Rio Grande R. R. Co. v. Gomila [Rio Grande R. Co. v. Vinet], 132 U. S. 478 [33:400].

In Story's Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 2, § 900, it is said, referring to the power sometimes exercised by courts of equity, to restrain parties within their jurisdiction from proceeding in foreign courts: "There is one exception to this doctrine which has been long recognized in America, and that is that the state courts cannot enjoin proceedings in the courts of the United States, nor the latter in the former courts."

It is contended by the counsel for the defendants in error, in a supplemental brief, that these principles, so long and so well settled, have been modified by some recent decisions of this court, and the case of Moran v. Sturges, 154 U. S. 256 [38: 981], and of Shields v. Coleman, 157 U. S. 168 [39: 660], are cited in support of that contention. Such a conception of the import of those cases must have been formed from a hasty reading, for they are in perfect harmony with the previous cases, and, indeed, may properly be cited to sustain the reasoning upon which those cases proceeded.

In Moran v. Sturges, the chief justice, delivering the opinion of the court, cited the cases hereinbefore referred to and others, and stated the general rule to be that state courts cannot enjoin proceedings in the courts of the United States. In that case the supreme court of the state of New York had issued process against certain libellants in the district court of the United States, and had, after hearing, enjoined them from taking any further proceedings on their libels. This judgment of the supreme court being affirmed by the court of appeals, and the judgment of the latter court being remitted to the supreme court and entered there as its judgment, the libellants sued out a writ of error to this court, and it was here held that the state court had no jurisdiction in personam over the libellants as holders of maritime liens when the libels were filed; that the question of jurisdiction was one for the district court to decide in the first instance; that the district court had jurisdiction; and 462] that the judgment under *review was in effect an unlawful interference with the proceedings in that court.

It is true, as the report of the case shows, that two of the judges dissented, but not because of any disapproval of the principles laid down by the court, but because it was thought that the possession of the vessels in question had vested in the state court before the libels were filed in the district court.

In Shields v. Coleman there was a controversy for possession of certain railroad property, and it was held that a circuit court of the United States has not the power to appoint a receiver of property already in the possession of a receiver duly and previously appointed by a state court, and cannot rightfully take the property out of the hands of the receiver so appointed by the state court. Such a decision, it is scarcely necessary to say, gives no support to the contention of the appellees.

The reasoning of the court of appeals, affirming the judgment of the supreme court of New York, does not seem to us to comport with the law as established by the decisions of this court. It is claimed by the learned judge, who delivered the opinion of that court, that the rule is that "although the courts of one country have no authority to stay proceedings in the courts of another, they have undoubted authority to control all persons and things within their own territorial limits. When, therefore, both parties to a suit in a foreign country are residents within the territorial limits of another country, the courts of equity in the latter may act in personam upon those parties, and direct them by injunction to proceed no further in such suit. In such a case these courts act upon acknowledged principles of public law in regard to jurisdiction. They do not pretend to direct or control the foreign court, but, without regard to the situation of the subject-matter of the dispute, they consider the equities between the parties and decree in personam according to those equities and enforce obedience to their decrees by process in personam."

This language is quoted from Story's Eq. 463]Jur. § 899; but *the learned judge overlooked the passage immediately following, and hereinbefore quoted: "There is one exception to this doctrine which has been long recognized in America, and that is that the state courts cannot enjoin proceedings in the courts of the United States, nor the latter in the former courts. This exception proceeds upon peculiar grounds of municipal and constitutional law, the respective courts being entirely competent to administer full relief in the suits pending therein." Nor did the decision of this court in Peck v. Jenness, already cited, receive attention, wherein it was said, after adverting to the proposed distinction between enjoining a court and enjoining suitors therein, "the fact, therefore, that an injunction issues only to the parties before the court, and not to the court, is no evasion of the difficulties that are the necessary result of an attempt to exercise that power over a party who is a litigant in another and independent forum."

Nor are we able to acquiesce in the reasoning of the learned judge when he says that "the setting aside of the judgment in the Sackett suit, upon which the suit in the United States circuit court was founded for fraud, was a new fact occurring since the decree in that court which gave jurisdiction in this action to enjoin proceedings thereon." Doubtless there may be facts occurring after the rendition of a judgment which would render its enforcement inequitable; such, for instance, as payment, or a reversal thereof on appeal by a superior court. But surely a judgment and injunction rendered subsequently in another and independent forum cannot constitute such new facts unless we are prepared to concede that, as between two courts of concurrent jurisdiction, it is the judgment of the court whose jurisdiction is last invoked which shall be entitled to prevail. This view does not overlook the decision of this court in Marshall v. Holmes, 141 U. S. 589 [35: 870], where it was held that a circuit court of the United States, in the exercise of its equity powers, and where diverse citizenship gives jurisdiction over the parties, may deprive a party of the benefit of a judgment fraudulently obtained by him in a state court, if the circumstances are such as would authorize relief by a Federal court if the judgment had been rendered *by it and not by a state [464 court. There the suit to restrain the owner of the judgment from enforcing it was brought in the state court that had rendered the judgment, and was removed into the Federal court on the ground of diverse citizenship, and it was sought to impeach the judgment for the fraud of the party who procured it. In the present case, no fraud of any kind is imputed to the plaintiffs in the circuit court of the United States, nor it is alleged that the action or proceedings in that court were founded in any mistake of facts, or were influenced by any misrepresentation or fraud practised upon the court. But the purpose of this suit was to practically nullify the proceedings in the circuit court, and to enjoin the suitors therein from pursuing their remedy in that court, not for any fraud of theirs used in promoting their cause, but for the alleged fraud of other parties in another court, and in a case in which these appellants were not parties.

It is claimed in the brief for the defendants in error that whatever may be the rule in ordinary cases there is no necessity in the present case of modifying the decree of the state court, and we are pointed to the statement in the opinion of the court of appeals, that "there is nothing in the judgment at bar that attacks the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court or questions the legality of its decree." We must suppose this language to mean that to enjoin the plaintiffs from proceeding to enforce the decree did not affect the legality or efficacy of the decree. Such must have been the meaning of the learned judge, because he proceeds to assert that "it is clear, both upon principle and authority, that this power [to enjoin the certificate holders] did exist, and that the sale under the decree of the United States circuit court was without force or effect as to the parties in that suit, as they proceeded in violation of the injunction contained in the judgment at bar."

But it has been frequently determined by this court that the jurisdiction of a court is not exhausted by the rendition of the judgment, but continues until the judgment shall be satisfied. Thus it was said in Riggs v. Johnson County, [United States, Riggs, v. Johnson County Supers.], 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 166 [18: 768], that "process subsequent to judgment is as essential 465]*to jurisdiction as process antecedent to judgment, else the judicial power would be incomplete and entirely inadequate to the purposes for which it was conferred by the Constitution." And in Amy v. Supervisors [Amy v. Barkholder], 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 136 [20: 101], it was said: "The two sets of tribunals—state and national—are as independent as they are separate. Neither can impede or arrest any action the other may take, within the limits of its jurisdiction, for the satisfaction of its judgments and decrees."

"An execution is the end of the law. It gives the successful party the fruits of his judgment." United States v. Nourse, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 28 [9: 39]. But it is scarcely necessary to quote authorities to show that to deprive a court of the power to execute its decrees is to essentially impair its jurisdiction. "Juris effectus in executione consistit." Co. Litt. 289.

The conclusions we have reached are that the judgment of the supreme court of New York and of the court of appeals affirming the same are erroneous in so far as they command the Central National Bank of Boston, the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company, and other holders of the receiver's certificates whose rights, as such holders, were adjudged by the circuit court of the United States, to appear before the referee appointed by the supreme court in the present case, and which enjoin the Central National Bank of Boston and others whose rights have been adjudged by the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of New York from proceeding with the sale under the decree of that court.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of New York and of the Court of Appeals, in these particulars, are accordingly reversed, and the cause is remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the opinion of this court.

Right to sue in equity—multiplicity of suits—suit against the state—rates on Union Pacific Railroad—railroad corporation is a person—state law establishing rates, when void—judicial control—Federal Constitution—discrimination in rates—rule for determining—fair value of property—public right—power of government—rule of value—Nebraska law unconstitutional.

1. One who has a right to sue in equity in a Federal court cannot be deprived of that right because he can sue at law in a state court on the same cause of action.
2. Equity may interfere where its general decree would prevent a multiplicity of suits, and give a more certain and efficacious remedy than can be had at law.
3. A suit against individuals for the purpose of preventing them as officers of a state from enforcing an unconstitutional enactment to the injury of the rights of the plaintiff is not a suit against the state within the meaning of the 11th Constitutional Amendment.
4. Congress not having exerted the power to fix rates on the Union Pacific Railroad, given by the act of July 1, 1862, a state may prescribe rates for transportation thereon between points within its territory.
5. A railroad corporation is a person within the 14th Amendment forbidding a state to deprive any person of property without due process of law, or to deny any person the equal protection of the laws.
6. A state law, or regulations made thereunder, establishing rates for transportation by railroad that will deprive the carrier of just compensation, is repugnant to the 14th Constitutional Amendment, as depriving the carrier of his property without due process of law, and denying to it the equal protection of the laws.
7. While the state may fix rates of transportation, the question whether the rates are so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation cannot be determined by state statute or regulations thereunder so conclusively that the matter may not become the subject of judicial inquiry.

8. The power given by the Constitution of Nebraska to its legislature to fix reasonable rates for transportation cannot be exerted in derogation of rights secured by the Federal Constitution.

9. Railroads may not discriminate against the people of any one state, but are not necessarily bound to give the same rates to the people of all the states, as the kind and amount and cost of business vary in the several states.

10. The reasonableness or unreasonableness of rates prescribed by a state for the transportation of persons and property wholly within its limits must be determined without reference to the interstate business done by the carrier, or to the profits derived from it.

11. Railroad rates should be fixed with reference to the fair value of the property used and services rendered, and not merely to pay expenses, interest, and dividends, nor in order to realize profits upon an excessive valuation or a fictitious capitalization.

12. The public have a right to be exempt from unreasonable exactions: and the interest of the corporation is not the sole test of suitable rates.

13. A railroad corporation accepts its rights, privileges, and franchises subject to the power of government by legislation to protect the people against unreasonable charges by it, but cannot be required to use its property for the public without just compensation.

14. To ascertain the value of railroad property, the cost of construction and improvements the amount and value of its bonds and stock, its earning capacity and operating expenses, are to be considered.

15. The Nebraska law of 1893, to regulate railroads, classifying freights, fixing rates, etc., is repugnant to the United States Constitution and void as prohibiting railroads in that state from receiving reasonable and just compensation, and depriving them of property without due process of law and of the equal protection of the laws.

Argued March 4, 5, 1896. Ordered for reargument April 20, 1896. Reargued April 5, 6, 7, 1897. Decided March 7, 1898.

APPEALS from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska in each of the above cases, perpetually enjoining the railroad companies from making a schedule of rates for transportation reducing them to those prescribed by the state act of Nebraska, approved April 12, 1893, or from conforming to the provision of said act, and restraining the board of transportation of said state et al. from hearing or determining any complaint against said railroad companies or either of them for or on account of any act done by them or either of them which is forbidden by said act, and from instituting or prosecuting any action or proceeding for violation of said act, and adjudging said act to be void, etc., in actions brought by the above-named appellees against the said appellants in each of the above named cases, for the relief granted by the said decrees. Affirmed.

See same case below, 64 Fed. Rep. 165.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John L. Webster, A. S. Churchill, Attorney General of Nebraska, and W. A. Dilworth for appellants on first argument.

Messrs. John L. Webster, William J. Bryan, and Constantine J. Smyth, Attorney General of Nebraska, for appellants on reargument.

Messrs. J. M. Woolworth and James C. Carter for appellees on first argument and on reargument.

Argument of Mr. John L. Webster, for appellants. Mr. A. S. Churchill, Attorney General of Nebraska, was on his brief:

Before taking up the question as to the validity of the act in question, we desire to call the attention of the court to some of the propositions stated by Circuit Judge Brewer in his opinion, filed herein below; for we conceive that these propositions, thus stated, contributed largely to what we believe to be an erroneous conclusion.

In the opinion it is stated: "Property invested in railroads is as much protected from public appropriation as any other. If taken for public use, its value must be paid for. . . . He may have made his fortune dealing in slaves, or, as a lobbyist, or in any other way obnoxious to the public; but, if he has acquired the legal title to the property, he is protected in its possession, and cannot be disturbed until the receipt of its actual cash value. The same rule controls, if railroad property is sought to be appropriated. No inquiry is open as to whether the owner has received gifts from the state or individuals or whether he has, as owner, managed the property well or ill, or so as to acquire a large fortune therefrom. It is enough that he owns the property, has the legal title, and so owning, he must be paid the actual value of that property. . . . These propositions, in respect to condemnation proceedings, are so well settled that no one ever questions them.

We take no exception to this proposition. But it is equally well settled that, where such property is encumbered, the encumbrance cuts no figure in ascertaining the cash value of the property in such condemnation proceedings. The party holding such encumbrance would be entitled to the proceeds to the extent of such encumbrance; provided, it did not exceed the actual cash value so ascertained; but where it did, the property would be discharged of the lien, and the party holding such encumbrance would have to look to the personal liability of the obligor.

Again, it is said in the opinion: "If it be said that the rates must be such as to secure to the owners a reasonable per cent on the money invested, it will be remembered that many things have happened to make the investment far in excess of the actual value of the property—injudicious contracts, poor engineering, unusually high cost of material, rascality on the part of those engaged in the construction or management of the property. These, and many other things, as is well known, are factors which have largely entered into the investment with which many railroad properties stand charged. Now, if the public was seeking to take title to the railroad by condemnation, the present value of the property, and not the cost, is that which it would have to pay." Then, indeed, would the loss arising from "injudicious contracts, poor engineering, unusually high cost of material" and the "rascality on the part of those engaged in the construction or management of the property," fall upon those who made the "injudicious contracts" or employed "poor engineering" to be done, or paid 'unusually high cost for material," or engaged rascals in the construction or management of the property. And why should they not? Did not the investors, in either the stock of the company, or in its bonds, take his chances in these respects, just the same as the investor in the stock of any other business corporation, or in the bonds or mortgages upon any other property? Why, may we not ask, should the public bear the burden imposed by "injudicious contracts," or "poor engineering," or the "unusually high price paid for material," or the "rascality on the part of those engaged in the construction or management of the property?" The public had nothing to do with any of these. The public did not invest upon such chances. The public can justly be called upon to pay such reasonable rates as will yield a reasonable compensation for the use of the fair and reasonable value of the property, and not more. If investors put their money into the hands of those who thus manage the property, or in securities upon properties thus constructed, or managed, it was either their misfortune or their folly; but it affords no excuse for burdening the public with high rates, to the profit either of the rascals or to those who trusted in them.

His honor further added in the opinion: "Nevertheless, the amount of money that has gone into the railroad property as the actual investment, as expressed, theoretically at least, by the amount of stock and bonds, is not to be ignored, even though such sum is far in excess of the present value."

Is it possible that the patrons of a railroad, who had nothing to do with the injudicious contract, poor engineering, unusually high cost of material, rascality on the part of those engaged in the construction or management, must bear all of the burden of these injudicious contracts, poor engineering, and rascality in the construction or management in order that the poor engineers and rascals or those who employed them may reap the benefit? If this be so, then, indeed, the time has actually come when the railroad lord can say to the public: "Ye know I reap where I had sown not, and that I gathered where I had not strewn."

Again, his honor tells us that "the transportation of persons and property by private individuals and corporations has become a business and not a system."

Then, he says: "Now in the carrying on of any private enterprise, increase of business with increase of profits is a stimulating thought, and for this every variety of action is taken. Advancement, solicitation, inducement, favors are all freely resorted to, but with the single purpose of larger business and greater gain. It is not strange that in carrying on of transportation all the characteristics of other kinds of business are found."

There can be no doubt about the correctness of either of these propositions. We admit their truth, and insist that there shall be applied to this business and to these inducements the same rules of law which are applied under similar circumstances to other business and to like inducements in the management of other business enterprises.

Without any statute regulating rates, a common carrier of persons or property, in the absence of a specific contract, is, at common law, bound to carry either persons or property for a reasonable compensation.

So, in the absence of a specific contract, a tenant is bound to pay a reasonable rental for the use of the leased premises.

Thus, a large number of instances might be cited where the law would imply a reasonable compensation for the use of property or persons, or both; yet, we know of no instance where, in arriving at what is a just or reasonable compensation, either the encumbrance upon the property, or the unusually high price paid for material, or the lack of skill in the mechanic who constructed the property or the racality of those in charge of the construction or management was taken into consideration, by any court, in determining what was a reasonable compensation. These propositions are elementary. It needs no citation of authorities to support them.

Then, if railroading is a business, and no one would dispute it, we can see no reason why it should not be governed by the same rules of law as other business is in determining what is and what is not a reasonable compensation.

Wellman v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 83 Mich. 592.

Every presumption is in favor of the validity of the act in question.

The act will not be presumed to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, or of the state.

It must be made to appear affirmatively that the act in question is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

In Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362–395 (38:1014–1022, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560), it is said: "It is not to be supposed that the legislature of any state, or a commission appointed under the authority of any state, will ever engage in a deliberate attempt to cripple or destroy institutions of such great value to the community as the railroads, but will always act with the sincere purpose of doing justice to the owners of railroad property, as well as to other individuals."

This being so, then it must be made clearly to appear from the pleadings and the evidence that the legislature, in passing the act in question, did not, in fact, do justice to the several railroads affected by the act; and that by reason thereof the plaintiffs below were injured in their property rights as stockholders in such company or companies.

Then it must follow that, before the decree below can be sustained, the following propositions of fact must have been established by competent evidence:

1. That the plaintiffs below were stockholders in the respective corporations, as alleged.

2. That each of the railroads are operated in a prudent and economical manner.

8. That when so managed, the reduction of rates provided for in the act, when taken in connection with all the other earnings of the several companies, will deprive such company of a just or reasonable compensation for the services so performed.

4. The plaintiffs below attacked the constitutionality of the act; the burden, therefore, was upon them to cstsblish every essential element of fact necessary to show the invalidity of the act.

The answer of appellants puts in issue every one of the above questions of fact, save the one as to the plaintiffs below being stock holders, which is admitted.

We call the court's attention, then, to the fact that there is wanting any competent evidence tending to show that either of these railroads are prudently or economically managed.

Neither is there any evidence tending to show the income from all the business of the several companies from all sources.

As to the necessity of the entire earnings of these roads appearing in evidence before the act can be declared invalid, see Com. v. Covington & C. Bridge Co. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 836.

This case was reversed by this court, 154 U. S. 204 (38: 962, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 649), but not upon this ground.

As to the operating expenses see Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339, 345 (36: 176, 180).

The entire business of the consolidated company as a whole must be considered in determining reasonable rates.

St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S. 649, 665, 666 (39: 567, 573).

After paying expenses of operation, who is to determine what are reasonable rates?

Lord Ellenborough, in Allnutt v. Inglis, 12 East, 527, on 537, said: "There is no doubt that the general principle is favored both in law and justice, that every man may fix what price he pleases upon his own property, or the use of it, but if, for a particular purpose, the public have a right to resort to his premises and make use of them, and he have a monopoly in them for that purpose, if he will take the benefit of that monopoly, he must, as an equivalent, perform the duty attached to it on reasonable terms." This is cited with approval in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 127 (24: 85), and it is said in the latter case, on 132 (24:86): "Certainly, if any business can be clothed 'with a public interest, and ceases to be juris privati only,' this has been."

If a warehouse can "cease to be juris privati," certainly the "business" of railroading must.

If it be true that railroad property ceases to be juris privati, and is clothed with a quasi-public use, whenever the operation of such railroad is undertaken, then it must follow as a corollary thereto that all parties dealing with such property, or taking security upon such property, must take such property or security thereon with notice of such quasi-public use. In Reagan v. Mercantile Trust Co. 154 U. S. 413, 416 (38: 1028, 1030, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 575), in the opinion it is said: "By the act of incorporation Congress authorized the company to build its road through the state of Texas. It knew that, when constructed, a part of its business would be the carrying of persons and property from points within the state to other points also within the state, and that in so doing it would engage in a business, control of which is nowhere by the Federal Constitution given to Congress. It must have been known that, in the nature of things, the control of that business would be exercised by the state. . . . Had Congress deemed it necessary, to the further security of the government bonds, that this road would be exempt from state control, it would have said so. Not having done so, it is manifest Congress expected such business to be regulated by state legislation."

The right, then, of the government under its bonds is subject to and inferior to the right of the state in its control of freigh' rates as to purely Nebraska freights. For this right exists by virtue of the law permitting regulation and control of purely domestic business by the state, and the law enters into and forms a part of the contract.

If this presumption of knowledge is true of Congress and as to the holders of the bonds of the Union Pacific company, it must be equally true of the holders of bonds of each of the other companies to these actions. It follows then:

1. The right of the state to fix a reasonable maximum freight rate upon all freight shipped from one point in the state to another point in the state is paramount to any right which is or may be acquired by any bondholder, whether that bondholder be the government or a private individual.

2. The right of the state being a superior right in determining what is a reasonable rate, the interest of such bondholder cannot be set up or considered as against the interest of the state.

3. In determining the reasonableness of the rates it cannot be other than such a rate as will pay the expense of operation, when prudently and economically managed, and something more, at least, for the use of the company.

The next question which naturally arises is, Who is to determine what such excess above operating expenses shall be? Is it a question for the courts, or is it a question of public policy, and therefore a question for the legislature.

It is stated in the opinion of the Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307 (29: 636), that "this power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights, the state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or without due process of law." This quotation is copied by Justice Brewer in Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 398 (38: 1024, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560), with approval.

The exception to legislative control must then be by reason of the legislation itself operating to destroy the property, or the limitation, fixed by the statute, must be equivalent to confiscation, or require the railroad corporation to carry persons or property without just reward, or the act itself must operate to do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use, without just compensation or without due process of law. The legislation in question does not amount to the taking of the actual property of the railroad company. It does not seek to take the property; neither does it purport to seek to require the railway company to carry either persons or property without reward.

Hence it cannot be said that the act in question seeks to take private property for public use without just compensation; nor can it be said that the act in question requires these railroad corporations to carry the property without reward.

Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680, 691 (31: 841 844, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 56); Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155 (24: 94); Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 335 (29:646).

If these decisions are based upon sound principles of law, it must follow that so long as the act is constitutional in all other respects, and does provide a rate sufficient to more than pay operating expenses, it is a question of legislative policy and one which the courts cannot inquire into.

Then the question is, Who is to determine the question of reasonableness? Is it the courts, or is it the legislature? It seems to us that if the legislation does not actually deprive the corporation of its property, nor require it to carry persons or property without reward sufficient to more than pay operating expenses economically administered, it is purely a question of public policy into which the courts cannot inquire.

No question is more firmly settled in the jurisprudence of this country than is the one that what is and what is not public policy is one for the legislature, and not for the courts.

Brass v. North Dakota, Stœser, 153 U. S. 401, 405 (38: 761).

So we say, if the rate, fixed by law, is such as to provide for a rate which will pay more than operating expenses where the roads are managed and operated with economy, it is not for the courts to say what that income shall be, when it applies to all alike who are alike situated in that business.

A careful review of all the cases, both state and Federal, we think, will show the true rule to be that, so long as the legislation itself does not operate to deprive the individual or corporation of his or its property, nor require the actual use of the property of the individual or corporation without compensation, then such legislation cannot be said to be in conflict with either state or Federal Constitution. What such compensation shall be, after paying operating expenses, is purely a question of public policy to be determined by the legislature and not by the courts. If this be true, certainly there was error in the circuit courts, decreeing a perpetual injunction against the law in question. The evidence establishes beyond question that the rates fixed under this law will produce an income considerably more than sufficient to pay operating expenses.

The Constitution of the United States is of a limited scope. It does not profess and was not designed to prevent all possible unwise and unjust legislation.

The hardship, impolicy, or injustice of state laws is not necessarily an objection to their constitutional validity; and the remedy for evils of that character is to be sought from state legislatures.

Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 520 (29: 463, 466).

The Constitution itself contains no provision restricting the power of the states as to such legislation. It has, indeed, been contended that, where such legislation was applied to a corporation, it constituted a violation of a contract with the state embodied in the charter, and was thus brought within the provisions of article 1, § 10. But this argument has been rejected by the supreme court, even when the charter contained no express power of amendment and repeal. See Ruggles v. Illinois, 108 U. S. 526 (27: 812). It was early decided that the first eight amendments did not limit the power of the states (Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243 (8: 672)), and it may now be assumed that the power of the states in this respect is unlimited, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, unless restricted by the provision of the 14th Amendment, that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The question is, in fact, therefore, purely of the construction and scope of that Amendment.

It cannot be successfully contended that regulations of trade, even if carried to the point of prohibiting an industry, infringes the constitutional guaranty of liberty.

It is equally true that such regulations do not constitute a denial of the equal protection of the laws. The scope of the latter provision was considered by the Supreme Court in Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27 (28: 924), and was said to mean that equal protection should be extended to all under like circumstances; that no restraints or burdens should be put upon anyone, except such as were imposed on others in the same calling and condition.

To render a state law invalid, as inconsistent with the provision of the 14th Amendment now in question, it must be shown that some right of property is infringed.

In the case of St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S. 649 (39: 567), Justice Shiras, speaking for the whole court, in reviewing the prior decision on page 657 (39: 570) thus sums up what had been determined: "This court has declared, in several cases, that there is a remedy in the courts for relief against legislation establishing a tariff of rates which is so unreasonable as to practically destroy the value of property of companies engaged in the carrying business, and that especially may the courts of the United States treat such a question as a judicial one, and hold such acts of legislation to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, as depriving the companies of their property without due process of law, and as depriving them of the equal protection of the laws." We take it, then, that this is as far as the courts have gone.

The legislation, then, must be shown by the evidence to be such as to deprive the companies of their property without due process of law, or as to deprive them of the equal protection of the laws. But it is said in this case, at page 663 (39: 572): "The opinion of this court on appeal was that while it was within the power of a court of equity in such case to decree that the rates so established by the commission were unreasonable and unjust, and to restrain their enforcement, it was not within its power to establish rates itself, or to restrain the commission from again establishing rates." If it is not, then, within the power of the court to establish rates itself, it must exist within the legislative power, restricted only so far as not to fix such rates so low as to deny the companies the right of property or the equal protection of the law. It must follow, then, that so long as the rate fixed by the law will pay the operating expenses when economically administered, and something in addition thereto, the power of the court ends, and the extent to which rates must produce profits is one of political policy.

The real objection to the law in question on the part of the complainants below, and of the several railway companies, does not consist so much in the amount of the reduction of their earnings as it does in the fact that this law, if held valid, will deprive the companies of the possibility of making preference to favored parties and friendly localities, and make up such deficit by charging higher rates to less favored parties and communities.

Argument of Mr. William J. Bryan, for appellants:

Appellants contend: First. That the several states have the right to fix, either directly through an act of the legislature or indirectly through a commission, reasonable maximum freight and passenger rates upon traffic wholly within their borders.

Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U.S. 155 (24: 94); Peik v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 94 U. S. 164 (24: 97); Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ackley, 94 U. S. 179 (24: 99); Winona & St. P. R. Co. v. Blake, 94 U. S. 180 (24: 99); Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 108 U. S. 541 (27: 818); Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307 (29: 636); Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557 (30: 244); Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680 (31: 841, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 56); Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578 (41: 560).

Second. That as a general rule, the power of the courts to suspend the enforcement of a schedule of rates fixed by a state legislature or by a railroad commission can only be invoked when such rates yield an income so small as to leave absolutely nothing above operating expenses.

Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418 (33: 970, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209); Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339 (36: 176); Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362 (38: 1014, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S. 649 (39: 567); Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578 (41: 560).

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Dey, 35 Fed. Rep. 878, 1 L. R. A. 744, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 325, Mr. Justice Brewer said: "Counsel for complainants urge that the lowest rates the legislature may establish must be such as will secure to the owners of the railroad property a profit on their investment at least equal to the lowest current rate of interest, say 3 per cent. Decisions of the supreme court seem to forbid such a limit to the power of the legislature in respect to that which they apparently recognize as a right of the owners of the railroad property to some reward; and the right of judicial interference exists only when the schedule of rates established will fail to secure to the owners of the property some compensation or income from their investment. As to the amount of such compensation, if some compensation or reward is in fact secured, the legislature is the sole judge."

Such was also the principle established in the Granger Cases in 94 U. S. 178 (24: 98), where the court said: "Where property has been clothed with a public interest, the legislature may fix a limit to that which in law shall be reasonable for its use. This limit binds the courts as well as the people. If it has been improperly fixed, the legislature, not the courts, must be appealed to for the change." This doctrine was reaffirmed in Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680 (31: 841, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 56).

Third. That there may be special instances in which the courts will refuse to interfere, even though the rates fixed do not yield enough to pay operating expenses.

Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339 (36: 176); Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362 (38: 1014, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S. 649 (39:567); Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578 (41: 560).

In Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Wellman, Mr. Justice Brewer said: "It is agreed that the defendant's operating expenses for 1888 were $2,404,516.54. Of what do these operating expenses consist? Are they made up partially of extravagant salaries,—$50,000 to $100,000 to the president, and in like proportion to subordinate officers? Surely, before the courts are called upon to adjudge an act of the legislature fixing the maximum passenger rates for railroad companies to be unconstitutional, on the ground that its enforcement would prevent the stockholders from receiving any dividends on their investments, or the bondholders any interest on their loans, they should be fully advised as to what is done with the receipts and earnings of the company; for if so advised it might clearly appear that a prudent and honest management would, within the rates prescribed, secure to the bondholders their interest, and to the stockholders reasonable dividends. While the protection of vested rights of property is a supreme duty of the courts, it has not come to this, that the legislative power rests subservient to the discretion of any railroad corporation which may, by exorbitant and unreasonable salaries, or in some other improper way, transfer its earnings into what it is pleased to call 'operating expenses.'"

The above language was quoted with approval by Mr. Justice Shiras in delivering the opinion of the court in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill.

In Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362 (38: 1014, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560), Mr. Justice Brewer said: "It is unnecessary to decide, and we do not wish to be understood as laying down as an absolute rule, that in every case a failure to produce some profit to those who have invested their money in the building of a road is conclusive that the tariff is unjust and unreasonable. And yet justice demands that everyone should receive some compensation for the use of his money or property, if it be possible without prejudice to the rights of others. There may be circumstances which would justify such a tariff; there may have been extravagance and a needless expenditure of money; there may be waste in the management of the road; enormous salaries; unjust discrimination as between individuals and shippers, resulting in general loss. The construction may have been at a time when material and labor were at the highest price, so that the actual cost far exceeds the present value; the road may have been unwisely built, in localities where there is not sufficient business to sustain a road. Doubtless, too, there are many other matters affecting the rights of the community in which the road is built as well as the rights of those who have built the road."

Fourth. The evidence in the cases at bar shows that the rates allowed by the Nebraska statute will yield to each and every railroad in the state a profit upon its investments over and above operating expenses.

Fifth. Upon the foregoing propositions of law and fact the judgment of the court below should be reversed and the rates fixed by statute allowed to stand.

Sixth. But in case this court shall hold that it has the right to pass upon the reasonableness of the profit allowed to the railroads of Nebraska by the statute under consideration, then, in such case, appellants contend—

A. That the present value of the roads, as measured by the cost of production, is the basis upon which profit should be computed.

In endeavoring to establish a reasonable rule we are bound to consider the conditions which surround other occupations. Railroads are built, owned, and operated by corporations; corporations are fictitious persons created by law; laws are made by the people through their representatives. It cannot be assumed that natural persons would intentionally create fictitious persons and endow them with rights and privileges greater than they themselves enjoy. Neither can it be assumed that the natural persons who make the laws desired to exempt corporations, the creatures of law, from the vicissitudes which surround themselves. The ordinary business man cannot avail himself of watered stock or fictitious capitalization, nor can he protect himself from falling prices. If his property rises in value, he profits thereby; so do the owners of a railroad under similar conditions. If his property falls in value, he loses thereby; so must the owners of a railroad under similar conditions unless it can be shown that railroad property deserves more protection than other forms of property. Can it be said that the railroad which carries the farmers' stuff to market merits greater consideration than the farmer who raises the crops? Can it be said that the railroad which carries a manufactured product to market merits greater consideration than the manufacturer? Can it be said that the common carrier is deserving of greater consideration than the ordinary business man whose merchandise gives the railroad a reason for existence? Is the man who carries property from producer to consumer a more important factor in society than both producer and consumer?

Such a rule does not do injustice to stockholders and those who desire to purchase stock. If the owners of the road have bonded the road for enough money to cover its present value, their stock does not represent value. The owners of such a road stand in the same position as the owner of a farm who has encumbered it for all it is worth; his equity of redemption is a legal title without a market value. They stand in the same position as the owner of a business block or of a stock of merchandise who has obtained the entire value of his property from a mortgagee.

Such a rule does not do injustice to the holders of railroad bonds; if their bonds do not exceed the present value of the property, they can expect an interest; if their bonds exceed in amount the present value of the property, they stand in the position of any other mortgagee who loans upon insufficient security or whose security diminishes in value after the loan is made. The only recourse the mortgagee usually has if his security becomes insufficient is to take the title to the property. If the first-mortgage bonds equal or exceed the value of the property, then the holders of subsequent liens stand in the same position as the man who invests in a second mortgage when the first mortgage covers the value of the property.

There can be no distinction made between bondholders and stockholders. If the states have a right to regulate rates, stockholders cannot resist the demand for reasonable rates by building the road with borrowed money. The stockholder invests in railroad stock, knowing that the road can only charge a reasonable rate and earn a reasonable return. The man who loans money to a railroad stands upon an equal footing with the stockholder, and, as against the state or the patrons, can assert no greater right than that possessed by the stockholders. Bondholders may foreclose their lien and become owners of the road. As against the state or the patrons they can have no higher privileges as bondholders before becoming owners than they have later as owners if it becomes necessary to take the road to satisfy their lien.

In support of the proposition that railroads should be placed upon the same footing as an ordinary business enterprise, it may be suggested that it is against public policy to raise up in any community or country a few persons, natural or corporate, and exempt them from the dangers and liabilities which must be encountered by the people in general. Those who are in possession of a monopoly are apt to be indifferent, if not actually hostile, to the interests of those who are immediately affected by a change in the business conditions of the country. If, for instance, railroad owners can demand a return upon capital never actually invested in the construction of the road or upon the original cost when the property has decreased in value, they not only have an unfair advantage over those who are subjected to competition, but may actually profit by conditions which are disastrous to others. An unrestrained monopoly preys upon all those who are so situated that they cannot themselves enter into a monopoly.

An additional reason why the court should not enforce the demands of the railroads for returns upon inflated stocks and bonds is to be found in the fact that such action on the part of the courts would greatly embarrass, if not entirely defeat, the effort which is being made in various states to prevent the overcapitalization of railroads. The Constitution of Nebraska, article 11, § 5, contains the following provision:

"No railroad corporation shall issue any stock or bonds, except for money, labor, or property actually received and applied to the purposes for which such corporation was created; and all stock, dividends, and other fictitious increase of the capital stock or indebtedness of any such corporation shall be void."

No one will question the wisdom of this constitutional restriction, and yet it will be impotent to protect the people from watered stock if the courts establish a rule which will enable the railroad companies to collect an income upon overcapitalization.

In comparing the rights of the patrons of the road with the rights of the holders of stocks and bonds, it must be remembered that the patron relies upon the law which compels common carriers to offer their services for reasonable compensation, while the purchaser of railroad stock or bonds only suffers from his own negligence if he fails to learn whether the money represented by those stocks and bonds actually went into the road or found its way into the pockets of railway promoters. If a person contemplates purchasing railroad bonds, he can inquire whether the railroad's indebtedness exceeds the cost of reproducing it; if he fails to make such inquiry, he ought to have no standing in a court of equity. He may be an innocent purchaser of bonds in the sense that the railroads issuing the bonds cannot make a legal defense to his claim, but he is not an innocent purchaser in the sense that the court must give actual value to his investment. In like manner the purchaser of stock can inquire whether the stock represents actual value. If he fails to inquire, or buys with knowledge that the debts exceed the cost of reproducing the road, he has no equity which a court can enforce.

The evidence shows that the railroads of Nebraska can be reproduced complete for about $20,000 per mile.

The following table, taken from the brief of associate counsel, shows the amount of stock and bonds issued by the various railroads which are parties to this suit:

	Capital Stock per mile.	Funded debt per mile.	Total per mile.
C. B. & Q.	$14,439	$22,034	$36,473
C., St. P., M. & O.	25,103	17,504	42,608
F. E. & M. V.	23,352	16,238	39,590
U. P. Ry.	33,318	70,468	103,786
O. & R. V.	5,021	12,324	17,345
St. J. & G. I.	18,322	34,768	53,060
K. C. & O.	22,769	14,007	36,007
Mo. Pacific	44,746	48,462	93,208
Pacific R. R. in Neb.	15,010	15,009	30,010
K. & B. H.	14,175	13,496	27,625
C. R. I. & P.	16,822	19,545	36,368

This table shows upon how large an amount of fictitious capital the road will collect an income if allowed to collect from patrons enough money to pay interest upon all bonds and dividends upon all stock issued.

B. The rates fixed in the statute under consideration allow to the railroads of Nebraska a reasonable profit upon the present value of the roads. The evidence in support of this proposition will be discussed by associate counsel.

Seventh. Counsel for appellees insists that competition gives to the patrons of a railroad full and complete protection from extortionate rates. This argument is sufficiently answered by the decisions already rendered by this court, wherein it has repeatedly affirmed the right of the state to regulate railroad rates, but it may be added that a railroad is to a certain extent a monopoly; it is only because it is a monopoly that it can collect unreasonable rates. Competition can only act within certain limits. If a railroad is built between two points, no other road can be built between those points (unless it mortgages the future) until the first road is realizing an income practically double a reasonable return upon the value of the road, because a new road would require an investment equal to the value of the first road, and until transportation rates on business done would pay running expenses and a reasonable profit on both investments competition would be prohibited. When two roads are built they must necessarily collect more in tolls than one road would be justified in collecting. The evidence in this case shows that the Union Pacific Railroad is capitalized (including both stock and bonds) at more than five times the cost of reproducing that portion of the road which lies within the state of Nebraska. If it should attempt to realize upon all of this capitalization it would probably encourage the building of a parallel line, but it can charge rates grossly excessive without fear of competition as to local traffic. The very existence of the road prevents the building of a new road capitalized at present cost, and, even if a new road should be built, commerce would be compelled to bear a higher burden than it would if this road were limited to charges which would produce a reasonable return upon the actual value of the road.

Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Union P. R. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 15.

In the above case the court clearly points out the expensiveness of competition as a means of regulating railroad rates.

Eighth. Counsel for appellees insist that the rates fixed by railroad companies may be unreasonable and yet not unreasonable enough to give state legislatures a right to lower them; he divides rates into reasonable, not reasonable and unreasonable. Under the head of reasonable rates he includes what they should charge; under the head of not reasonable rates he includes those which the railroads may charge, but should not; under the head of unreasonable rates he includes those which the road must not charge. This division is not supported by authority. The law which requires carriers to transport goods at a reasonable compensation is an absolute one and does not depend upon the motive of the carrier. There is no twilight period between reasonable rates and unreasonable rates; rates which are reasonable may be charged; rates which are not reasonable cannot be charged.

Argument of Mr. J. M. Woolworth, for appellees:

1. These decrees were right because the rates of charge prescribed and limited in the act known as "House Roll 33" were insufficient to yield to the companies reasonable compensation for their services in transporting property from one point to another within the state.

The doctrine has been firmly established by a long series of the judgments of this court, beginning with the Granger Cases decided in the year 1876, 94 U. S. 178 (24: 98), that the legislature may prescribe and limit the charges which railroad companies may make for their services in transporting persons and goods for the public. But this doctrine has been qualified and restrained. It has been again and again declared by this court that the power of the legislature in this matter is not unlimited; that it cannot be carried so far as to require them to carry persons or property without reward, because the imposition of such charges would operate the taking of private property for public use without just compensation and without due process of law.

In the Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307, 331 (29: 636, 644), Mr. Justice Waite, speaking for the court, while sustaining the legislative power to fix rates to be charged by railroad companies, in order to guard against any unjust application of the doctrine, took the precaution to say:

"From what has thus been said, it is not to be inferred that this power of limitation or regulation is itself without limit. This power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights, the state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or without due process of law."

In Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680, 689 (31: 841, 844, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 56), Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the court, quoted this language with approval.

In Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174, 179 (32: 377, 380), Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, said that the power of the legislature to prescribe the charges of a railroad company for the carriage of persons and merchandise is "subject to the limitation that the carriage is not required without reward, or upon conditions amounting to the taking of property for public use without just compensation."

In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 458 (33: 970, 982, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209), Mr. Justice Blatchford, speaking for the court, said:

"If the company is deprived of the power of charging reasonable rates for the use of its property, and such deprivation takes place in the absence of an investigation by judicial machinery, it is deprived of the lawful use of its property, and thus, in substance and effect, of the property itself, without due process of law and in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and in so far as it is thus deprived, while other persons are permitted to receive reasonable profits upon their invested capital, the company is deprived of the equal protection of the laws."

In Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339 (36: 176), Mr. Justice Brewer delivering the opinion of the court, after reiterating the principle that an act of the legislature was not necessarily unconstitutional which fixed rates, said:

"The legislature has power to fix rates, and the extent of judicial interference is protection against unreasonable rates," that is, against unreasonable rates prescribed and limited by an act of the legislature.

In Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517 (36: 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45), Mr. Justice Blatchford said that the legislative "power of limitation or regulation is not without limit, and is not a power to destroy, or a power to compel the doing of the services without reward, or to take private property for public use without just compensation or without due process of law."

In Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362, 399 (38: 1014, 1024, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560), Mr. Justice Brewer, again speaking for the court, said:

"In every Constitution is the guaranty against the taking of private property for public purposes without just compensation. The equal protection of the laws which, by the 14th Amendment, no state can deny to the individual, forbids legislation, in whatever form it may be enacted, by which the property of one individual is, without compensation, wrested from him for the benefit of another, or of the public. This, as has been often observed, is a government of law, and not a government of men, and it must never be forgotten that under such a government, with its constitutional limitations and guaranties, the forms of law and the machinery of government, with all their reach and power, must in their actual workings stop on the hither side of the unnecessary and uncompensated taking or destruction of any private property, legally acquired and legally held."

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S. 649 (39: 567), Mr. Justice Shiras, delivering the opinion of the court, said in the course of it, "that there is a remedy in the courts for relief against legislation establishing a tariff of rates which is so unreasonable as to practically destroy the value of property of companies engaged in the carrying business, and that especially may the courts of the United States treat such a question as a judicial one, and hold such acts of legislation to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, as depriving the companies of their property without due process of law, and as depriving them of the equal protection of the laws."

And at this term, in Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578, 594 (41: 560, 566), Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court, reviewed many of the cases above cited and said:

"A statute which, by its necessary operation, compels a turnpike company, when charging only such tolls as are just to the public, to submit to such further reduction of rates as will prevent it from keeping its road in proper repair and from earning any dividends whatever for stockholders, is as obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States as would be a similar statute relating to the business of a railroad corporation having authority, under its charter, to collect and receive tolls for passengers and freight."

The question of fact remains whether House Roll 33 limited the charges which railroad companies may make for the carriage of goods so that their earnings would not cover the cost of doing the business and some compensation therefor.

One method of determining whether rates prescribed by the legislature are reasonable is to put them in force for one, two, or three years, and at the end of a proper period ascertain from the accounts of the business what the companies earned or lost. This method, however, is open to an obvious objection. If after statutory rates have been in operation a certain period it appears that the companies have not realized any compensation for their services, the loss sustained by them cannot in any way be made good.

To enforce statutory rates which are unreasonable in order to try their effect, and force upon the companies the loss or the contingency of loss which they would sustain while the rates were being put to the test, and without any possibility of being reimbursed, is the worst conceivable case of taking private property without compensation. The pretense that parties must submit to such method of testing the reasonableness of rates shocks the conscience of an honest man It is no better than hanging a man for murder and trying him afterwards.

There is another method of testing the reasonableness of statutory rates; it is to take the business for one, two, three, or more years immediately before the passage of the act and, by applying the rates to it, ascertain what they would have yielded. For instance, suppose the case of a road with a paid-up capital of $4,000,000, earning in the year just before the statutory rates were prescribed, $1,000,000 per annum, of which 60 per cent or $600,000 went to cost of operation, and 40 per cent or $400,000 to dividends. Now suppose the rates charged by the company were reduced by statute so that had they been in force the year before, its earnings would have been only $500,000, while its operating expenses continued to be $600,000, so that not only would the stockholders receive no dividend, but the company would sustain an actual loss of $100,000. Let this process be applied not only to the business of one year immediately preceding the passage of the statute, but to the second and the third years and as far back as the inquiry could be carried, with the same result. This method would amount almost to a demonstration that the statutory rates will not in the future yield a reasonable return for the services rendered by the company. This method is just as legitimate as the other; in one, as well as the other, actual figures taken from the accounts of the company are dealt with, and no guesses or estimates or calculation of contingencies are indulged, while the process of computation is exactly the same.

It is true that this method of testing the reasonableness of statutory rates by applying them to the business of past years does not and cannot take into account changes in circumstances and conditions which may afterwards take place; under their influence rates reasonable before the passage of the act may possibly become unreasonable; they may become unreasonably high or unreasonably low; but that is equally true when rates are tested by putting them in force for a limited time, and, if then found to be unreasonable, restraining the enforcement of the act in the future.

But these cases were heard at the circuit more than a year and a half after the act complained of was passed. That act was passed on the 12th of April, 1893, and Mr. Justice Brewer's opinion was filed on the 12th of November, 1894, and the decree entered on the 23d of that month. This period was quite sufficient for any changes of conditions or circumstances to be developed or to manifest themselves; and whatever they were, they could have been shown upon this record. Such changes did take place; they were very radical and the facts were shown in the proofs.

I shall begin the inquiry whether House Roll 33, had it been put in force during any one of three years immediately preceding its passage, would have yielded any compensation to the companies for their services; and I shall give figures about which there is no room for disagreement and which are least favorable to our contention. I propose to show, not that the statutory rates would not have yielded to the companies reasonable compensation for their services, but that they would not have yielded even cost of the business. I shall not complicate the inquiry by showing that these rates would have yielded nothing to apply on the interest of the debts of the companies, or on the cost or value of the road, or any returns, by way of dividends or otherwise, to the stockholders. I lay interest on bonds and mortgages and debts however evidenced and dividends to stockholders entirely out of view.

The first important fact testified to is that House Roll 33 reduces the charges made by the companies 29½ per cent.

The following table gives the percentage of expenses to earnings of the several companies for the years ending June 30, 1891, 1892, and 1893:

This table shows that not one of these roads would have realized the cost of its local business in the three years ending June 30, 1891, 1892, and 1893, had their rates been those fixed by House Roll 33, except the Fremont, Elkhorn, & Missouri Valley in 1891 and in 1893, and the Union Pacific in 1892 and 1893; the Fremont Company would have earned 10.63 per cent in 1891, and in 1893, 6.84 per cent; and the Union Pacific 4.06 in 1892, and 1.99 in 1893.

The same result may be reached by another process. Instead of taking percentages, we may take figures in dollars and cents.

In order to present the whole at a glance the figures are thrown into the following table:

These figures given us by one of the defendants and one of their solicitors, whose competency to speak is asserted and shown by them, and these calculations upon both percentages and dollars and cents, demonstrate in a very simple way what we set out to prove; that the rates limited by House Roll 33 would not, if in force in any one of three years before the passage of the act, have yielded returns which would have paid the cost of doing the business.

Mr. Taylor, the auditor of the company, who in one capacity or another has been in the accounting department ever since the construction of the road was begun, says that the same cost, $74,616,523.02, included original construction, betterments, etc. He also says that the mileage of the Burlington is 2,253.07 (page 584), which would give about $33,000 per mile.

There is no suggestion in the record that the road was not honestly and economically built.

There is no direct proof of present value, but Mr. Taylor says that some of the properties are worth much more now than they were when acquired.

Mr. Morgan was an engineer, called to their assistance by the Patterson Commission which was charged by Congress with the examination, among other things, of the condition and value of the road. From his report several extracts are made, and one is an estimate of the cost of reproducing the road, which shows the cost per mile to be $26,814. This does not include terminals.

Mr. House, who was one of the original corps of engineers, affirms that estimate.

Mr. Calvert, who had been at first resident and afterwards chief engineer of the Burlington, in Nebraska, and was superintendent of that road when he testified, says that the cost and value of a road which had become mature by time and expenditure was from 33⅓ to 50 per cent greater than the one just built which would increase the estimate of Mr. House and Mr. Morgan to from $35,752 to $40,221.

To this a large sum should be added for terminals, which Mr. Morgan estimates at $10,000,000. Mr. House estimates them at $3,973,912. Either sum swells the cost of reproduction very largely.

The testimony is imperfect as to the present value and cost of these roads. It will be found on pages 1547–1580. It is definite enough for the Omaha terminals, and can only be estimated for the rest of the property.

The provisions of the Constitution of the state of Nebraska limit the competency of the legislature to fix railroad rates. Under those provisions, statutory rates must yield, not only cost and compensation the least possible, but in all contingencies cost and a fair profit.

In State Board of Transportation v. Missouri P. R. Co. 29 Neb. 550, 560, that court held that one object of this clause was the protection of the companies against oppressive legislation.

When the state undertakes to fix railroad rates, it is bound to fix rates which yield cost and some compensation.

Mr. Justice Woods in Tilley v. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. 5 Fed. Rep. 641, said that "the question, What are just and reasonable rates? is one which presents different phases from month to month, upon every road in the state, and in reference to all the innumerable articles and products that are the subject of transportation;" for which reason he held that a legislature composed of a large number of members, sitting for a limited time and at long intervals, is incompetent to respond to that question. And in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Dey, 35 Fed. Rep. 866, 1 L. R. A. 744, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 325, Judge Brewer said what "would be fair and reasonable to-day, six months or a year hence may be either too high or too low," and that a legislature convened once in two years cannot make rates which will continue to be fair during so long a period.

Boston & L. R. Corp. v. Salem & L. R. Co. 2 Gray, 1, was a bill by one company to restrain another from entering upon and using its tracks under an act authorizing it, but not providing compensation.

Mr. Chief Justice Shaw, in an elaborate opinion, held that in order to the validity of the act, compensation must be provided in such a case as well as in any other.

See also Jersey City & B. R. Co. v. Jersey City & H. Horse R. Co. 20 N. J. Eq. 61.

The state may, if it please, assume the risks; it may do so by providing for the payment to the road, or by agreeing to pay the road what it may lose if the earnings on high-class do not cover the losses on low-class freight. It may, perhaps, do so in some other way. But it cannot throw the risks on the road. It must provide compensation, or speedy, certain, and ample remedy to recover it.

Connecticut River R. Co. v. Franklin County Comrs. 127 Mass. 50, 34 Am. Rep. 338.

House Roll 88 is unconstitutional because it attempts to fix and limit the rate which the Union Pacific Railway Company may charge for transportation of freight on its lines between points within the state. That company is within the language of the act, and the Board of Transportation so construes it.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated by an act of Congress passed in 1862 (12 Stat. at L. 489). An act amendatory of the charter was passed in 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 356). This act authorized any or all of the companies mentioned therein to consolidate their organizations (§ 16). Under this authority the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Kansas Pacific Railway Company (at one time known as the Leavenworth, Pawnee, & Western, and afterwards as the Union Pacific Railroad Company, Eastern Division), and the Denver Pacific Railway & Telegraph Company, became consolidated under the name and style of the Union Pacific Railway Company.

The object of the incorporation of the company is stated in the original act to be "to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores" (§ 3), and "to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order; and to secure to the government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes." § 18.

The service which the company was required to render the government was to "at all times transmit despatches over said telegraph line, and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroad for the government, whenever required to do so by any department thereof, and that the government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid, at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service" § 6.

The declared objects of the acts, their explicit directions for the construction of the roads, the services to be rendered, the powers reserved over the properties, and various other provisions, impress upon the Union Pacific Company the character of an agency of the government in its most vital parts.

It is too late in the day to take a moment's time to prove that the states cannot interfere with any of the operations of the general government. And in administering its affairs that government may act directly by its own officers, or it may make use of any appropriate agency. In proper cases Congress may create a corporation to render certain services to the government. At one time it created a bank to be the fiscal agent of the government, and this court held that such a corporation was a proper means to effect its legitimate objects. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316 (4: 579); Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738 (6: 204).

And such an instrumentality, when once adopted by Congress for such purposes, is in its operations as far beyond any interference by a state as the Army or Navy or the post-office. Attempts were made by two several states to tax the operations of the bank, but this court held such attempts futile. In the Pacific railroad acts of 1862 and 1864 Congress granted to the Central Pacific Company some of the franchises which we have seen it granted to the Union Pacific Company, and the state of California attempted to tax them. This court held that for the state to lay such a tax was "not only derogatory to the dignity of the Federal government, but was repugnant to its paramount sovereignty."

California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1 (32: 150, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153).

To be sure, that was a case of taxation and this is one of regulation; but as Mr. Justice Miller said in Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 570 (30: 244, 249), it is impossible to see any distinction between a statute which regulates the charges for transportation and a statute which levies a tax.

It is true that this court has supported a tax upon the property of this company.

Thomson v. Union P. R. Co. 9 Wall. 579 (19: 792); Union P. R. Co. v. Peniston, 18 Wall. 5 (21: 787).

We know that a state cannot tax bonds of the United States.

Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 449 (7: 481).

Nor can the state of Nebraska disable this instrument of the government to maintain its road in efficient operation, so as to be ready at all times to answer its call for the transportation of its mails, stores, troops, and munitions of war.

We submit, therefore, that Congress reserved to itself control over the rates to be charged by the company for the transportation of freight as well as passengers. The reservation may have been subject to a remote contingency; but that was a matter for the discretion of Congress, doubtless wise at the time. That, however, does not qualify the purpose to insist upon the whole power of control over rates. That is as large as if the provision had been simply that Congress could fix them at its pleasure.

It need hardly be stated that the reservation to the United States of the power in any contingency and in any degree is incompatible with its exercise by the state. No man can serve two masters; and this company cannot be subject at the same time to the United States and the state.

We submit that it has been demonstrated that House Roll 33 is inoperative so far as the Union Pacific Railway Company is concerned. But that is not the whole reach and effect of the proposition which has been established; nor is it the more interesting aspect of the case.

The provisions of House Roll 33 apply to all railroad corporations doing business within the state of Nebraska, and include the Union Pacific, the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy, the Chicago & Northwestern, the Missouri Pacific, and the Elkhorn companies. The Federal corporation not being subject to the jurisdiction of the state in this respect; the result is that the act is unconstitutional and void, not only in respect of that company but in its whole scope and reach. It was beyond the competency of the legislature to enact the law in the words of it, and therefore it must fall.

The contention may be shortly stated thus: The legislature said the provisions of this act shall apply to all Railroad Companies doing business in this state. When it spoke in terms within whose circumscription are companies chartered, one by Congress and others by legislatures of the states, the whole provision falls.

United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214 (23: 563); Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82 (25: 550); Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678 (30: 766); Virginia Coupon Cases, 114 U. S. 270, 805 (29: 185, 198).

Applying the doctrine illustrated by these cases to House Roll 33, its general provisions applicable to all railroads being unconstitutional as to the Union Pacific Railway Company, it is void in its full reach and effect.

House Roll 33 is unconstitutional because it unjustly discriminates against certain of the roads in the state in favor of another.

It has been an elementary principle of the civil polity of this country from the earliest period in its history, that all citizens stand upon an equal footing before the law.

Argument of Mr. James C. Carter, for appellees:

A general statement of some of the claims asserted in defense of the Nebraska act:

1. That railroads are allowed to be built for the public benefit, and must therefore be made to subserve the benefit of the people; and that any private interest which may be involved is of secondary importance.

2. That all people having occasion to need the services of a railroad are entitled to them; and that the compensation required of them must be made to depend, not upon what the railroad can afford to render the services for, but upon what they can afford to pay.

3. That while it may be impossible to ascertain what the cost is for any particular service, it is possible to ascertain the average cost of the whole service rendered by a road, and fair to treat this average as the cost of any particular service; and consequently to assume that the cost of each particular service is everywhere the same.

4. That all persons have an equal right to the services of a railroad upon the same terms, notwithstanding that the actual cost of the service demanded by one may be much greater than that of the same service demanded by another.

5. That in fixing rates the value of the service to the one who demands it is unimportant; but that the one who needs it most, and who obtains the greatest benefit from it, should pay no more for it than he who needs it least and obtains the least benefit from it.

6. That the carriage of goods to and from large and compact communities which furnish large amounts of transportation and thus enable the service to be performed at much less cost are not entitled to the benefit of this natural advantage, but that all parts of the state must be put upon an equality.

There are many other claims upon which this legislation is defended, but the above are sufficient for the only purpose for which they are now stated, namely, to point out the first necessity of this discussion; namely, a clear understanding of what railroad business really is, and had become, under and in pursuance of the contracts between the public and the railroad companies at the time when this legislation assumed to deal with it.

The leading features of the railroad system of the United States, as it has thus grown up and been established under every sanction of law and public sentiment, are these:

First. That the prices of carriage are everywhere fixed, not by the railroads nor by shippers, but by the same imperious power which fixes the price of all other articles or services, namely, the pressure of competition. Against this determination it is irrelevant to argue justice or injustice; or, to speak more correctly, the decision of this power is always just. We do not complain of the decision in the case of food and clothing. We have no more right to complain of it in the case of the carriage of goods.

Second. Railroads charge the highest price they can profitably get, as everyone else does who has goods to sell; and in some instances, where they have no competitors other than teams, they may be under the temptation to charge an excessive price. This they could not do permanently, but they might do it temporarily, and before the forces of competition could be brought into play. An excessive price is that indisputably unusual charge for services rendered under similar conditions which reasonable men would declare extortionate. Against this danger there are two sufficient protections:

1. A plain regard for self-interest will and does prevent it. Moderate charges yield more profit by the greatly increased business they draw. No railroad could make money by the practice of extortion. A sound policy, perfectly well known to railroad managers, advises them that it is best to tempt and draw out a large traffic by low prices than to try to make a large profit on a small business.

2. No one need pay an excessive charge. The service can be exacted at a reasonable price.

It may, indeed, cost a lawsuit; but so do all other social and business wrongs. The wrong cannot be very great which does not provoke resistance. The extremely small number of actual contests on this point are good evidence of the fact that this abuse is not frequent or extensive.

Third. Railroad rates exhibit great diversity and the reason of many of them is not apparent to the observer who does not think of the conditions which free competition works out, and of the way in which the railroad system has grown up.

The cost of the service in particular cases has little to do with the making of the charge. What necessarily determines the carrier's conclusion in any case where he is called upon to say whether he will take new traffic offered at a certain price is how much, if any cost in addition to what he is then under he will incur if he takes it.

His final aim is to get such an average rate for all his traffic as will yield him a profit. The proportions in which all his customers contribute to that average are settled by causes absolutely beyond either his or their will. A grocer's customer, who uses much tea and little sugar, would not say to him that he is doing a great injustice by exacting from him a profit of 25 per cent on the tea he buys, and at the same time selling his neighbor sugar at a profit of only 5 per cent.

Fourth. There is a common phrase that railroad rates are arranged so as to "get all the traffic will bear;" and this is true; although not in the odious sense which imputes a design to take advantage of supposed necessities in order to exact an excessive compensation. In its real meaning it simply indicates to railroad managers the stern necessity which limits them to low rates in order to gain or to save traffic. When, in ways already indicated, they seek to gain traffic by competition with water carriage, they ascertain the rate which it is necessary for them to meet in order to secure it. They must take this rate or give up the struggle for the business; for it is "all the traffic will bear." At points where there is no competition except with other forms of land carriage, and little traffic at that, they fix rates calculated to build up the country and increase business; for such rates are "all the traffic will bear." If the great agricultural products are so low that farmers can make nothing by raising them and sending them to a market, the railroad man is obliged to make his rates such that the farmer can make something, or he will cease to attempt to raise such products, and the railroad will lose its chief business. He may find it necessary for his own interest to carry the traffic at actual cost, and sometimes even for less, for this is "all the traffic will bear."

Fifth. In saying that railroad business is subject, like ordinary industries, to the stress of competition we do not express the whole truth. They are peculiarly sensitive to it, and much more than most other industries. Resorting to the just analogy heretofore suggested, that a railroad company may be regarded as the manufacturer and seller of transportation, some peculiarities which distinguish this from other manufactures should be noted.

In the first place the expense of manufacturing as compared with the price of the product is much larger than in other industries. In other industries this expense depends very largely upon the amount of business done; but in this it goes on and cannot be greatly reduced when little business is transacted. Again, the commodity produced by railroads cannot, for want of a sufficient demand, be stored away and kept for a better market. If it is not sold to-day, because no fair price can be obtained for it, it can never be sold, and yet a large percentage of its cost which has already been incurred and paid must be lost.

These conditions put the managers of railroads under the constant spur of a desire to sell what they have on hand so as not to lose the expense it has already cost. Sellers of other goods always have the alternative, when the price is thought too low, of holding on to them with little additional expense for a better market.

Sixth. The operation of the laws of free competition in railroad, as in other business, are not unattended with possible mischiefs, but they are infinitely less than would flow from any attempt to dispense with such laws. These mischiefs, so far as prices are concerned, are really reducible to two.

1. There is a possibility that competing roads may combine in order to prevent or mitigate the effects of competition. This in the case of railroads is an imaginary danger only. The combination may, indeed, be made, and sometimes even be absolutely necessary to prevent self-destruction. But the combination must always find its real interest in an increase of traffic by low rates rather than making a large profit by high rates on a decreased traffic. And should an unwise policy (never followed in present times) tempt the imposition of high rates, it would speedily be baffled by the appearance in the field of new roads and new competitors supplied with capital attracted from other less profitable pursuits. That is to say, competition cannot be really escaped by combination in the large businesses which are open to all. Where nature has limited the supply of a commodity,—as in the case of mines producing the necessaries of life, coal, etc.,—a combination among all the proprietors may be made effective in raising the price. This is the case of true monopolies, which railroads are not.

Perhaps a practical unification of ownership of all great trunk lines of railway may be brought about and all existing competitions be thus destroyed, and there might not be boldness enough on the part of other capitalists to prompt them to arrange a struggle with the new giant, as is supposed to be true with the great unified interests of sugar and petroleum. But combination on such a scale is without mischief so far as prices are concerned. Self-interest in such cases can be promoted only by tempting an increase of consumption by offering the lowest possible price.

2. The other possible mischief is the conversion of open into secret competition; that is by secretly obtaining traffic by giving to some better terms than to others. This is exhibited in the paying of rebates, or making special private contracts, and thus giving to some advantages not shared by all.

Sometimes this practice is entirely proper and hurts no one, indeed, benefits all; as in the case where shippers of bulky articles like lumber may be induced to withhold shipments until the winter season, when other traffic is slack, and not send it when the roads are crowded. The case is different, however, when secret bargains are made merely to carry traffic for one shipper at lower rates than for others. This is an unqualified abuse and public and private outrage. It is the last resort in a desperate and deadly competition. All railroad managers abominate it, but there is no rectitude which will not submit to it rather than die.

In respect to both these possible mischiefs the law provides protection. Both practices are, when not justified by reasonable and fair purposes, crimes, and punishable as such. It may be said that they are often not easy to be discovered, and therefore, that the criminal law is not a sure safeguard; but this is, to a greater or less degree, the case with all crimes. The fear of punishment will be sufficient to restrain within moderate limits the commission of the offense. It can never become general; and so can never defeat the general beneficent operation of free competition.

The present general condition of the law on the questions involved in the present controversy is believed to be as follows:

1. That it is within the scope of the legislative power to establish maximum rates for railroad charges.

2. That this power is not unlimited; and that the ascertainment and declaration of its limits are within the province of the judicial power.

3. What these limits are is as yet an open question except in one particular; namely the regulations must be reasonable.

4. That they transcend this limit and become unreasonable whenever they operate so as to take away the property of the railroad companies.

5. What rules or principles must be observed in the framing of maximum rates in order to make them reasonable, other than the one above mentioned, that they must not take away property, is as yet an open question.

6. In particular, the question whether they are not unreasonable, if they impair a contract between the railroad companies and the state, and take away rights resting in contract is an open question.

7. What rights, resting in contract, railroad companies have, as against the state, is an open question.

8. Whether the state can determine by legislation the reasonable value of railroad service as between railroad and shipper, so as to oust or to cripple the jurisdiction of the courts to determine, in some form, that reasonable value, is an open question.

Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362 (38: 1014, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S. 649 (39: 567).

It is believed that the present legislation is clearly shown by the proofs in this case to be invalid within the principles already established by this court. The rates are unreasonable because they take away property without due process of law; and, therefore, it is not necessary to determine either of the points above mentioned as being still open. But, at the same time, it is true that those points are directly raised and involved, and a discussion of them is relevant, and cannot with propriety be passed.

The business of a common carrier of goods at all times before the introduction of railroads, and ever since, has been the carriage of goods for hire. The law attached to this business the duty on the part of the carrier to carry all goods which anyone might require him to carry. It gave him a corresponding right to charge for his services a reasonable compensation. What was in fact a reasonable compensation is, from its very nature, a judicial question, and has always been so treated.

The carrier had, in addition, the common right of all citizens, namely, to agree with his customer concerning the amount of his reward. In cases of such agreement, the question of reasonableness would necessarily disappear. If there be any exception to this it is confined to cases where the parties stand on such an unequal footing that extortion can be practised, as where one needs a cab in a city on a rainy night, and there is but one at hand. Such situations call for suitable police regulations.

One can become a carrier by railroad only by the permission of the state. What the rights of such a carrier are, as against the state, depend upon the terms of his contract with the state by which he acquires the right. Under our system, which allows all to construct and operate railroads upon the same terms, the contract is made by a public offer, and its acceptance, by performing the consideration.

The nature of the right gained by the acceptance of such offers is ascertained by the simple inquiry what the offer is. In the case of a railroad, where there are no special conditions or limitations modifying the substance of the offer (and in general, and in our particular cases, there are none), the offer is of the right to carry on (with the structure) the business of a common carrier as it is ordinarily carried on. And to whatever conditions, either by way of legistative regulation or otherwise, that business is ordinarily subject, it becomes subject when acquired by a railroad carrier in the manner above pointed out; and it becomes subject, undoubtedly, to such further governmental regulation as the new instrumentality employed may, in the public interest, reasonably require.

In the discussions, judicial as well as forensic, concerning the power of state legislatures to regulate railroad rates and other similar charges, while the existence of the power has been affirmed, the nature of the power, the place to which it is assignable in the just scheme of government, and the conditions under which it may properly be exercised, have not received the attention to which they are entitled. References have been made to certain employments, such as those of millers, bakers, ferrymen, innkeepers, etc., the charges in which have been made from time to time from an early period the subjects of legislative regulation, and it has been impliedly accepted as law, that these employments are, under all circumstances, subject to the interference of government, while other employments and businesses are not; but the reasons why this should be so have not been fully sifted. It is time this element which has been served as the foundation of the most momentous conclusions should be scrutinized and measured.

We affirm the moderate proposition that this governmental power upon which alone this class of regulation can be defended is the police power.

Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 125 (24:77, 84).

The law in question is not an exercise of the police power at all, and therefore necessarily a nullity.

A law in order to be an exercise of the police power must exhibit the characteristics of that power. It must recognize the existence of a real mischief, and separate it from the innocent, useful, and necessary acts of life, must not convert innocence into crime, and must employ remedies designed to reach only the recognized mischief.

This act exhibits no one of these characteristics. There was no occasion for any such exercise of police power. It does not employ the methods of the police power.

It is not the exercise of the police power to regulate monopolies; for there is no monopoly, and none can be pretended; and if there were, the principles upon which monopolies may be prevented from exacting extortionate charges are in no respect different from those of any other exercise of that power for the same purpose.

We assert that this legislation is unconstitutional for the following reasons:

First. It takes away the contract rights granted to, and vested in, the railroad companies by the public contracts under which they expended their capital in the construction of their roads.

Second. It immediately takes away the property of those companies without compensation, and without due process of law.

Third. It denies to them the equal protection of the laws.

A right once granted and vested under a contract cannot by any exercise of this power be taken away. The right to carry on the business of a common carrier as it is ordinarily carried on is the very thing fully vested in a railroad company when it accepts the invitation of the state and builds a railroad.

Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 719, 721 (25:496, 501, 502); New Orleans, S. F. & L. R. Co. v. Delamare, 114 U. S. 501 (29:244); Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, 135 (3:162, 177); People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 1, 2 L. R. A. 255.

This whole controversy may be made to turn upon another single proposition, based substantially upon the same grounds, but differing in form from those already asserted; namely, the rates established by the act are not maximum rates, such as the legislature had power to establish.

The Nebraska act is invalid and void within the principles now fully recognized by this court, for the reason that while on its face it pretends to regulate rates on Nebraska business alone it necessarily affects the business done in other states, and the rates of that business. Rates so regulated are, in very absolute sense, unreasonable.

The business of transportation by rail in Nebraska consists in the performance of innumerable distinct items of carriage service for an innumerable number of persons and under every diversity of circumstance affecting the question of reasonable price for the service. It is submitted that the legislature of that state cannot, in any single instance, impose a rate which would preclude the railroad from a recovery before a court and jury of what the court and jury might find to be the reasonable value of that service. This act utterly denies that right.

No one can deny, in view of the uniform decisions of this court, and especially in view of the last one on this subject, that the power of a state legislature to establish rates is not unlimited, but is subject to some sort of review in the courts. Upon any view of the province of the courts this act is invalid.

The present condition of the decisions of this court upon the question of the authority of a legislature to establish maximum rates leaves open for discussion, to say the least, every proposition advanced in this brief. No judgment of this court is opposed to any of them; and the manifest tendency of the later decisions is to support them all.

Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113 (24: 77); Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155 (24: 94); Peik v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 94 U. S. 164 (24: 97).

When the above questions are properly settled, our law in respect to maximum rates for railroad and other services will be brought into a more consistent form, which will at once secure individual rights and not unduly limit legislative powers; and then the propositions which this brief endeavors to support will be found to be just.

But without solving any of the questions above asserted as open and upon the law as now established, the Nebraska act is unconstitutional and invalid for the reason that the rates are so low as to leave no real compensation to the railroad, and amount therefore to a taking of property without due process of law, and to a denial to the railroads of the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees in the first of the above cases were the plaintiffs below, and are citizens of Massachusetts and stockholders of the Union Pacific Railway Company. They sued on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated. The defendants are the Union Pacific Railway Company, the St. Joseph & Grand Island Railroad Company, the Omaha & Republican Valley Railroad Company, and the Kansas City & Omaha Railroad Company—corporations of Nebraska under the control of the Union Pacific Railway Company; certain persons, citizens of Nebraska, who hold the offices, respectively, of attorney general, secretary of state, auditor of public accounts, state treasurer, and commissioner of public lands and buildings, and constitute the state board of transportation; and James C. Dahlman, Joseph W. Edgerton, and Gilbert L. Laws, citizens of Nebraska and secretaries of that board. By a supplemental bill in the same suit, certain persons, receivers of the Union Pacific Railway Company, were made defendants.

In the second case, some of the plaintiffs, appellees here, are subjects of Queen Victoria, while the others are citizens of Massachusetts. They are all stockholders of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, and have sued in that capacity on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated. The defendants are the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad Company; the Fremont, Elkhorn, & Missouri Valley Railroad Company, a Nebraska corporation, and the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, & Omaha Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Minnesota and Nebraska, both under the control of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad Company; and the above officers constituting the state board of transportation, as well as those holding the positions of secretaries of that board.

In the third case, the appellees, Henry L. Higginson and others, citizens of Massachusetts, were the plaintiffs below. They sued on behalf of themselves and all other stockholders *of the Chicago, Burlington, & [470 Quincy Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Illinois and Iowa, and whose lines west of the Missouri river are known as the Burlington & Missouri Road. The defendants are the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company, the persons composing the Nebraska state board of transportation, and the secretaries of that board.

For the sake of brevity, the Union Pacific Railway Company will be called the Union Pacific Company; the St. Joseph & Grand Island Railroad Company, the St. Joseph Company; the Omaha & Republican Valley Railroad Company, the Omaha Company; the Kansas City & Omaha Railroad Company, the Kansas City Company; the Fremont, Elkhorn, & Missouri Valley Railroad Company, the Fremont Company; the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, & Omaha Railway Company, the St. Paul Company; and the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company, the Burlington Company.

Each of these suits was brought July 28, 1893, and involves the constitutionality of an act of the legislature of Nebraska, approved by the governor April 12, 1893, and which took effect August 1, 1893. It was an act "To Regulate Railroads, to Classify Freights, to Fix Reasonable Maximum Rates to be Charged for the Transportation of Freights upon Each of the Railroads in the State of Nebraska, and to Provide Penalties for the Violation of This Act." Acts of Neb. 1893, chap. 24; Compiled Statutes of Nebraska 1893, chap. 72, art. 12. The act is referred to in the record as House Roll 33.

Prior to the enactment of that statute, the legislature passed an act to regulate railroads, prevent unjust discrimination, provide for a board of transportation, and define its duties, and repeal articles 5 and 8 of chapter 72, entitled "Railroads," of the Revised Statutes of Nebraska, and all acts and parts of acts in conflict therewith—the same being chapter 60 of the Session Laws of 1887, and now article 8 of chapter 72 of the Compiled Statutes of Nebraska of 1893. By that act the attorney general, secretary of state, auditor of public accounts, state treasurer, and commissioner of public lands *and buildings were constituted a[471 board of transportation, with power to appoint three secretaries to assist in the performance of its duties, and with authority to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers subject to its provisions and obtain from them the full and complete information necessary to enable the board to perform its duties and carry out the objects for which it was created. It was also provided that, for the purposes of the act, the board should have power to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation, and to that end could invoke the aid of any of the district courts or of the supreme court of the state; and that any court of competent jurisdiction in which such inquiry was carried on could, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any common carrier or person subject to the provisions of the act, issue an order requiring such carrier or other person to appear before the board (and produce books and papers if ordered), and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey the order was punishable by the court as for contempt. The claim that any testimony or evidence might tend to criminate the person giving evidence would not excuse the witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony could not be used against him on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

The power to enact the statute whose validity is now assailed, that is, the above statute of August 1, 1893, regulating railroads, classifying freights, fixing reasonable maximum rates, etc., in Nebraska, was referred by counsel to the general legislative power of the state as well as to the 4th section of article 11 of the state Constitution, which provides: "Railways heretofore constructed, or that may hereafter be constructed in this state, are hereby declared public highways, and shall be free to all persons for the transportation of their persons and property thereon, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law. And the legislature may from time to time pass laws establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers [472] and freight on *the different railroads in this state. The liability of railroad corporations as common carriers shall never be limited."

By the 1st section of that statute it is declared that, except as therein otherwise provided, its provisions shall apply to all railroad corporations, railroad companies, and common carriers engaged in Nebraska in the transportation of freight by railroad therein, and also to shipments of property made from any point within the state to any other point within its limits. That section provides: "The term 'railroad,' as used in this act, shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation, receiver, trustee, or other person operating a railroad whether owned or operated under contract, agreement, lease, or otherwise, and the term 'transportation' shall include all instrumentalities of shipment or carriage, and the term 'railroad corporation' contained in this act shall be deemed and taken to mean all corporations, companies, or individuals, now owning or operating, or which may hereafter own or operate, any railroad, in whole or in part, in this state, and the provisions of this act, except as in this act otherwise provided, shall apply to all persons, firms, and companies, and to all associations of persons, whether incorporated or otherwise, that shall do business as common carriers of freight upon any of the lines of railway in this state, the same as to railroad corporations herein mentioned." § 1.

The 2d section provides that all freight or property to be transported by any railroad company or companies mentioned in the 1st section, "from any point in the state of Nebraska to any other point in said state, shall be classified as hereinafter in this section provided, and any other or different classification of freight, which would raise the rates on class or commodity of freights above the rates prescribed in this act, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, is prohibited and declared to be unlawful. The classification established by this act shall be known as the 'Nebraska Classification.' Freights shall be billed at the actual weight unless otherwise directed in the classification—20,000 pounds shall *be a car [473] load, and all excessive weights shall be at the same rate per 100 pounds, except in carloads of light and bulky articles, and unless otherwise specified in the classification. When the classification makes an article 'released' or 'owner's risk,' the same at carrier's risk will be the next highest rate higher, unless otherwise provided in the classification. Articles rated first class, 'released' or owner's risk, if taken at 'carrier's risk,' will be one and one half times first class unless otherwise provided in the classification. All articles carried according to this classification at 'owner's risk' of fire, leakage, damage, or breakage must be so receipted for by agents of the railroad, and so considered by owners and shippers. Signing a release contract by a shipper shall not release the railroad company for loss or damages caused by carelessness or negligence of its employees." § 2

Following this section, in the body of the statute, are tables of the classification of freights

The 3d section is in these words: "That each of the railroads in the state of Nebraska shall charge for the transportation of freight from any point in said state to any other point in said state, no higher or greater rate of charge than is by this act fixed as the reasonable maximum rate for the distance hauled, and the reasonable maximum rates for the transportation of freight by railroad from any point in the state of Nebraska to any other point in said state are declared and established to be as hereinafter in this section fixed for the distance named, and any higher or greater rate for the distance hauled than that herein fixed and established is prohibited and declared to be unlawful; and the reasonable maximum rate herein fixed and established shall be known as the Nebraska Schedule of Reasonable Maximum Rates." § 3.

Here follow tables of the rates prescribed by the statute.

That the full scope of the act may appear, its remaining sections are given as follows:

"Sec. 4. All railroads or parts thereof which have been built in this state since the 1st day of January, 1889, or may be built before the 31st 474]day of December, 1899, shall be *exempt from the provisions of this act until the 31st day of December, 1899.

"Sec. 5. Whenever any railroad company or companies in this state shall in a proper action show by competent testimony that the schedule of rates prescribed by the act are unjust and unreasonable, such railroad or railroads shall be exempt therefrom as hereinafter provided. All such actions shall be brought before the supreme court, in the name of the railroad company or companies bringing the same, and against the state of Nebraska, and upon the hearing thereof, if the court shall become satisfied that the rates herein prescribed are unjust in so far as they relate to the railroad bringing the action, [it] may issue their [its] order directing the board of transportation to permit such railroad to raise its rates to any sum in the discretion of the board: Provided, That in no case shall the rates so raised be fixed at a higher sum than that charged by such railroad on the 1st day of January, 1893. Whenever any railroad company in this state shall claim the benefit of the provisions of this section, it shall be the duty of such railroad company to show to the court all matters pertaining to the management thereof, and if it shall appear that said railroad company is operating branch lines of railroad in connection with its main line, and all included in one system, then, in that case, it shall be the duty of the railroad company to show to the court upon which branch or branches, or upon which portion of such system, the schedule of rates prescribed in this act is unjust and unreasonable, and only such portions shall be exempted from the provisions thereof: Provided, That in no case shall a railroad company be allowed to pool the earnings of all the lines operated under one management, where more than one line is so operated, for the purpose of lowering the general average.

"Sec. 6. That the board of transportation is hereby empowered and directed to reduce the rates on any class or commodity in the schedule of rates fixed in this act, whenever it shall seem just and reasonable to a majority of said board so to reduce any rate; and said board of transportation is hereby empowered and direct-475]ed to revise said classification of *freight as hereinbefore in this act established, whenever it shall appear to a majority of said board just and reasonable to revise said classification: Provided, That said board of transportation shall never change the classification in the act established, so that by such change or classification the rates on any freight will become higher or greater than in this act fixed. When any reduction of rates or revision of classification shall be made by said board, it shall be the duty of said board to cause notice thereof to be published two successive weeks in some public newspaper, published in the city of Lincoln, in this state, which notice shall state the date of the taking effect of such change of rate or classification, and said change of rate or classification so made by the said board and published in said notice shall take effect at the time so stated in said notice.

"Sec. 7. That articles not enumerated in said classification in § 2 of this act established, not rated in said schedule of rates in § 3 of this act, shall be classed with analogous articles in said classification, and where there is any conflict between said classification and said schedule of maximum rates, said rates shall govern.

"Sec. 8. That in case any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall do, or cause to be done, or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, such common carrier shall be liable to the person or persons injured thereby, for all damages sustained in consequence of any such violation of the provisions of this act together with cost of suit and a reasonable counsel or attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court in which the same is heard on appeal or otherwise, which shall be taxed and collected as part of the costs in the case: Provided, That in all cases demand in writing on said common carrier shall be made for the money damages sustained before suit is brought for recovery under this section, and that no suit shall be brought until the expiration of fifteen days after such demand.

"Sec. 9. That in case any common carrier subject to the provisions *of this act shall[476 do, or cause to be done, or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, such common carrier shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not less than one thousand dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars for the first offense; and for the second offense not less than five thousand dollars, nor more than ten thousand dollars; and for the third offense, not less than ten thousand dollars, nor more than twenty thousand dollars; and for every subsequent offense and conviction thereof, shall be liable to a fine of twenty-five thousand dollars: Provided, That in all cases under this act either party shall have the right of trial by jury.

"Sec. 10. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are repealed."

These cases were heard at the same time, and in the one in which the Union Pacific Company, the St. Joseph Company, the Omaha Company, and the Kansas City Company were defendants, it was adjudged in the circuit court—Mr. Justice Brewer presiding—as follows: "That the said railroad companies and each and every of them, and said receivers, be perpetually enjoined and restrained from making or publishing a schedule of rates to be charged by them or any or either of them for the transportation of freight on and over their respective roads in this state from one point to another therein, whereby such rate shall be reduced to those prescribed by the act of the legislature of this state, called in the bill filed therein, 'House Roll 33,' and entitled 'An Act to Regulate Railroads, to Classify Freights, to Fix Reasonable Maximum Rates to be Charged for the Transportation of Freight upon Each of the Railroads in the State of Nebraska, and to Provide Penalties for the Violation of This Act,' approved April 12, 1893, and below those now charged by said companies or either of them or their receivers, or in any wise obeying, observing, or conforming to the provisions, commands, injunctions, and prohibitions of said alleged act; and that the board of transportation of said state and the members and sec-[477]retaries *of said board be in like manner perpetually enjoined and restrained from entertaining, hearing, or determining any complaint to it against said railroad companies or any or either of them or their receivers, for or on account of any act or thing by either of said companies or their receivers, their officers, agents, servants, or employees, done, suffered, or omitted, which may be forbidden or commanded by said alleged act, and from instituting or prosecuting or causing to be instituted or prosecuted any action or proceeding, civil or criminal, against either of said companies or their receivers for any act or thing done, suffered, or omitted, which may be forbidden or commanded by said act, and particularly from reducing its present rates of charges for transportation of freight to those prescribed in said act, and that the attorney general of this state be in like manner enjoined from bringing, aiding in bringing, or causing to be brought, any proceeding by way of injunction, mandamus, civil action, or indictment against said companies or either of them or their receivers for or on account of any action or omission on their part commanded or forbidden by the said act. And that a writ of injunction issue out of this court and under the seal thereof, directed to the said defendants, commanding, enjoining, and restraining them as hereinbefore set forth, which injunction shall be perpetual save as hereinafter provided. And it is further declared, adjudged, and decreed that the act above entitled is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, forasmuch as by the provisions of said act the said defendant railroad companies may not exact for the transportation of freight from one point to another within this state, charges which yield to the said companies, or either of them, reasonable compensation for such services. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants, members of the board of transportation of said state, may hereafter, when the circumstances have changed so that the rates fixed in the said act shall yield to the said companies reasonable compensation for the services aforesaid, apply to this court, by supplemental bill or otherwise, as they may be advised, for a further order in that behalf. It is further ordered, ad-[478]judged, and *decreed that the plaintiffs recover of the said defendants their costs to be taxed by the clerk."

The above decree was in accordance with the prayer for relief. A similar decree was rendered in each of the other cases.

The present appeals were prosecuted by the defendants constituting the state board of transportation, as well as by the defendants who are secretaries of that board.

The first question to be considered is one common to all the cases. While it was not objected at the argument that there had been any departure from the 94th equity rule, it was contended that the plaintiffs had an adequate remedy at law, and that the circuit court of the United States, sitting in equity, was therefore without jurisdiction. This objection is *based upon the 5th section of the Ne-[516]braska statute authorizing any railroad company to show, in a proper action brought in the supreme court of the state, that the rates therein prescribed are unreasonable and unjust, and, if that court found such to be the fact, to obtain an order upon the board of transportation permitting the rates to be raised to any sum in the discretion of that board, provided that in no case should they be fixed at a higher sum than was charged by the company on the 1st day of January, 1893. This section, it is contended, took from the circuit court of the United States its equity jurisdiction in respect of the rates prescribed and required the dismissal of the bills.

We cannot accept this view of the equity jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States. The adequacy or inadequacy of a remedy at law for the protection of the rights of one entitled upon any ground to invoke the powers of a Federal court is not to be conclusively determined by the statutes of the particular state in which suit may be brought. One who is entitled to sue in the Federal circuit court may invoke its jurisdiction in equity whenever the established principles and rules of equity permit such a suit in that court; and he cannot be deprived of that right by reason of his being allowed to sue at law in a state court on the same cause of action. It is true that an enlargement of equitable rights arising from the statutes of a state may be administered by the circuit courts of the United States. Case of Broderick's Will [Kieley v. McGlynn], 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 503, 520 [22:599, 606]; Holland v. Challen, 110 U. S. 15, 24 [28:52, 56]; Dick v. Foraker, 155 U. S. 404, 415 [39:201, 205]; Bardon v. Land & River Improv. Co. 157 U. S. 327, 330 [39:719, 721]; Rich v. Braxton, 158 U. S. 375, 405 [39:1022, 1032]. But if the case in its essence be one cognizable in equity, the plaintiff—the required value being in dispute—may invoke the equity powers of the proper circuit court of the United States whenever jurisdiction attaches by reason of diverse citizenship or upon any other ground of Federal jurisdiction. Payne v. Hook, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 425, 430 [19:260, 262]; McConihay v. Wright, 121 U. S. 201, 205 [30:932, 933]. A party by going into a national court does not, this court has said, lose any right or appropriate remedy of which he *might have availed[517] himself in the state courts of the same locality; that the wise policy of the Constitution gives him a choice of tribunals. Davis v. Gray, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 203, 221 [21:447, 453]; Cowley v. Northern Pacific Railroad Co. 159 U. S. 569, 583 [40:263, 267]. So, "wherever a citizen of a state can go into the courts of a state to defend his property against the illegal acts of its officers, a citizen of another state may invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to maintain a like defense. A state cannot tie up a citizen of another state, having property rights within its territory invaded by unauthorized acts of its own officers, to suits for redress in its own courts." Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (No. 1), 154 U. S. 362, 391 [38:1014, 1021, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560]; Mississippi Mills v. Cohn, 150 U. S. 202, 204 [37:1052, 1053]; Cowles v. Mercer County [Mercer County Supers. v. Cowles], 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 118 [19:86];

Lincoln County v. Luning, 133 U. S. 529 [33: 766]; Scott v. Neely, 140 U. S. 106 [35: 358]; Chicot County v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 529 [37: 546]; Cates v. Allen, 149 U. S. 451 [37: 801].

In these cases the plaintiffs, stockholders in the corporations named, ask a decree enjoining the enforcement of certain rates for transportation upon the ground that the statute prescribing them is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Under the principles which in the Federal system distinguish cases in law from those in equity, the circuit court of the United States, sitting in equity, can make a comprehensive decree covering the whole ground of controversy and thus avoid the multiplicity of suits that would inevitably arise under the statute. The carrier is made liable, not only to individual persons for every act, matter, or thing prohibited by the statute, and for every omission to do any act, matter, or thing required to be done, but to a fine of from one thousand to five thousand dollars for the first offense, from five thousand to ten thousand dollars for the second offense, from ten thousand to twenty thousand dollars for the third offense, and twenty-five thousand dollars for every subsequent offense. The transactions along the line of any one of these railroads, out of which causes of action might arise under the statute, are so numerous and varied that the interference of equity could well be justified upon the ground that a general decree, according to the prayer of the bills, would avoid a mul-[518]tiplicity *of suits, and give a remedy more certain and efficacious than could be given in any proceeding instituted against the company in a court of law; for a court of law could only deal with each separate transaction involving the rates to be charged for transportation. The transactions of a single week would expose any company questioning the validity of the statute to a vast number of suits by shippers, to say nothing of the heavy penalties named in the statute. Only a court of equity is competent to meet such an emergency and determine, once for all and without a multiplicity of suits, matters that affect, not simply individuals, but the interests of the entire community as involved in the use of a public highway and in the administration of the affairs of the quasi-public corporation by which such highway is maintained.

Another question of a preliminary character must be here noticed. The answer of the officers of the state in each case insists that the real party in interest is the state, and that these suits are, in effect, suits against the state, of which the circuit court of the United States cannot take jurisdiction, consistently with the 11th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. This point is, perhaps, covered by the general assignments of error, but it was not discussed at the bar by the representatives of the state board. It would therefore be sufficient to say that these are cases of which, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, the circuit court has jurisdiction, not only upon the ground of the diverse citizenship or alienage of the parties, but upon the further ground that, as the statute of Nebraska under which the state board of transportation proceeds is assailed as being repugnant to rights secured to the plaintiffs by the Constitution of the United States, the cases may be regarded as arising under that instrument. But to prevent misapprehension, we add that within the meaning of the 11th Amendment of the Constitution the suits are not against the state but against certain individuals charged with the administration of a state enactment, which, it is alleged, cannot be enforced without violating the constitutional rights of the plaintiffs. It is the settled doctrine of this court that a suit against individuals for *the purpose of [519] preventing them as officers of a state from enforcing an unconstitutional enactment to the injury of the rights of the plaintiff, is not a suit against the state within the meaning of that Amendment. Pennoyer v. McConnaughy, 140 U. S. 1, 10 [35: 363, 365]; Re Tyler, 149 U. S. 164, 190 [37: 689, 698]; Scott v. Donald (No. 1), 165 U. S. 58, 68 [41: 632, 633]; Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U. S. 204, 220 [42: 137, 142].

An important question is presented that relates only to the Union Pacific Company. That company is a corporation formed by the consolidation of several companies under the authority of the acts of Congress, one of the constituent companies being the Union Pacific Railroad Company incorporated by the act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. at L. 489, chap. 120). United States v. Union Pacific Railway Company, 160 U. S. 1, 6 [40: 319, 321]. Neither that company nor the Union Pacific Railroad Company is named in the Nebraska statute, but the statute is interpreted by the state board of transportation as embracing the present defendant corporation. It is contended that the state is without power to fix or limit the rates that the Union Pacific Company may charge for the transportation of freight on its lines between points within Nebraska. This contention rests: 1. Upon the provisions of the acts of Congress showing that the Union Pacific Railroad Company was created for the accomplishment of national objects, namely to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores of the United States; 2. Upon the 18th section of the above act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. at L. 489, 497, chap. 120), providing that "whenever it appears that the net earnings of the entire road and telegraph, including the amount allowed for services rendered for the United States, after deducting all expenditures, including repairs, and the furnishing, running, and managing of said road, shall exceed 10 per centum upon its cost exclusive of the 5 per centum to be paid to the United States, Congress may reduce the rates of fare thereon, if unreasonable in amount, and may fix and establish the same by law." The argument is that Congress by this enactment has reserved to itself exclusive control of rates, interstate and local, to be charged on the Union Pacific Railroad. As this view, if maintained, would require *an affirmance of the decree so far [520] as the Union Pacific Company is concerned, whether the Nebraska statute of 1893 be constitutional or not as to the other railroad corporations, it cannot properly be passed without examination.

In Reagan v. Mercantile Trust Company (No. 1), 154 U. S. 413 [38: 1028, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 575], the question arose whether the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, was subject to the laws of Texas with respect to rates for transportation wholly within that state. The ground upon which exemption from state control was there asserted by the company was that it received all its franchises from Congress, including the franchise to charge and collect tolls. This court, conceding, for the purposes of that case, that Congress had power to remove the corporation in all its operations from state control, held that the act creating it did not show an intention upon the part of Congress to exempt it from the duty to conform to such reasonable rates for local transportation as the state might prescribe, and that the enforcement by the state of reasonable rates for such transportation would not disable the corporation from performing the duties and exercising the powers imposed upon it by Congress. The court said: "By the act of incorporation Congress authorized the company to build its road through the state of Texas. It knew that, when constructed, a part of its business would be the carrying of persons and property from points within the state to other points also within the state, and that in so doing it would be engaged in a business, control of which is nowhere by the Federal Constitution given to Congress. It must have been known that, in the nature of things, the control of that business would be exercised by the state, and if it deemed that the interests of the nation and the discharge of the duties required on behalf of the nation from this corporation demanded exemption in all things from state control, it would unquestionably have expressed such intention in language whose meaning would be clear. Its silence in this respect is satisfactory assurance that, in so far as this corporation should engage in business wholly within the state, it intended that it should be 521] subjected to the ordinary control *exercised by the state over such business. Without, therefore, relying at all upon any acceptance by the railroad corporation of the act of the legislature of the state, passed in 1873 in respect to it, we are of opinion that the Texas & Pacific Railway Company is, as to business done wholly within the state, subject to the control of the state in all matters of taxation, rates, and other police regulations."

This conclusion, as may be observed from the opinion, was based in part upon the reasoning in Thomson v. Pacific Railroad Co. 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 579 [19: 792], and in Union P. Railroad Company v. Peniston, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 5 [21: 787], in which cases it was held that the property of certain railroad companies was not exempt from state taxation by reason alone of the fact that they were organized under acts of Congress for the accomplishment of national objects, and that the imposition of such taxes was not, in a constitutional sense, an obstruction to the exercise of the powers of the general government, nor an interference with the discharge of the duties required of the companies by their charters.

In the present case the question is more difficult of solution by reason of the declaration in the above act of July 1, 1862 (no similar declaration being made in the act incorporating the Texas & Pacific Railway Company), that Congress may reduce the rates of fare on the Union Pacific Railroad if unreasonable in amount, and may fix and establish the same by law whenever the net earnings of the entire road and telegraph, ascertained upon a named basis, should exceed 10 per cent upon its cost, exclusive of the 5 per cent to be paid to the United States.

Undoubtedly Congress intended by that act to reserve such power as was necessary to prevent the corporation from exacting rates that were unreasonable. But this is not equivalent to a declaration that the states through which the railroad might be constructed should not regulate rates for transportation begun and completed within their respective limits.

It cannot be doubted that the making of rates for transportation by railroad corporations along public highways, *between points[522 wholly within the limits of a state, is a subject primarily within the control of that state. And it ought not to be supposed that Congress intended that, so long as it forbore to establish rates on the Union Pacific Railroad, the corporation itself could fix such rates for transportation as it saw proper independently of the right of the states through which the road was constructed to prescribe regulations for transportation beginning and ending within their respective limits. On the contrary, the better interpretation of the act of July 1, 1862, is that the question of rates for wholly local business was left under the control of the respective states through which the Union Pacific Railroad might pass, with power reserved to Congress to intervene under certain circumstances and fix the rates that the corporation could reasonably charge and collect. Congress not having exerted this power, we do not think that the national character of the corporation constructing the Union Pacific Railroad stands in the way of a state prescribing rates for transporting property on that road wholly between points within its territory. Until Congress, in the exercise either of the power specifically reserved by the 18th section of the act of 1862 or its power under the general reservation made of authority to add to, alter, amend, or repeal that act, prescribes rates to be charged by the railroad company, it remains with the states through which the road passes to fix rates for transportation beginning and ending within their respective limits.

We are now to inquire whether the Nebraska statute is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

By the 14th Amendment it is provided that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. That corporations are persons within the meaning of this Amendment is now settled. Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co. 118 U. S. 394, 396 [30: 118]; Charlotte, C. & A. Railroad v. Gibbes, 142 U. S. 386, 391 [35: 1051, 1054]; Gulf, Colorado, & Santa Fé Ry. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 154 [41: 666, 668]. What amounts to deprivation of property without due process of law, or what is a denial of the equal *protec- [523 tion of the laws, is often difficult to determine, especially where the question relates to the property of a quasi-public corporation and the extent to which it may be subjected to public control. But this court, speaking by Chief Justice Waite, has said that, while a state has power to fix the charges by railroad companies for the transportation of persons and property within its own jurisdiction, unless restrained by valid contract, or unless what is done amounts to a regulation of foreign or interstate commerce, such power is not without limit; and that, "under pretense of regulating fares and freights, the state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or without due process of law." Railroad Commission Cases [Stone v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co.], 116 U. S. 307, 325, 331 [29: 636, 642, 644]. This principle was recognized in Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680, 689 [31: 841, 844, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 56], and has been reaffirmed in other cases. In Georgia R. & Banking Company v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174, 179 [32: 377, 380], it was said that the power of the state to prescribe the charges of a railroad company for the carriage of persons and merchandise within its limits—in the absence of any provision in the charter of the company constituting a contract vesting it with authority over those matters—was "subject to the limitation that the carriage is not required without reward, or upon conditions amounting to the taking of property for public use without just compensation; and that what is done does not amount to a regulation of foreign or interstate commerce." In Chicago, M. & St. Paul Railway Co. v. Minnesota [Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota Railroad & W. Commission], 134 U. S. 418, 458 [33: 970, 982, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209], it was said: "If the company is deprived of the power of charging reasonable rates for the use of its property, and such deprivation takes place in the absence of an investigation by judicial machinery, it is deprived of the lawful use of its property, and thus, in substance and effect, of the property itself, without due process of law and in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and in so far as it is thus deprived, while other persons are permitted to receive reasonable profits upon their invested capital, the company is deprived of the 524]equal protection of the laws." In Chicago & G. T. Railway Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339, 344 [36: 176, 179], the court, in answer to the suggestion that the legislature had no authority to prescribe maximum rates for railroad transportation, said that "the legislature has power to fix rates, and the extent of judicial interference is protection against unreasonable rates." In Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517 [36: 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45], the court, while sustaining the power of New York by statute to regulate charges to be exacted at grain elevators and warehouses in that state, took care to state, as a result of former decisions, that such power was not one "to destroy or a power to compel the doing of the services without reward, or to take private property for public use without just compensation or without due process of law."

In Reagan v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. (No. 1) 154 U. S. 362, 399 [38: 1014, 1024, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560], which involved the validity of certain rates for freights and passengers prescribed by a railroad commission established by an act of the legislature of Texas, this court, after referring to the above cases, said: "These cases all support the proposition that while it is not the province of the courts to enter upon the merely administrative duty of framing a tariff of rates for carriage, it is within the scope of judicial power and a part of judicial duty to restrain anything which, in the form of a regulation of rates, operates to deny to the owners of property invested in the business of transportation that equal protection which is the constitutional right of all owners of other property. There is nothing new or strange in this. It has always been a part of the judicial function to determine whether the act of one party (whether that party be a single individual, an organized body, or the public as a whole) operates to devest the other party of any rights of person or property. In every Constitution is the guaranty against the taking of private property for public purposes without just compensation. The equal protection of the laws which, by the 14th Amendment, no state can deny to the individual, forbids legislation, in whatever form it may be enacted, by which the property of one individual is, without compensation, wrested from him for the benefit of another, or of the public. This, as has been often ob[525 served, is a government of law, and not a government of men, and it must never be forgotten that under such a government, with its constitutional limitations and guaranties, the forms of law and the machinery of government, with all their reach and power, must in their actual workings stop on the hither side of the unnecessary and uncompensated taking or destruction of any private property, legally acquired and legally held. It was, therefore, within the competency of the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Texas, at the instance of the plaintiff, a citizen of another state, to enter upon an inquiry as to the reasonableness and justice of the rates prescribed by the railroad commission. Indeed, it was in so doing only exercising a power expressly named in the act creating the commission."

So, in St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S. 649, 657 [39: 567, 570], it was said that "there is a remedy in the courts for relief against legislation establishing a tariff of rates which is so unreasonable as to practically destroy the value of property of companies engaged in the carrying business, and that especially may the courts of the United States treat such a question as a judicial one, and hold such acts of legislation to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, as depriving the companies of their property without due process of law, and as depriving them of the equal protection of the laws." In Covington & Lexington Turnpike Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578, 584, 594, 595, 597 [41: 560, 562, 566, 567], which involved the validity of a state enactment prescribing rates of toll on a turnpike road, the court said: "A statute which, by its necessary operation, compels a turnpike company, when charging only such tolls as are just to the public, to submit to such further reduction of rates as will prevent it from keeping its road in proper repair and from earning any dividends whatever for stockholders, is as obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States as would be a similar statute relating to the business of a railroad corporation having authority, under its charter, to collect and receive tolls for passengers and 526]freight." *And in Chicago, Burlington, & Q. Railroad Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 241 [41: 979, 986], it was held that "a judgment of a state court, even if it be authorized by statute, whereby private property is taken by the state or under its direction for public use, without compensation made or secured to the owner, is, upon principle and authority, wanting in the due process of law required by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and the affirmance of such judgment by the highest court of the state is a denial by that state of a right secured to the owner by that instrument."

In view of the adjudications these principles must be regarded as settled.

1. A railroad corporation is a person within the meaning of the 14th Amendment declaring that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

2. A state enactment, or regulations made under the authority of a state enactment, establishing rates for the transportation of persons or property by railroad that will not admit of the carrier earning such compensation as under all the circumstances is just to it and to the public, would deprive such carrier of its property without due process of law, and deny to it the equal protection of the laws, and would therefore be repugnant to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

3. While rates for the transportation of persons and property within the limits of a state are primarily for its determination, the question whether they are so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation as the Constitution secures, and therefore without due process of law, can not be so conclusively determined by the legislature of the state, or by regulations adopted under its authority, that the matter may not become the subject of judicial inquiry.

The cases before us directly present the important question last stated.

Before entering upon its examination, it may be observed that the grant to the legislature in 527] the Constitution of *Nebraska of the power to establish maximum rates for the transportation of passengers and freight on railroads in that state has reference to "reasonable" maximum rates. These words strongly imply that it was not intended to give a power to fix maximum rates without regard to their reasonableness. Be this as it may, it cannot be admitted that the power granted may be exerted in derogation of rights secured by the Constitution of the United States, or that the judiciary may not, when its jurisdiction is properly invoked, protect those rights.

What are the considerations to which weight must be given when we seek to ascertain the compensation that a railroad company is entitled to receive, and a prohibition upon the receiving of which may be fairly deemed a deprivation by legislative decree of property without due process of law? Undoubtedly that question could be more easily determined by a commission composed of persons whose special skill, observation, and experience qualify them to so handle great problems of transportation as to do justice both to the public and to those whose money has been used to construct and maintain highways for the convenience and benefit of the people. But, despite the difficulties that confessedly attend the proper solution of such questions, the court cannot shrink from the duty to determine whether it be true, as alleged, that the Nebraska statute invades or destroys rights secured by the supreme law of the land. No one, we take it, will contend that a state enactment is in harmony with that law simply because the legislature of the state has declared such to be the case; for that would make the state legislature the final judge of the validity of its enactment, although the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof are the supreme law of the land, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding. Art. 6. The idea that any legislature, state or Federal, can conclusively determine for the people and for the courts that what it enacts in the form of law, or what it authorizes its agents to do, is consistent with the fundamental law, is in opposition to the theory of our institutions. The duty rests upon all courts, Federal and state, when their *jurisdiction is[528 properly invoked, to see to it that no right secured by the supreme law of the land is impaired or destroyed by legislation. This function and duty of the judiciary distinguishes the American system from all other systems of government. The perpetuity of our institutions and the liberty which is enjoyed under them depend, in no small degree, upon the power given the judiciary to declare null and void all legislation that is clearly repugnant to the supreme law of the land.

We turn now to the evidence in the voluminous record before us for the purpose of ascertaining whether—looking at the cases in the light of the facts as they existed when the decrees were rendered—the Nebraska statute, if enforced, would, by its necessary operation, have deprived the companies, whose stockholders and bondholders here complain, of the right to obtain just compensation for the services rendered by them.

The first and most important contention of the plaintiffs is that, if the statute had been in force during any one of the three years preceding its passage, the defendant companies would have been compelled to use their property for the public substantially without reward or without the just compensation to which it was entitled. We think this mode of calculation for ascertaining the probable effect of the Nebraska statute upon the railroad companies in question is one that may be properly used.

The conclusion reached by the circuit court was that the reduction made by the Nebraska statute in the rates for local freight was so unjust and unreasonable as to require a decree staying the enforcement of such rates against the companies named in the bill. Ames v. Union Pacific Ry. Co. 64 Fed. Rep. 165, 189.

That conclusion was based largely upon the figures presented by Mr. Dilworth, while he was secretary of the state board of transportation, as well as a defendant and one of the solicitors of the defendants in these causes. He was a principal witness for the board. His general fairness and his competency to speak of the facts upon which the question before us depends are apparent on the record. He stated that the average reduction made by the statute on all the "commodities of local 529]rates" was 29.50 per cent; and this *estimate seems to have been accepted by the parties as correct. He estimated that the percentage of operating expenses on local business would exceed the percentage of operating expenses on all business by at least 10 per cent, and that it might go as high as 20 per cent, or higher. And this view is more than sustained by the evidence of witnesses possessing special knowledge of railroad transportation and of the cost of doing local business as compared with what is called through business. Indeed, one of those witnesses states that the cost of carrying local freight is four times as much as the cost of through freight per ton per mile; another, that the cost of the short haul is "reasonably double the long haul." If due regard he had to the testimony—and we have no other basis for our judgment—we are not permitted to place 530]*the extra cost of local business at less than 10 per cent greater than the percentage of the cost of all business.

In answer to questions propounded to him by the defendants constituting the state board of transportation, Mr. Dilworth stated that he had prepared himself with an estimate showing the number of tons of freight, commonly spoken of as local freight, hauled on the respective railways in Nebraska, and the amount received by the railway companies by way of tariff on tons of freight hauled, including through as well as local freight, and was qualified to speak as to the amount received by the companies for both passengers and freight within the state, and the deduction that would take place in rates under the statute in question. He presented various tables showing the results of his investigations. One is known as Exhibit 4, and is an "Estimate of Local Business, and the effect of House Roll 33" on the Burlington, St. Paul, Fremont, Union Pacific, Omaha, St. Joseph, and Kansas City Companies for the year 1892. Another is called Exhibit 19, and is a like estimate in respect of the same companies for the years 1891 and 1893. Another is known as Exhibit 20, and shows "Tons carried, Tonnage per Mile, and Percentage of Expenses for the years ending June 30, 1891, 1892, and 1893 (Nebraska.)" These exhibits are as follows:

533] *It may be here stated that the words in these exhibits, "number of tons hauled locally," refer to freight that started and ended in the state; the words in Exhibit 4, "amount received for freight hauled in Nebraska, including through and local," and the like words in Exhibit 19, refer, not only to freight starting and ending in the state, but to all freight hauled by the railroad company in Nebraska, regardless of its destination or origin—that is, "freight that begins in the state and goes out of the state, freight that begins out of the state and comes into the state, and freight which begins and ends in the state." The words, "per cent of reduction on all the business done in the state by House Roll 33," in Exhibits 4 and 19, mean the percentage of the total amount of all business, passenger and freight, done in the state, whatever its origin or destination, and do not indicate the percentage of reduction on local business when considered alone. It should be stated also that the words, "percentage of expenses to earnings," in Exhibit 20, refer to all business, through and local, done by the railroad company within the state. Mr. Dilworth, as we have seen, testified that if the local business alone were considered, the percentage of expenses to earnings upon such business would be at least 10 per cent more than the general percentage of expenses to earnings on all business, both through and local. It is important here to note that his estimates are of business from July 1 to the succeeding June 30. So that when allusion is made presently to his estimates for 1891, 1892, and 1893, it will be understood to refer to the years ending the 30th days of June, 1891, 1892, and 1893 respectively.

From July 1, 1890, to June 30, 1891, as shown by Exhibit 20, the percentage of expenses to earnings on all business on the Burlington road was 66.24; on the St. Paul road, 70.78; on the Fremont road, 49.87; on the Union Pacific road, 68 94; on the Omaha road, 120.26; on the St. Joseph road, 96.44; and on the Kansas City road, 99.54.

From July 1, 1891, to June 30, 1892, as shown by the same Exhibit the percentage of expenses to earnings on all business on the Burlington road was 64.23; on the St. Paul *road, 65.96; on the Fremont road, 70.71; [534 on the Union Pacific road, 56.44; on the Omaha road, 93.12; on the St. Joseph road, 74.23; and on the Kansas City road, 75.19; and.

From July 1, 1892, to June 30, 1893, as shown by the same Exhibit, the percentage of expenses to earnings on all business on the Burlington road was 65.51; on the St. Paul road, 64.58; on the Fremont road, 53.66; on the Union Pacific road, 58.51; on the Omaha road, 94.14; on the St. Joseph road, 62.05; and on the Kansas City road, 76.50.

In view of the reduction of 29.50 in rates prescribed by the statute and of the extra cost of doing local business, as compared with other business, what do these facts show?

Take the case of the Burlington road from July 1, 1890, to June 30, 1891. Looking at the entire business done on it during that period within the limits of the state, we find that the percentage of operating expenses to earnings on all business—which, as stated, does not include the extra cost of local business—was 66.24. Add to this the extra cost of local business estimated at least 10 per cent, and the result is that, under the rates charged during the period stated, the cost to the Burlington Company of earning $100 would have been $76.24. Now, if the reduction of 29¼ per cent made by the act of 1893 had been in force prior to July 1, 1891, the company would have received $70.50 as against $100 for the same services, showing that in that year the operating expenses would have exceeded the earnings by $5.74 in every $100 of the amount actually received by it.

By like calculations, it will appear that each of the railroad companies would have conducted their local business at a loss during the periods stated, except that in the year ending June 30, 1891, and in the year ending June 30, 1893, the earnings of the Fremont Company, and in the years ending the 30th days of June, 1892 and 1893, respectively, the earnings of the Union Pacific Company, would have slightly exceeded their operating expenses.

Under the rates prescribed by the act of 1893 the cost to the respective companies of local business in Nebraska would have exceeded the earnings for the years ending June *30, [535 1891, 1892, and 1893, respectively, in every $100 of the amount actually received, as follows: To the Burlington Company, by $5.74, $3.73, and $5.01; to the St. Paul Company, by $10.28, $5.46, and $4.08; to the Omaha Company, $59.76, $32.62, and $33.64; to the St. Joseph Company, by $35.94, $13.73, and $1.55; and to the Kansas City Company, by $39.04, $14.69, and $16. The cost to the Union Pacific Company for the year ending June 30, 1891, of its local business, under the rates prescribed by the statute of 1893, would have caused a loss of $3.44 in every $100 of the amount actually received.

In order to show these results at a glance the following table is inserted upon the basis of one hundred as representing the amounts actually charged and received by the respective railroad companies for the years given:

There are other views of the case suggested by the above exhibits and table which show the same results.

In the year ending June 30, 1891, under the rates then in force, the Burlington Company received $1,066,871 for tons carried locally. If the business had been done under the rates prescribed by the act of 1893, it would have received 29¼ per cent less, that is, only $752,145 or $314, 726 less than it did receive. The percentage of expenses to earnings, including the extra cost of local business, was 76.24; that is, it cost $813,382 to earn $1,066,871. So that the difference between $813,382 and $752,145 shows that, if the rates prescribed by the statute of 1893 had been in force during the year ending June 30, 1891, the amount received would have been less than the operating expenses of the Burlington Company by $61,237.

During the year ending June 30, 1892, the same company received for tons carried locally $1,237,884. If the act of 1893 had been in force, it would have received, because of the reduced rates prescribed by that act, only $872,709—less by $365,175 than it did receive. The percentage of expenses to earnings, including the extra cost of local business, was 74.23; that is, the $872,709 would have been earned at a cost of $918,881. So that under the rates prescribed by the act of 1893 the loss during the period named would have been $46,172.

During the year ending June 30, 1893, that company received $1,242,416 for tons carried locally; whereas, under the 29¼ per cent reduction prescribed by the statute of that year, it would have received only $875,905, that is, less by $366,512 than it did receive. The percentage of its expenses to earnings in that year, including the extra cost of local business, was 75.51; that is, under the statutory rates $875,905 would have been earned at a cost of $938, 147, which would have been a loss of $62,243.

*By the same mode of calculation, it [537 will be found that if the statute of 1893 had been enforced during the years ending the 30th days of June, 1891, 1892, and 1893, respectively, the other companies would have lost, that is, their expenses would have exceeded their earnings during those years by, the following amounts: The St. Paul Company, $11,403, $6,716, and $5,814; the Fremont Company, $34,377 for the year ending June 30, 1892; the Union Pacific Company, $23,480, for the year ending June 30, 1891; the Omaha Company, $45,166, $28,813, and $27,085; the St. Joseph Company, $7,840, $4,256, and $523; and the Kansas City Company, $2,627, $974, and $1,510; while the earnings of the Union Pacific Company would have exceeded its expenses for the years ending the 30th days of June, 1892 and 1893 respectively by $16,170 and $8,234; and those of the Fremont Company by $37,037 and $29,036 for the years ending the 30th days of June, 1891 and 1893 respectively.

These results will be seen in the following table, based upon the above exhibits, and assuming that 10 per cent was the very lowest amount of the extra cost of business beginning and ending in the state:

Counsel for the appellants contend that the railroad companies in Nebraska derived a profit from their local tonnage of nearly 100 per cent over and above operating expenses. This contention is based upon the evidence given by William Randall, freight and ticket agent as well as auditor of the Burlington road in Nebraska, on his first examination as a witness. He then stated that the earnings of the company for the year 1892—meaning for the year beginning January 1, 1892,—upon freight starting and ending within the state were $1,853,036.59, and that the operating expenses, including taxes, on that business were $972,183.70. These figures, counsel say, show that "there was a clear profit over operating expenses, including taxes, of nearly one hundred per cent on the local business of the Burlington Company in 1892." But counsel overlook the fact that, upon his second examination, Mr. Randall stated that his first figures were not correct, and that the operating expenses on local 539] business in 1892* were $1,221,748.84, and not $972,183.70. This agrees with the figures given by Mr. Taylor, another auditor of the Burlington Company. Now, if the act of 1893 had been in force during 1892, the earnings in the latter year, $1,853,036.59, would have been reduced by 29½ per cent, that is, by $546,645.79, leaving $1,306,390.80 as the total receipts on local business, which, after deducting operating expenses, $1,221,742.84, would leave a profit of $84,567.97. If, as counsel for appellees contend, 10 per cent be added as the extra cost of local business, the result would show an actual loss on that business during the whole of 1892. But if that mode of calculation be not adopted, the utmost that can be said to be established by the evidence of Taylor and Randall would be that if the rates fixed by the act of 1893 had been in force during 1892, the company would have received on local business, in the latter year, $84,647.96 over and above operating expenses, or a little over 6 per cent of the amount of those expenses. The difference between the figures of Dilworth and Taylor and Randall, as to the earnings of the Burlington Company, arises, so far as we can perceive, from the fact that their calculations cover different periods. Dilworth gave the earnings from July 1, 1891, to June 30, 1892, and speaks of them as the earnings of 1892, while Taylor and Randall gave the earnings from January 1, 1892, to December 31, 1892. There may have been an unusual amount of business during the last six months of 1892 embraced in the estimates of Taylor and Randall, and not embraced by Dilworth's estimates. We cannot, therefore, say that the testimony of Taylor and Randall overthrows the estimates of Dilworth.

It is said by the appellants that the local rates established by the Nebraska statute are much higher than in the state of Iowa, and that fact shows that the Nebraska rates are reasonable. This contention was thus met by the circuit court: "It is, however, urged by the defendants that, in the general tariffs of these companies, there is an inequality; that the rates in Nebraska are higher than those in adjoining states; and that the reduction by House Roll 33 simply establishes an equality between Nebraska 540] and the other states through *which the roads run. The question is asked, Are not the people of Nebraska entitled to as cheap rates as the people of Iowa? Of course, relatively they are. That is, the roads may not discriminate against the people of any one state. . . . [But they are not necessarily bound to give absolutely the same rates to the people of all the states], for the kind and amount of business, and the cost thereof, are factors which determine largely the question of rates, and these vary in the several states. The volume of business in one state may be greater per mile, while the cost of construction and of maintenance is less. Hence, to enforce the same rates in both states might result in one great injustice, while in the other it would only be reasonable and fair. Comparisons, therefore, between the rates of two states, are of little value, unless all of the elements that enter into the problem are presented. It may be true, as testified by some of the witnesses, that the existing local rates in Nebraska are 40 per cent higher than similar rates in the state of Iowa. But it is also true that the mileage earnings in Iowa are greater than in Nebraska. In Iowa there are 230 people to each mile of railroad, while in Nebraska there are but 190; and, as a general rule, the more people there are the more business there is. Hence, a mere difference between the rates in two states is of comparatively little significance." 64 Fed. Rep. 165. In these views we concur, and it is unnecessary to add anything to what was said by the circuit court on this point.

It is further said, in behalf of the appellants, that the reasonableness of the rates established by the Nebraska statute is not to be determined by the inquiry whether such rates would leave a reasonable net profit from the local business affected thereby, but that the court should take into consideration, among other things, the whole business of the company, that is, all its business, passenger and freight, interstate and domestic. If it be found upon investigation that the profits derived by a railroad company from its interstate business alone are sufficient to cover operating expenses on its entire line, and also to meet interest, and justify a liberal dividend upon its stock, may the legislature 541] prescribe rates for domestic *business that would bring no reward and be less than the services rendered are reasonably worth? Or, must the rates for such transportation as begins and ends in the state be established with reference solely to the amount of business done by the carrier wholly within such state, to the cost of doing such local business, and to the fair value of the property used in conducting it, without taking into consideration the amount and cost of its interstate business, and the value of the property employed in it? If we do not misapprehend counsel, their argument leads to the conclusion that the state of Nebraska could legally require local freight business to be conducted even at an actual loss, if the company earned on its interstate business enough to give it just compensation in respect of its entire line and all its business, interstate and domestic. We cannot concur in this view. In our judgment, it must be held that the reasonableness or unreasonableness of rates prescribed by a state for the transportation of persons and property wholly within its limits must be determined without reference to the interstate business done by the carrier, or to the profits derived from it. The state cannot justify unreasonably low rates for domestic transportation, considered alone, upon the ground that the carrier is earning large profits on its interstate business, over which, so far as rates are concerned, the state has no control. Nor can the carrier justify unreasonably high rates on domestic business upon the ground that it will be able only in that way to meet losses on its interstate business. So far as rates of transportation are concerned, domestic business should not be made to bear the losses on interstate business, nor the latter the losses on domestic business. It is only rates for the transportation of persons and property between points within the state that the state can prescribe; and when it undertakes to prescribe rates not to be exceeded by the carrier, it must do so with reference exclusively to what is just and reasonable, as between the carrier and the public, in respect of domestic business. The argument that a railroad line is an entirety; that its income goes into, and its expenses are provided for out of, a common fund; and that its capitalization is on its entire line, within and without *the state,—can have no ap- [542 plication where the state is without authority over rates on its entire line, and can only deal with local rates and make such regulations as are necessary to give just compensation on local business.

Touching the suggestion that the reduction on rates made by the state law was reasonable, if regard be had to all the business, through and local, done in the state by the railroad companies, the circuit court said:

"But again, as Mr. Dilworth testified, the average reduction on local rates caused by House Roll 33 is 29½ per cent. The tariff which was in force at the time of the passage of this act had been for some three or more years fixed by the voluntary action of the railroad companies, and the reduction of 29½ per cent was from its rates. It must be remembered that these roads are competing roads; that competition tends to a reduction of rates, sometimes, as the history of the country has shown, below that which affords any remuneration to those who own the property. Can it be possible that any business so carried on can suffer a reduction of 29½ per cent in its receipts without ruin? What would any business man, engaged in any business of a private character, think of a compulsory reduction of his receipts to the amount of 29½ per cent? The effect of this testimony is not destroyed by the table offered of the percentage of reduction on the total amount of business done by these companies in the state, as follows:

B. & M. R.....4.2 per cent.
C., St. P., M. & O.....4.5 per cent.
F., E. & M. V.....4.1 per cent.
Union Pacific.....2.0 per cent.
O. & R. V.....1.9 per cent.
St. J. & G. I.....2.7 per cent.
K. C. & O.....1.5 per cent.

"For such a table only indicates, as is further shown by defendants' Exhibit 4, how small a proportion of the total amount of business done in the state comes from purely local freight. Nor is it weakened by any comparison between the amount of reduction and the total receipts 543] from all business. *It may be as stated by counsel, that the annual earnings of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Company are $27,916,128, and that the total amount of reduction caused by this House Roll 33 is only $365,175. It may be that the capital stock of the company is $76,407,500, and that $365,175 distributed among the stockholders may not be, for any of them, a great sum; but the entire earnings of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy are more than 20 times the receipts from local freight in Nebraska, and to reduce such earnings by 20 times $365,175 would make a startling difference in their amount. The fact that the state of Nebraska can reach only one twentieth of the total earnings gives it no greater right to make a reduction in respect to that one twentieth than it would have, had it the power over the total earnings, and attempted in them a like per cent of reduction. If it would be unreasonable to reduce the total earnings of these roads 29½ per cent, it is, prima facie at least, equally unreasonable to so reduce any single fractional part of such earnings."

It appears, from what has been said, that if the rates prescribed by the act of 1893 had been in force during the years ending June 30, 1891, 1892, and 1893, the Fremont Company, in the years ending June 30, 1891, and June 30, 1893, and the Union Pacific Company, in the years ending June 30, 1892, and June 30, 1893, would each have received more than enough to pay operating expenses. Do those facts affect the general conclusion as to the probable effect of the act of 1893? In the discussion of this question, the plaintiffs contended that a railroad company is entitled to exact such charges for transportation as will enable it, at all times, not only to pay operating expenses, but also to meet the interest regularly accruing upon all its outstanding obligations, and justify a dividend upon all its stock; and that to prohibit it from maintaining rates or charges for transportation adequate to all those ends will deprive it of its property without due process of law, and deny to it the equal protection of the laws. This contention was the subject of elaborate discussion; and, as it bears upon each case in its important aspects, it should not be passed without examination.

544] *In our opinion, the broad proposition advanced by counsel involves some misconception of the relations between the public and a railroad corporation. It is unsound in that it practically excludes from consideration the fair value of the property used, omits altogether any consideration of the right of the public to be exempt from unreasonable exactions, and makes the interests of the corporation maintaining a public highway the sole test in determining whether the rates established by or for it are such as may be rightfully prescribed as between it and the public. A railroad is a public highway, and none the less so because constructed and maintained through the agency of a corporation deriving its existence and powers from the state. Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the state. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public. It is under governmental control, though such control must be exercised with due regard to the guaranties for the protection of its property. Olcott v. Fond du Lac County Supervisors, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 678, 694 [21: 382, 388]; Sinking Fund Cases [Union P. R. Co. v. United States], 99 U. S. 700, 719 [25: 496, 501]; Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kansas Railway Co. 135 U. S. 641, 657 [34: 295, 302]. It cannot, therefore, be admitted that a railroad corporation maintaining a highway under the authority of the state may fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests, and ignore the rights of the public. But the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad are exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public or the fair value of the services rendered, but in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to stockholders.

If a railroad corporation has bonded its property for an amount that exceeds its fair value, or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose upon the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required for the purpose of realizing profits upon such excessive valuation or fictitious capitalization; and the apparent value of the property and franchises used by the corporation, as represented by its *stocks, bonds, and obligations, is [545 not alone to be considered when determining the rates that may be reasonably charged. What was said in Covington & L. Turnpike Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578, 596, 597 [41: 560, 566, 567], is pertinent to the question under consideration. It was there observed: "It cannot be said that a corporation is entitled, as of right, and without reference to the interests of the public, to realize a given per cent upon its capital stock. When the question arises whether the legislature has exceeded its constitutional power in prescribing rates to be charged by a corporation controlling a public highway, stockholders are not the only persons whose rights or interests are to be considered. The rights of the public are not to be ignored. It is alleged here that the rates prescribed are unreasonable and unjust to the company and its stockholders. But that involves an inquiry as to what is reasonable and just for the public. . . . The public cannot properly be subjected to unreasonable rates in order simply that stockholders may earn dividends. The legislature has the authority, in every case where its power has not been restrained by contract, to proceed upon the ground that the public may not rightfully be required to submit to unreasonable exactions for the use of a public highway established and maintained under legislative authority. If a corporation cannot maintain such a highway and earn dividends for stockholders, it is a misfortune for it and them which the Constitution does not require to be remedied by imposing unjust burdens upon the public. So that the right of the public to use the defendant's turnpike upon payment of such tolls as in view of the nature and value of the service rendered by the company are reasonable is an element in the general inquiry whether the rates established by law are unjust and unreasonable."

A corporation maintaining a public highway, although it owns the property it employs for accomplishing public objects, must be held to have accepted its rights, privileges, and franchises subject to the condition that the government creating it, or the government within whose limits it conducts its business, may by legislation protect the people against unreason-546]able *charges for the services rendered by it. It cannot be assumed that any railroad corporation, accepting franchises, rights, and privileges at the hands of the public, ever supposed that it acquired, or that it was intended to grant to it, the power to construct and maintain a public highway simply for its benefit, without regard to the rights of the public. But it is equally true that the corporation performing such public services and the people financially interested in its business and affairs, have rights that may not be invaded by legislative enactment in disregard of the fundamental guaranties for the protection of property. The corporation may not be required to use its property for the benefit of the public without receiving just compensation for the services rendered by it. How such compensation may be ascertained, and what are the necessary elements in such an inquiry, will always be an embarrassing question. As said in the case last cited: "Each case must depend upon its special facts; and when a court, without assuming itself to prescribe rates, is required to determine whether the rates prescribed by the legislature for a corporation controlling a public highway are, as an entirety, so unjust as to destroy the value of its property for all the purposes for which it was acquired, its duty is to take into consideration the interests both of the public and of the owner of the property, together with all other circumstances that are fairly to be considered in determining whether the legislature has, under the guise of regulating rates, exceeded its constitutional authority, and practically deprived the owner of property without due process of law. . . . The utmost that any corporation, operating a public highway, can rightfully demand at the hands of the legislature when exerting its general powers is that it receive what, under all the circumstances, is such compensation for the use of its property as will be just both to it and to the public."

We hold, however, that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public. And, in order to ascer-547]tain that value, the *original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. We do not say that there may not be other matters to be regarded in estimating the value of the property. What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth. But even upon this basis, and determining the probable effect of the act of 1893 by ascertaining what could have been its effect if it had been in operation during the three years immediately preceding its passage, we perceive no ground on the record for reversing the decree of the circuit court. On the contrary, we are of opinion that as to most of the companies in question there would have been, under such rates as were established by the act of 1893, an actual loss in each of the years ending June 30, 1891, 1892, and 1893; and that, in the exceptional cases above stated, when two of the companies would have earned something above operating expenses, in particular years, the receipts or gains, above operating expenses, would have been too small to affect the general conclusion that the act, if enforced, would have deprived each of the railroad companies involved in these suits of the just compensation secured to them by the Constitution. Under the evidence there is no ground for saying that the operating expenses of any of the companies were greater than necessary.

In concluding this opinion, it may not be inappropriate to say that the conclusions reached by us as to the effect of the Nebraska statute find some support in the report of the board of secretaries of the Nebraska board of transportation made in September, 1891, to the board itself, and signed by Mr. Dilworth *and [548 his colleagues. That report was made pursuant to a resolution of the board requiring the secretaries to prepare a statement of facts in reference to the rates of transportation in Nebraska. It contains a brief history of what it characterizes as "the controversy on the question of freight rates between the people and the railroads of the state," and embodies such facts, figures, and arguments as the secretaries gathered from both sides. The report says: "The present controversy between the people and the railroads of this state originally grew out of the question, not of rates or reduction of rates, but of control. The people, recognizing the railroads as common carriers, not entitled under the state Constitution to the same broad liberty of action in business that the individual citizen has, wanted to control the roads. The roads, impatient of interference, wanted to control themselves and manage the business in their own way." It further states: "We have given you in the foregoing a brief history of the rate matter as we have found it, and from that history and from the evidence and reports on file in our office we beg leave to submit in conclusion the following findings of fact: First, we find, from the evidence and sworn statements and reports on file in our office, and from personal inspection, that the railroads in this state could not be duplicated for a less sum than $30,000 per mile, taking into consideration their equipments and depot and terminal facilities." Here follow a mass of figures and calculations, and the report concludes: "We further find that the railroads are not in a condition to stand, nor do their earnings, figured on a basis cost of $30,000 per mile and not what they claim they cost, justify any cut in local rates of this state at the present time; and further, that a reduction in the local rates in this state would increase the through rates to market for our grain and would be a blow at the industry of the state. This last finding is fully established by the fact that the board of transportation reduced the local rates on hard coal 60 per cent. and yet the price to the consumer was not lowered nor the price at the mines raised, which shows conclusively that the through rates must have been raised. In submitting this report we have presented the [549] facts *and figures as we find them from evidence obtainable from sworn reports now on file in our office. And we would respectfully recommend that no action be taken that will in any way jeopardize the interests of the producers of Nebraska, but that all interests be protected in the fullest manner possible, as provided by the foregoing findings."

To this report of the secretaries is appended the "Findings of the Board," from which we make this extract: "After a careful and quite thorough investigation of the question of freight rates in Nebraska, which has occupied much time, and has taken a wide range, the state board of transportation has arrived at the conclusion that the rates now in force in this state cannot be generally reduced without doing violence to the business interests of the state, and at the same time injuring the shipping and producing classes. We have come to this conclusion, not by taking the cost of construction and equipments, nor the amount of stock and bonds issued per mile, but by making our computations upon the basis of what it would cost to duplicate the property at the present time. It has been our endeavor to deal fairly and justly with the question, and in arriving at a conclusion we have been governed only by the evidence, statements, and facts produced for our consideration. A candid examination and comparison of the figures presented to us in the unanimous report of the board of secretaries, in the opinion of this board, fully justifies the conclusion reached: That a general reduction of rates, as now in force over the state, is not practical at this time."

So that we have the judgment of the state board of transportation, as constituted in 1891, that a general reduction of rates could not then have been made without injury to the business of the state, to say nothing of the interests of those whose means were invested in railroad property. We are unable to find from the record before us that the situation in Nebraska had so changed in 1893 as to justify that being done in that year which it was not safe or just to do in 1891.

But it may be added that the conditions of business, so far as railroad corporations are concerned, have probably changed *for [550 the better since the decree below, and that the rates prescribed by the statute of 1893 may now afford all the compensation to which the railroad companies in Nebraska are entitled as between them and the public. In anticipation, perhaps, of such a change of circumstances, and the exceptional character of the litigation, the circuit court wisely provided in its final decree that the defendants, members of the board of transportation, might, "when the circumstances have changed so that the rates fixed in the said act of 1893 shall yield to the said companies reasonable compensation for the services aforesaid," apply to the court, by bill or otherwise, as they might be advised, for a further order in that behalf. Of this provision of the final decree the state board of transportation, if so advised, can avail itself. In that event, if the circuit court finds that the present condition of business is such as to admit of the application of the statute to the railroad companies in question without depriving them of just compensation, it will be its duty to discharge the injunction heretofore granted, and to make whatever order is necessary to remove any obstruction placed by the decrees in these cases in the way of the enforcement of the statute.

Perceiving no error on the record in the light of the facts presented to the circuit court, the decree in each case must be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice McKenna took no part in the decision in these cases.

Jurisdiction on appeal.

A plea alleging that parties had been improperly or collusively joined to make the case cognizable by the circuit court, and which, if true, shows that that court was without jurisdiction, does not involve the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States, so as to give this court jurisdiction on appeal directly from that court.

et al., in an action brought by them against James P. Merritt et al., defendants, to obtain a decree quieting the title of plaintiffs to certain real estate and restraining the defendants from violating certain covenants and agreements and also the specific performance thereof. On motion to dismiss. Dismissed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Harlan:

The plaintiffs in this suit, appellees here, are the president and trustees of Bowdoin College, a corporation of Maine, and a large number of individuals who are citizens of states other than California. They sued on behalf of themselves and of all other beneficiaries under a certain deed of trust made and entered into between Catharine M. Garcelon, of the first part, and John A. Stanly and Stephen W. Purington, trustees, of the second part. The defendants were James P. Merritt and others, including Stanly and Purington. The general object of the suit was to quiet the title of the plaintiffs to the real estate conveyed by the above deed to Stanly and Purington, and to secure an injunction restraining the other defendants from violating certain alleged covenants, promises, and agreements made with the grantor, and also the specific performance of such covenants, promises, and agreements.

The bill contained these allegations as explanatory of the reasons why the suit was not instituted by the trustees Stanly and Purington:

"Your orators and oratrices allege and aver that they have requested the said Stephen W. Purington and John A. Stanly, as trustees as aforesaid, to institute such action, suit, or proceeding against the defendants, the said James [552] P. Merritt *and Frederick A. Merritt, and their confederates, as would be necessary to quiet their title to the real estate so conveyed to them in trust as aforesaid, or to secure a perpetual injunction restraining the said James P. Merritt and Federick A. Merritt and each of them from violating their repeated covenants, promises, and agreements made with the said Catharine M. Garcelon, as is hereinbefore stated, and to secure a specific performance of said covenants, promises, and agreements, and the said Purington and Stanly have declined to accede to this request of your orators and oratrices; that by reason of such refusal your orators and oratrices are compelled to institute this suit, which your orators and oratrices do, not only in their own behalf, but on behalf of all other beneficiaries of said trust who may elect to join your orators and oratrices herein."

The defendants James P. Merritt and Frederick A. Merritt demurred to the bill of complaint, assigning as grounds of demurrer that it appeared from the bill that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the relief prayed against them; had not by the bill made out any title to the relief prayed; that the subject of the suit was not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity; that the court below had no jurisdiction of the suit; that it appeared from the bill that the same was exhibited against the defendants for several distinct and independent matters having no relation to each other or to one another, and in which or in the greater part of which the defendants demurring were not in any way interested or concerned; that the bill was multifarious; that it appeared from the bill that certain persons were not brought before the court who were necessary and proper parties; and that the bill did not show any matter of equity entitling the plaintiffs to the relief asked against the defendants who demurred.

The demurrer was overruled, and the opinion of the court thereon will be found in 54 Fed. Rep. 55.

The case was next heard on the application of the plaintiffs to file a supplemental bill making Harry P. Merritt a party defendant, and for an injunction to restrain the prosecution of an action commenced by him in the superior court of Alameda *county, Cali- [553] fornia Leave to file such a bill was given, and a preliminary injunction was granted. 59 Fed. Rep. 6.

Subsequently the defendant James P. Merritt filed a plea, in which it was stated that all the defendants to the bill (including the defendant Purington who had then recently died) were at the time of the commencement of the action and ever since had been citizens of California; that Stanly and Purington "could not at any time bring or maintain in this court this action or any cause of action alleged in the said bill of complaint; that said last-named defendants for the purpose of bringing and maintaining this action in this court, and to evade the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the laws giving jurisdiction to this court, brought and maintained this action in the names of the persons named in said bill of complaint as complainants therein, and without any authority thereto by or from said named complainants or any of them; that said named complainants are only nominal parties to said bill of complaint and in this action, and that said last-named defendants John A. Stanly and Stephen W. Purington, claiming to be trustees as aforesaid, have always been in truth and in fact the only real parties complainant in said bill of complaint and in this action, and that they are only nominally and colorably defendants in said bill and in this action;" that "the said John A. Stanly and Stephen W. Purington, claiming to be trustees as aforesaid never were, nor was either of them at any time, nor is the said John A. Stanly, as trustee or otherwise, now in truth or in fact, real or genuine parties defendant or a real or genuine party defendant to said bill of complaint; and that said John A. Stanly and Stephen W. Purington, claiming to be trustees as aforesaid, were, and each of them is, named in said bill of complaint as a party defendant thereto only colorably and by false pretense, for the purpose of making it falsely to appear that he is a party defendant thereto and in truth the real and genuine party complainant therein; that none of the parties named in said bill as complainants therein ever was or is in truth or in fact complainants or a party complainant to said bill of complaint or in this action."

The plea further averred—

*"That the persons named in said bill [554] of complaint as complainants never did, and that none of said persons ever did, in truth or in fact or in good faith, request the said Stephen W. Purington and John A. Stanly, claiming to be the trustees aforesaid, or in any capacity, or either of them, to institute any suit, action, or proceeding against the defendants, the said James P. Merritt and Frederick A. Merritt, or either of them, or any person or persons whatever, to quiet the title to real estate, or any part thereof, alleged in the said bill of complaint to have been conveyed to said Stephen W. Purington and John A. Stanly in trust, or to secure an injunction restraining the said James P. Merritt and Frederick A. Merritt, or either of them, from violating what is alleged in said bill of complaint to be their covenants, promises, and agreements, alleged in said bill to have been made by them with Catherine M. Garcelon, or from violating any of said alleged covenants, promises, or agreements, or to secure a specific performance of said alleged covenants, promises, or agreements, or any of them, or any action, suit, or proceeding whatever; that said Stephen W. Purington and John A. Stanly claiming to be trustees as aforesaid, or in any capacity, never, in truth or in fact or in good faith, declined or refused to bring such or any action; that if the persons, or any of them named in said bill of complaint as complainants therein, ever did request said Stephen W. Purington and John A. Stanly, claiming to be trustees as aforesaid, or either of them, to institute any action, suit, or proceeding whatever, or if they or either of them ever declined or refused so to do, such request and such declination were not and each of them was not made honestly or in good faith, but at the fraudulent instance and request of said Stephen W. Purington and John A. Stanly, claiming to be trustees as aforesaid, and solely to enable said Stephen W. Purington and John A. Stanly, claiming to be trustees as aforesaid, to feign and falsely pretend to refuse such request, and thereupon to institute falsely fraudulently and prosecute in this court this action against this defendant.

"That in truth and in fact said bill of complaint was prepared and filed in this court by said Stephen W. Purington and John A. Stanly, claiming to be trustees as aforesaid 555] and *by them only, and the same and this action has ever since been and is now being prosecuted by them only. . . .

"That this action is not in truth or in fact a controversy between citizens of different states. That this action is in truth and in fact a controversy solely between citizens of the state of California, that is to say until the death of said Stephen W. Purington, between the said Stephen W. Purington and John A. Stanly, claiming to be trustees as aforesaid, citizens of the state of California, and since his death, by said John A. Stanly, claiming to be such trustee, on the one side, and the said Frederick A. Merritt and this defendant on the other side. That this court has no jurisdiction of the said bill of complaint and no jurisdiction of this cause."

The cause was heard on a motion of the defendant James P. Merritt, to dismiss the suit as a collusive one within the meaning of § 5 of the act of March 3, 1875. It was adjudged that the plea in abatement was not sustained by the evidence and the motion to dismiss was consequently overruled. 63 Fed. Rep. 213. A final decree in favor of the plaintiffs was entered June 18, 1896. From that decree an appeal was prosecuted directly to this court. But on the 24th of May, 1897, the appeal was dismissed upon the authority of Colvin v. Jacksonville, 158 U. S. 456 [39: 1053]; The Bayonne, 159 U. S. 687, 692 [40: 306, 309]; and Chappell v. United States, 160 U. S. 499, 507, 508 [40: 510, 513]. In the first of the cases cited it was adjudged that when a case is brought here directly from a circuit court of the United States upon the ground that it involves the jurisdiction of that court, the certificate as to jurisdiction must be granted during the term at which the judgment or decree is entered.

Messrs. William A. Maury, Thomas H. Hubbard, Robert Y. Hayne, George N. Williams, and E. S. Pillsbury for appellees, in favor of motion to dismiss.

Messrs. A. T. Britton and A. B. Browne for appellants, in opposition to motion.

*Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the [556 opinion of the court:

The present appeal was taken on the 28th of June, 1897, and the case is before us on a motion of appellees to dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction in this court.

The object of the plea in abatement was to bring about a dismissal of the suit under the 5th section of the act of March 3, 1875. 18 Stat. at L. 470, chap. 137. That section provides for the dismissal of a suit in a circuit court of the United States if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court at any time that the parties to it "have been improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under this act."

By the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517), appeals or writs of error may be taken from the district courts or the circuit courts directly to this court in certain cases, among which are cases in which the "jurisdiction of the court is in issue," and cases that involve "the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States." The former appeal was dismissed upon the ground that a direct appeal to this court would not lie on an issue as to the jurisdiction of the circuit court unless the question of jurisdiction was certified during the term at which the final decree was rendered.

It is now sought to bring the case here by appeal directly from the circuit court upon the ground that it involves the "construction or application of the Constitution of the United States." This position cannot be sustained. When it appears that parties have been improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under the act of 1875, then the circuit court is, within the meaning of the act of 1891, without jurisdiction to proceed. But the plea in this case raised no question as to the constitutionality of the act of 1875, and called for no order or judgment that would require a construction or application of the Constitution, although an allowance of the plea may have involved the application of an act of Congress. The plea set out certain facts which, if found to be true, required the dismissal of the suit as one of which the court could not take cognizance under the statute relating to jurisdiction of the circuit 557] courts of *the United States. While the issue involved the jurisdiction of the circuit court, it did not involve or require, within the meaning of the act of March 3, 1891, either the construction or application of the Constitution.

For the reasons stated, the motion to dismiss the present appeal is sustained, and the appeal is dismissed.

The Chief Justice did not sit in this case nor participate in its decision.

v.

FORT STREET UNION DEPOT COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 557-585.)

Payment before possession in condemnation proceedings—the jury—due process of law—further instructions—state judgment—refusal to hear counsel—Michigan statute.

1. This court may examine the proceedings of a state court for the appropriation of private property for public purposes, to ascertain whether that court prescribed any rule of law in disregard of the owner's right to just compensation.

2. A state may, in condemnation cases, authorize the taking of possession before the final determination of the amount of compensation and the payment thereof, if adequate provision for compensation be made.

3. The Federal Constitution does not secure the right to have the questions of compensation and necessity, in such cases, passed upon by one and the same jury; nor does it forbid, or require, a trial of the question of compensation before an ordinary common-law jury; but it may be determined in the first instance by commissioners or a sheriff's jury.

4. Inquiry as to the amount of compensation, provided for in some appropriate way, before some properly constituted tribunal, constitutes due process of law.

5. When the state courts have construed a state statute as prescribing one form of procedure, their subsequent adjudication that such construction is wrong and that the statute really provides a different mode of procedure, cannot be set aside in the Federal courts as an unjust discrimination, or a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

6. Failure to ask further instructions prevents any complaint of the failure to instruct more fully on a question, if the charge is correct so far as it goes.

7. The omission to give further instructions to a jury, which were not asked, is not a denial of due process of law or of the equal protection of the laws.

8. Refusal to hear counsel as to the question of necessity may be treated as waived, and does not deprive a party of any rights, where he does not

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

The facts in this case are as follows: The defendant in error is a corporation created under the laws of the state of Michigan, for the purpose of constructing a union depot in the city of Detroit. In order to connect this depot with the railroads desiring to enter, it was necessary to place tracks on River street, and some of the way, at least, these tracks had to be elevated above the grade of the street. As a part of its enterprise the Depot company undertook the work of constructing these tracks. The plaintiffs in error were the owners of a manufacturing plant. The individual plaintiff in error held the title in fee to the property and the corporation plaintiff in error was his lessee. This manufacturing plant fronted on River street and fronted on that part of it where the tracks were necessarily on a viaduct far above the surface. No part of the ground actually occupied by the plant was sought to be taken, but under the laws of Michigan the owner of a lot fronting on a street owns to the center of the highway and is entitled to recover damages in case that street is appropriated to the use of a railroad. The third clause in § 4 of the union depot act (1 How. Anno. Stat. § 3461) provides specifically that the amount of these damages shall be ascertained *in the same way as is provided [559 in ordinary cases of condemnation.

The Constitution of Michigan provides:

Article 15, § 9. "The property of no person shall be taken by any corporation for public use without compensation being first made or secured, in such manner as may be prescribed by law."

Article 18, § 2. "When private property is taken for the use or benefit of the public, the necessity for using such property, and the just

The construction and operation of an elevated railway on land owned in fee, subject to a perpetual easement for a public street, imposes an additional burden on the land, entitling the owner to injunctive relief. Mattlage v. New York Elev. R. Co. 14 Misc. 291.

A railroad company which has once paid a landowner all damages occasioned by the construction and use of its road over his land, even though it was originally constructed on piers, is not liable for further damages on filling up the land between the piers. Hummel v. Cumberland Valley R. Co. 175 Pa. 537.

The jury may properly consider, in estimating damages to land by the construction of a railway in the street in front thereof, the close proximity of the railroad, the danger of fire from sparks, and the annoyance caused by the noise and jarring of passing trains, and by smoke, cinders, and dust from the engines. Chicago, P. & M. R. Co. v. Moore, 63 Ill. App. 163.

A municipal corporation may authorize the construction of a surface street railway without condemnation or consent of the adjacent lotowners, and the latter have no claim for compensation unless the access to their lots is obstructed by embankments, or their rights materially impaired in some other respect. Merrick v. Intramontaine R. Co. 118 N. C. 1081.

A gas company cannot, under Burns's Ind. Rev. Stat. § 5103, construct a natural gas-pipe line in and along a highway without the consent and against the protest of the owners of the abutting land. Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Huntsinger, 14 Ind. App. 166.

A property owner cannot recover damages for the closing up of one public way to his property by the construction of a steam railroad in the street, if another public way thereto is left undisturbed. Stephenson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 68 Mo. App. 642.

No recovery can be had by the owner of land for the taking thereof for the construction of a waterworks system, where such taking is invalid and unauthorized by the statute providing for the taking of land in the construction of such waterworks system. Bishop v. North Adams Fire Dist. 167 Mass. 364.

A city grading a street, the fee of which is in the abutting owner, has the right to take from any portion thereof the gravel or other materials situated above the grade line, and use the same to improve any other street, without compensation to the abutting owner. San Antonio v. Mullaly, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 596.

The lessees of a building are "parties interested in the land "within a statute providing for the payment of damages to the owners of or parties interested in, land proposed to be taken, or which may be injured in changing the grade of streets in order to abolish railroad crossings at grade. Re Grade Crossing Comrs. 17 App. Div. 54.

When lessee has right to compensation. Lafferty v. Schuykill River East Side R. Co. 124 Pa. 297, 3 L. R. A. 124; Mississippi Levee Comrs. v. Johnson, 66 Miss. 248; Kearney v. Metroplitan Elev. R. R. A. 224.

Lessees of land at the time a railroad right of way thereon is conveyed by the owner are not entitled to compensation from the railroad company for improvements made by them under their lease on the land conveyed as a right of way, where before the termination of the lease the fee is conveyed to them. Olive v. Sabine & E. T. R. Co. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 208.

compensation to be made therefor, except when to be made by the state, shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve freeholders, residing in the vicinity of such property, or by not less than three commissioners, appointed by a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law."

The Michigan union depot act (act of June 9, 1881, No. 224) was passed in 1881. It prescribes proceedings for the condemnation of private property, substantially similar to those in the Michigan general railroad law, first passed in 1855. Sections 9, 10, and 11 of the depot act, being §§ 3466, 3467, and 3468 of 1 How. Anno. Stat., provide:

Sec. 3466—§ 9. "The commissioners shall take and subscribe the oath prescribed by article 18 of the Constitution. . . . They may view the premises described in the petition, and shall hear the proof and allegations of the parties, and shall reduce the testimony, if any is taken by them, to writing, if requested to do so by either party, and after the testimony is closed in such case, and without any unreasonable delays, and before proceeding to the examination of any other claim, all being present and acting, shall ascertain and determine the necessity of taking and using any such real estate or property for the purposes described; and, if they deem the same necessary to be taken, they shall ascertain and determine the damages or compensation which ought justly to be made by the company therefor to the party or parties owning or interested in the real estate or property appraised by them. . . . They shall make a report to said court or judge signed by them, of the proceedings before them, if any, which *may be filed with the clerk[560 of the court, either in vacation or term time, or the probate court, as the case may be. . . . In case a jury shall have been demanded and ordered by the court, pursuant to § 8 of this act, the said jury shall proceed to ascertain and determine the necessity of taking and using any such real estate or property, and the damage or compensation to be paid by the company therefor, in the same manner and with like effect as is provided in this section in the case of commissioners, and as is further provided in said § 8. . . . The said judge, or a circuit court commissioner to be designated by him, may attend said jury to decide questions of law and administer oaths to witnesses, and he may appoint the sheriff or other proper officer to attend and take charge of said jury while engaged in said proceedings And the jury shall proceed to determine the amount of damages to be awarded, and shall have all the powers hereby conferred upon commissioners; and a report signed by the jury, whether the judge is or is not in attendance, shall be valid and legal. . . .

Sec. 3467—§ 10. "On such report being made by the commissioners or jury, the court, on motion, shall confirm the same on the next or any subsequent day when in session, unless for good cause shown by either party; and when said report is confirmed said court shall make an order containing a recital of the substance of the proceedings in the matter of the appraisal of and a description of the real estate or prop-

The injuries resulting from the proper construction and maintenance of an improvement under the power of eminent domain are included in the compensation allowed therefor in the original condemnation proceedings. Churchill v. Beethe, 48 Neb. 87, 35 L. R. A. 442.

Damages for the taking of land for a bridge must embrace damages for the change of grade where they occur at the same time, but damages by change of grade occurring at a subsequent time may be recovered by a subsequent action. Rodgers v. Philadelphia, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 71, Affirmed 181 Pa. 243.

The substitution of electric motors with the trolley system for horses on street railways does not per se create an additional easement. State, Roebling, v. Trenton Pass. R. Co. 58 N. J. L. 666, 33 L. R. A. 129.

The maintenance of an electric railway operated by the single trolley system does not constitute a new taking of land or of easements in land, entitling abutting landowners whose title extends to the line or to the middle of the street to compensation. Howe v. West End Street R. Co. 167 Mass. 46.

The use of a highway for an electric railway constitutes an additional burden upon the rights of the owners of the fee. Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & B. Pass. R. Co. 6 Pa. Dist. R. 269.

The occupation and use of a street for a trolley railroad entitles the owner of the fee of the street in front of her property to compensation for damage caused thereby. Clark v. Middletown-Goshen Traction Co. 10 App. Div. 354.

An additional servitude is not imposed upon a street by an elevated railroad. Doane v. Lake Street Elev. R. Co. 165 Ill. 510, 36 L. R. A. 97.

The construction and operation at grade of a steam railroad on a city street do not impose an additional servitude on the abutting property, or entitle an owner whose title extends to the middle of the street to damages in the absence of injury to his access to or use of the street of a kind different from that shared by the public generally. Stephenson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 68 Mo. App. 642.

One owning the fee in a highway is not entitled to damages for subjecting such highway to an additional public use by laying a water pipe under it. Bishop v. North Adams Fire Dist. 167 Mass. 364.

Water or gas pipes as additional servitude: Gas pipes constitute (Kincaid v. Indianapolis Natural Gas Co. 124 Ind. 577, 8 L. R. A. 602; Sterling's Appeal, 111 Pa. 35, 56 Am. Rep. 246; Mallory v. Bradford, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 670; Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Huntsinger, 14 Ind. App. 156). Water pipes constitute (Re Newton, 16 N. Y. Supp. 950. Contra, Witcher v. erty appraised, for which compensation is to be made, and shall also direct to whom the money is to be paid, or when and where it shall be deposited by the company. Said court, as to the confirmation of such report, shall have the powers usual in other cases.

Sec. 3468—§ 11. "A certified copy of the order so to be made shall be recorded in the office of the register of deeds for said county, in the book of deeds; and thereupon, on the payment or deposit by the said company of the sum to be paid as compensation for such land, franchise, or other property, and for costs, expenses, and counsel fees as aforesaid, and as directed by said order, the company shall be enti-

561] tled to *enter upon and take possession of and use the said land, franchise, and other property for the purpose of its incorporation; and all persons who have been made parties to the proceedings, either by publication or otherwise, shall be devested and barred of all right, estate, and interest in such real estate, franchise, or other property, until such right or title shall be again legally vested in such owner; and all real estate or property whatsoever acquired by any company under and in pursuance of this act, for the purpose of its incorporation, shall be deemed to be acquired for public use: Provided, the said sum to be paid as damages and compensation, and costs, expenses, and counsel fees as aforesaid, shall be paid by the company, or deposited as provided in this act, within sixty days after the confirmation of said report by the said court; and in case said company fail or neglect so to do, such failure or neglect shall be deemed as a waiver and abandonment of the proceedings to acquire any rights in said land or property. Within twenty days after the confirmation of the report of the commissioners or jury, as above provided for, either party may appeal, by notice in writing to the other, to the supreme court, from the appraisal or report of the commissioners or jury; such notice shall specify the objections to the proceedings had in the premises, and the supreme court shall pass on such objections only, and all other objections, if any, shall be deemed to have been waived; such appeal shall be heard by the supreme court at any general or special term thereof, on notice thereof being given according to the rules and practice of the court. On the hearing of such appeal, the court may direct a new appraisal before the same or new commissioners or jury, in its discretion. The second report shall be final and conclusive upon all parties interested. If the amount of the compensation to be allowed is increased by the second report, the difference shall be a lien on the land appraised, and shall be paid by the company to the parties entitled to the same, or shall be deposited as the court shall direct; and in such case, all costs of the appeal shall be paid by the company; but if the amount is diminished, the difference shall be refunded to the company by the party to whom the same may *have been paid, and [562 judgments therefor and for all costs of the appeal shall be rendered against the party so appealing. On the filing of the report, such appeal, when made by any claimant of damages, shall not affect the said report as to the right and interests of any party, except the party appealing; nor shall it affect any part of said report in any case, except the part appealed from; nor shall it affect the possession of such company of the land appraised; and when the same is made by others than the company, it shall not be heard except on a stipulation of the party appealing not to disturb such possession during the pendency of such procedings."

The proceedings were commenced in the usual form by a petition filed by the Depot Company, January 24, 1891, in the circuit court of the county of Wayne, in which county the city of Detroit is situate.

The plaintiffs in error, respondents below, demanded a jury. The first hearing commenced on February 25, 1891, and terminated on March 18, 1891, in a disagreement of the jury upon both issues, that of necessity and that of compensation. A second hearing was had, commencing on June 10, 1891, and resulting on July 16, 1891, in a verdict in favor of the Depot Company on the question of public necessity, and assessing the damages of the re-

Railroad company is not liable to owner of property abutting on a street on which its track is located and maintained, for the smoke and noise from its trains, where they are simply incidents of city life. Louisville Southern R. Co. v. Hooe, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 523.

Increased travel over railroad constructed upon a highway is not of itself an additional servitude or special injury entitling the owner of the fee in the highway to equitable relief. Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & B. Pass. R. Co. 6 Pa. Dist. R. 487.

The operation of a railway, whether by horse, cable, or electricity, when authorized by law, on a public street, does not impose an additional burden or servitude which will entitle an abutting owner to compensation or to an injunction against such occupation or use. Patterson v. Pittston, 8 Kulp, 530.

Electric railway in village street, forming part of a connecting line between cities for transporting merchandise, personal baggage, mail, and express matter, as well as passengers, constitutes an additional servitude or burden upon the lands of abutting owners for which they are entitled to compensation. spondents as follows: To Absalom Backus, Jr., as the owner of the fee, $17,850; to the corporation, A. Backus, Jr., & Sons, $78,293. At neither of these hearings was the judge of the circuit court present. Upon the motion of the Depot Company the circuit court vacated the award of damages, and ordered that a new jury be impaneled. Thereupon the respondents applied to the supreme court of the state for a writ of mandamus to compel the setting aside of this order. That court, on November 19, 1891, issued a peremptory writ of mandamus, as prayed for. 89 Mich. 210. On November 30, 1891, the circuit court, in compliance with this writ, entered an order which, as amended, confirmed the verdict and award of the jury, and also provided as follows:

"It is further ordered that within sixty days from the date of this order the Fort Street Union Depot Company is required to tender and pay to Absalom Backus, Jr., the sum of 563] *seventeen thousand, eight hundred and fifty dollars, and to A. Backus, Jr., & Sons the sum of seventy eight thousand, two hundred and ninety-three dollars, and to James N. Dean and William H. Davidson, executors, the sum of one dollar, together with their costs and expenses, if the same have been taxed, including an attorney fee of twenty-five dollars; and if the said parties or either of them refuse to accept the tender and payment of said sums, the Fort Street Union Depot Company is required to deposit the same, under the supervision of the clerk of this court, in the Detroit National Bank and to the credit of this cause, including said costs and expenses: provided, that if said costs and expenses have not been taxed within the said sixty days the same to be so deposited within five days after they are taxed.

"Said money shall remain on deposit in said bank, but, at the risk of the petitioner, subject to be drawn therefrom and to be paid to the parties entitled to the same on orders signed by one of the judges of this court and countersigned by the clerk.

"It is further ordered that upon the tender and payment or deposit of said sum of ninety-six thousand, one hundred and forty-four dollars, and of said costs, expenses, and counsel fees, as aforesaid, the Fort Street Union Depot Company shall be entitled to enter upon and take possession of and use the right of way above described for the purpose of its incorporation under its article of association and the Constitution and laws of this state, and that said respondent shall be devested and barred of all right, estate, and interest in such right of way until such right or title shall be again legally vested in them and said right of way shall be deemed to have been acquired by said company for public use."

On December 2, 1891, the Depot Company appealed from the award of the jury, and from the confirmation thereof, to the supreme court of the state. On January 26, 1892, the Depot Company paid to the respondents, and they received, the amounts awarded to them, and thereupon the Depot Company took full possession of the property, constructed its tracks, and has been ever since in possession and use of 564] them. *On March 3, 1892, the appeal was argued in the supreme court, and on June 10, 1892, its decision was announced. 92 Mich. 33. It was held by a majority of the court (the chief justice dissenting) that the opinion expressed on the granting of the mandamus had too narrowly restricted the powers of the circuit court, and it was ordered that the verdict of the jury, while confirmed so far as it determined the question of necessity, should be vacated and set aside so far as it awarded compensation; and that the cause be remanded to the circuit court, with directions to proceed with a new appraisal, the costs of the appeal to abide the event of such appraisal.

It was also held that the fact that the amount of the award and confirmation had been paid to the respondents and the property taken possession of by the Depot Company since the taking of the appeal did not affect the right of the Depot Company to a new trial upon the question of compensation.

When the case was returned to the circuit court the respondents objected to any further proceedings, but the same were overruled, and a jury impaneled. The sessions of this jury were presided over by the circuit judge, and, after hearing the testimony and examining the property, it returned a verdict, assessing the damages of the individual respondent at the sum of $15,000, and of the corporation respondent at the sum of $48,000. Thereupon, on motion of the Depot Company, and on December 28, 1893, the circuit court entered a judgment against the individual respondent for $2,850, the difference between the amount of the first and second awards, and a like judgment against the corporation respondent for $30,293, and also a judgment against both respondents for the costs of the appeal and subsequent proceedings, taxed at $4,168.20. On the 26th of June, 1894, the respondents filed their petition in the supreme court of the state of Michigan, praying for a writ of certiorari. The writ was allowed, whereby the entire record was transferred to that court, which, in an opinion filed on January 8, 1895, affirmed the proceedings below, with costs. 103 Mich. 556. Whereupon the plaintiffs below sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Don M. Dickinson for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Fred A. Baker for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

Inasmuch as the respondents, both on the trial in the circuit court and in the subsequent proceedings on the certiorari in the supreme court, specifically set up and claimed rights under the Federal Constitution which were denied, the jurisdiction of this court is not open to doubt. They again and again insisted that certain provisions of the Federal Constitution, which they named, stood in the way of any further proceedings against them.

It is also not open to further debate, since the decision in Chicago, Burlington, & Q. Railroad Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226 [41: 979], that this court may examine proceedings had in a state court, under state authority, for the appropriation of private property to public purposes, so far as to inquire whether that court prescribed any rule of law in disregard of the owner's right to just compensation. But in this respect we quote the restriction placed in the opinion then filed (p. 246 [41: 988]):

"We say, 'in absolute disregard of the company's right to just compensation,' because we do not wish to be understood as holding that every order or ruling of the state court in a case like this may be reviewed here, notwithstanding our jurisdiction, for some purposes, is beyond question. Many matters may occur in the progress of such cases that do not necessarily involve, in any substantial sense, the Federal right alleged to have been denied; and in respect of such matters, that which is done or omitted to be done by the state court may constitute only error in the administration of the law under which the proceedings were instituted."

While in cases of this kind coming from the supreme court of a state, questions of fact passed upon in the state courts are not here open to review (Egan v. Hart, 165 U. S. 188 566] [41:680], and *cases cited in the opinion), it may not be inappropriate to notice that the award of compensation as finally sustained gave to the respondents the sum of $63,000. As the valuation they placed upon the plant, outside of the realty, was only $150,000, and of the realty the like sum of $150,000, though the realty cost in 1871 less than $30,000, and as none of the ground upon which the plant stood and the business was carried on was taken by the Depot Company, but only the use of the street in front thereof, and that not so as to exclude them from its use, it is obvious that the award, whether adequate or not, was not one in reckless disregard of their rights.

It is not questioned by counsel that the settled rule of this court in cases of this kind is to accept the construction placed by the supreme court of the state upon its own Constitution and statutes as correct. Long Island Water Supply Company v. Brooklyn, 166 U. S. 685 [41: 1165]; Merchants' Bank v. Pennsylvania, 167 U. S. 461 [42:236], and cases cited in those opinions. His contention, however, is that the true construction of the Constitution and laws of the state, as settled by repeated decisions of its supreme court, was wholly disregarded in this case, and that by reason thereof the respondents were denied that equal protection of the laws which is guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. His contentions are grouped under the following heads:

"I. They were denied the fundamental right to have an ascertainment and determination of the amount of compensation and its final payment before being deprived of their property.

"II. They were denied the protection of that guaranty of the state Constitution providing that the questions of compensation and necessity should be passed upon by one and the same jury, and of the settled, uniform, and unreversed construction of the Constitution to that effect by the state judiciary in respect of all other citizens.

"III. They were denied the protection of a trial on the questions of necessity and compen- 567] sation by the tribunal *guaranteed by the Constitution of the state, in accordance with the settled, uniform, and unreversed construction of that Constitution in respect of all other citizens.

"IV. They were denied that measure of just compensation for their property taken, guaranteed by the Constitutions, Federal and state, as the same was and is accorded to all other persons than themselves.

"V. They were denied a hearing and deprived of a hearing guaranteed by the Constitutions, Federal and state, as 'due process of law,' when summoned into court as appellees to defend their property rights and themselves from imputations upon them.

"VI. Finally, having been deprived of their property sought by the railroad company for its purposes, their personal assets of the value of one hundred and ten thousand ($110,000) dollars were taken from them under the color of a judgment and process unknown to the Constitution and statutes of Michigan, and unknown to jurisprudence, whereby they were deprived of their property without 'due process of law.'"

Attention is called to the fact that while upon the return of the first verdict the respondents moved to confirm it, which motion was denied by the circuit court and the verdict set aside, yet after the decision of the supreme court awarding the writ of mandamus, they did not renew that motion; that the petitioner alone asked for confirmation, though, as expressly stated, for the purpose of taking an appeal to the supreme court; that, after the order of confirmation had been entered, it paid the amount of the award to the respondents, which sum was accepted by them, and that thereupon it took possession of the property and has since continued in undisturbed possession and use. It is insisted that such payment and taking possession created under the Constitution and statutes of Michigan a finality so far as the Depot Company was concerned, and that to this effect had been the repeated adjudications of the supreme court of the state. The argument is that the property owner has a constitutional right to have the amount of his compensation finally determined and paid before yielding posses- [568 sion; that the party seeking condemnation (in this case the Depot Company) cannot be let into possession until after all question as to the compensation has been finally settled, and the amount thereof paid; that it cannot take advantage of one report or verdict, pay the sum fixed by it, obtain possession, and still litigate the question of amount; that if it does then pay and take possession its right to further litigate is ended. But the supreme court of the state held against this contention, and we must assume therefrom that it is not warranted by the Constitution and statutes of the state. Indeed, the language of that Constitution is, "made or secured." Does this amount to a denial of the right to that protection to property which is guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution? In other words, is it beyond the power of a state to authorize in condemnation cases the taking of possession prior to the final determination of the amount of compensation and payment thereof? This question is fully answered by the opinions of this court in Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kansas Railway, 135 U. S. 641

[34: 295], and Sweet v. Rechel, 159 U. S. 380 [40: 188]. There can be no doubt that if adequate provision for compensation is made authority may be granted for taking possession pending inquiry as to the amount which must be paid and before any final determination thereof.

Neither can it be said that there is any fundamental right secured by the Constitution of the United States to have the questions of compensation and necessity both passed upon by one and the same jury. In many states the question of necessity is never submitted to the jury which passes upon the question of compensation. It is either settled affirmatively by the legislature, or left to the judgment of the corporation invested with the right to take property by condemnation. The question of necessity is not one of a judicial character, but rather one for determination by the lawmaking branch of the government. Mississippi & Rum River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 402, 406 [25: 206, 208]; United States v. Jones, 109 U. S. 513 [27: 1015]; Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kansas Railway Company, supra.

Neither was there anything in the proceed-569]ings actually had *before the last jury and in the circuit court which conflicts with any mandate of the Federal Constitution. Counsel say that the respondents were entitled to a trial by a jury of inquest, but were forced to trial before a common-law jury, presided over and controlled by the circuit judge. But the Constitution of the United States does not forbid a trial of the question of the amount of compensation before an ordinary common-law jury, or require, on the other hand, that it must be before such a jury. It is within the power of the state to provide that the amount shall be determined in the first instance by commissioners, subject to an appeal to the courts for trial in the ordinary way; or it may provide that the question shall be settled by a sheriff's jury, as it was constituted at common law, without the presence of a trial judge. These are questions of procedure which do not enter into or form the basis of fundamental right. All that is essential is that in some appropriate way, before some properly constituted tribunal, inquiry shall be made as to the amount of compensation, and when this has been provided there is that due process of law which is required by the Federal Constitution. Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 548, 593 [42: 270, 289]. These considerations dispose of all the objections embraced in the first three contentions of counsel so far as those objections run to the validity of the proceedings actually had, providing those proceedings were warranted by the Constitution and statutes of the state.

But it is insisted that those proceedings were not so warranted; that the settled, uniform, and unreversed construction thereof by the supreme court of the state theretofore forbade them, and hence there was a discrimination against the respondents, and they were denied that equal protection of the laws which the Federal Constitution guarantees. Thus, for instance, it is insisted that the previous rulings of the courts, both trial and supreme, had been to the effect that a jury called under these condemnation statutes was a jury of inquest and not a trial jury, whereas in this case the ruling was practically to the contrary, and the respondents were compelled to submit their rights to a trial jury, subject to the control of the presid [570 ing judge, as in ordinary common-law cases We deem it unnecessary to review the many authorities from the supreme court of Michigan cited by counsel, or determine whether the ruling in this case as to the methods of procedure and the true construction of the statute is or is not in harmony with prior decisions of that court. Accepting the contention of counsel, that in this case the supreme court of the state has put a different construction on the state statutes from that theretofore given, and has sustained modes of procedure different from those which had previously obtained, still it does not follow that this court has a right to interfere and say that the present ruling is erroneous and the prior construction correct, or that the change of construction works a denial of any fundamental rights. There is no vested right in a mode of procedure. Each succeeding legislature may establish a different one, providing only that in each is preserved the essential elements of protection. The fact that one construction has been placed upon a statute by the highest court of the state does not make that construction beyond change. Suppose it were true, in the fullest sense of counsel's contention, that for a series of years the courts had ruled that the jury in condemnation cases was a jury of inquest, or in the nature of a sheriff's jury—one determining for itself all matters of law and fact, and that in this case, for the first time, they held otherwise, and that such jury was a common-law jury, subject to be controlled by the presiding judge, whose duty it was to determine all questions of law, and still, whatever might be thought of the propriety of such a change of construction, there is in it nothing to justify this court in reversing the judgment of the state court and denying the correctness or validity of this last ruling. We fail to see why the presence of the judge with this jury, his assumption of power to control its proceedings, his instructions to it on questions of law, necessarily vitiated the proceedings. Grant that such a course had never been taken before; grant that it had never been held to be a proper proceeding; grant that it was unexpected by counsel,—and yet if the judge's rulings and instructions were in themselves correct, and the propriety of *his presence and control [571 be held by the supreme court of the state warranted by the statutes, we do not perceive that any right possessed under the Constitution of the United States has been violated.

The question is not presented of a distinct ruling by a state court that one party is entitled to certain rights and the benefits of certain modes of procedure, and that another party similarly situated is not entitled to them. An act of the legislature which in terms gave to one individual certain rights and denied to another similarly situated the same rights might be challenged on the ground of unjust discrimination and a denial of the equal protection of the laws. But that does not prevent a legislature, which has established a certain rule of procedure, and continued it in force for years, from subsequently repealing the act and establishing an entirely different mode of procedure. In other words, there is no absolute right vested in the individual as against the power of the legislature to change modes of procedure. And a similar thought controls where the courts of the state have construed a statute as prescribing one form of procedure, and parties have acted under that construction, and then subsequently the same court has held that the statute was theretofore misconstrued, and really provided a different mode of procedure. This last adjudication cannot be set aside in the Federal courts on the ground of an unjust discrimination or a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

We, of course, do not mean to affirm that there has been by the supreme court of the state such a change of adjudication. We simply in this respect accept the contention of counsel for the respondents, and hold that, even if the facts be as claimed by him, they furnish no ground for interference by this court. It should be noticed in passing, however that nearly all, if not absolutely all, of the cases which he cites from the supreme court of Michigan arose under the provisions respecting condemnation in the general railroad act, while these proceedings were had under the union depot act, and, although the two acts may be substantially similar, yet this adjudication is under a different statute from [572] that *under which most, if not all, of the prior decisions were made.

Passing now to the fourth point. Under this it is claimed that the trial judge gave to the jury an improper measure of damages. During the argument of counsel for the respondents this colloquy took place, as appears from the record:

'Court: A question which arises in my mind is this: There is no question but what the Backuses are entitled to full compensation for such damages as they may suffer, but does not the other rule also attach, and that is, that the jury are not in any way to consider any speculative damages or any probable damages?

"Mr. Dickinson: They can only consider the damages which are actually shown, but the other rule follows, may it please your honor, that they are not to estimate those damages for a year, or estimate the present injury done by the railroad, but they must assume that the railroad is running to its maximum capacity, that it has other railroads, that it may double, treble, or quadruple its trains, so far as that is concerned, and they must estimate the damage for the future time, not for a year or three years or five years or ten years.

"Court: That is undoubtedly true to a certain extent, but the question that I have thought about considerably within the last few days is in regard to the testimony which was admitted in the case in regard to their profits, the profits of their business. Do they not come within the rule which applies in regard to speculative damages?"

Afterwards, when the counsel for petitioner was making his argument, he said:

"In other words, if the court please, the question as to what business is carried on there, and as to how profitable an institution it might be, is merely an element to be considered in establishing the market value of the property."

Upon which the judge made this comment:

"In other words, if a profitable business is carried on in connection with a certain site, the profitableness of the business itself must be taken into consideration by the jury in estimating the value?"

*After the arguments were over the [573 judge charged the jury as follows:

"Upon this question, viz., compensation or damages, what I have to say must necessarily be in a broad and the most general way. This is a question for you, and, from the very nature of a proceeding of this character, you are vested with large powers and great discretion. These powers and this discretion should not be exercised arbitrarily, nor without proper regard for substantial justice. You should bear in mind that the greater the power, the more jealous is the law of its careful exercise, and the greater is the responsibility of the persons vested therewith. You should exercise a cool, careful, intelligent, and unbiased judgment. The compensation or damages must be neither inadequate nor excessive, and your award must not furnish a just inference of the existence of undue influence, partiality, bias, and prejudice, or unfaithfulness in the discharge of the duties imposed upon you. You must, however, remember that the respondents' property is taken, or its enjoyment interfered with, under the so-called power of eminent domain, a power somewhat and necessarily arbitrary in its character, and that where this is done the party whose property is taken, or whose enjoyment or use of the property is interfered with, is entitled to full compensation for the injury inflicted. While the allowance to be made should be liberal, still it must not be unreasonably exorbitant or grossly excessive. It should be a fair and liberal allowance and full and adequate compensation for the damages inflicted. You should not allow too little nor should you allow too much. Your award should be based upon that which is real and what is substantial, and not upon what is either fictitious or speculative. You should look at the condition of things as they exist. Under the Constitution and laws the right to take another's property for public uses, the power to exercise the right of eminent domain, is a part of the law of the land, but when this power is exercised it can only be done by giving the party whose property is taken or whose use and enjoyment of such property is interfered with, full and adequate compensation, not excessive or exorbitant, but just compensation. *I shall not call attention to any particular [574 part of the testimony in the case; the responsibility of its application and the weight to be given it rest with you, always regarding that which is real and substantial and disregarding that which is fictitious and speculative; treating conditions as they have been shown and as they are, without speculating as to what might possibly happen or occur, taking conditions as you find them, and the natural and probable consequences following such conditions."

And this was all which was said in reference to the measure of compensation. Now, it is insisted by counsel that the profits which the manufacturing plant was making were to be taken into consideration by the jury in awarding compensation, inasmuch as the business of that plant was seriously interrupted, if not practically destroyed, by this condemnation; that inasmuch as the query was suggested by the judge during the argument whether profits did not come within the rule as to speculative damages, the failure to charge distinctly that they were proper subjects of consideration was equivalent to an instruction that they were not to be considered, and that, therefore, the true rule of compensation was not given to the jury.

It is evident that the judge did not attempt to define the several elements which enter into the general fact of compensation, or the various matters to be considered by the jury. He simply charged generally that as this was an arbitrary taking of the property of the respondents they were entitled to full compensation, and left to the jury the duty of determining what should be such compensation, telling them plainly that they were vested with large powers and great discretion. If it be said that the judge had intimated by his query that the matter of profits came within the rule applicable to speculative damages, it must also be noticed that further on he suggested that the profitableness of a business was to be taken into consideration in estimating the value. It is true he nowhere instructed the jury to make the profits of the business the criterion of value, nor indeed would he have been justified in so doing. The profitableness of the business was undoubtedly a matter to be considered, and so 575]the judge fairly intimated in *these prior colloquies. But the profits of a business are not destroyed unless the business is not only there stopped, but also one which in its nature can not be carried on elsewhere If it can be transferred to a new place and there prosecuted successfully, then the total profits are not appropriated, and the injury is that which flows from the change of location.

But beyond this no special instructions were asked by the respondents at the time of the giving of the charge. The statute (§ 3466) provides that the judge "may attend said jury, to decide questions of law." So far as he gave instructions it is obvious that he stated that which was the law, and the real objection is that he did not go further and enter into a more minute description of the elements which were to be taken into consideration by the jury in fixing the amount of compensation; that they may from the colloquies which had taken place during the arguments have drawn improper inferences as to the limit to which they were warranted in going, and that those inferences he failed to correct by specifically stating what matters they should consider. A sufficient answer is that the respondents did not ask any further instructions. All they did was to except to what had been stated. By well settled rules no appellate court would, under such circumstances, be required to set aside the judgment of the trial court. Shutte v. Thompson, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 151, 164 [21: 123, 127]; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Snyder, 93 U. S. 393 [23: 887]; Texas & Pacific Railway Co. v. Volk, 151 U. S. 73 [38: 78]; Isaacs v. United States, 159 U. S. 487 [40: 229].

But a more complete and satisfactory answer is that whatever error there may have been affords no ground for the interference of this court. The respondents were not thereby deprived of any rights secured by the Federal Constitution. They were not denied "due process of law." The proceedings were had before a duly constituted tribunal, in accordance with the declared law of the state, with full opportunity to be heard. Nor were they denied "the equal protection of the laws." The rule as to the necessity of asking special instructions was administered in this case no differently than in others. Marchant v. Pennsylvania Railroad Company, 153 U. S. 380 [38: 751]. *The error, if any there be, was not[576 one "in absolute disregard of their right to just compensation," but was only error in the administration of the law under which those proceedings were instituted. As clearly pointed out in Chicago, Burlington, & Q. Railroad Co. v. Chicago, supra, it is not every error occurring in a state court in the administration of its law concerning condemnation of private property for public purposes that opens the door to review by this court. We are not called upon to search the record simply to inquire whether there may or may not have been errors in the proceedings. Our limit of interference is reached when it appears that no fundamental rights have been disregarded by the state tribunals.

Under the fifth head counsel present two matters:

"(1.) The denial by the supreme court of the state of a hearing on the substantial and essential question, of whether counsel for plaintiffs in error abused their privilege as counsel by arguing to the jury on the question of necessity that the margin of the depot grounds that belonged to the Michigan Central road could be taken for the elevated structure; and (2) the reversal of the unanimous judgment of the supreme court of the state in 89 Mich. 209, without a rehearing, by the judgment in 92 Mich. 33."

With reference to the first, it is enough to say that the respondents did not appeal to the supreme court, and that under § 3468 it would seem that that court was called upon to consider only such objections as had been particularly specified. "Either party may appeal, by notice in writing;" "such notice shall specify the objections;" "the supreme court shall pass on such objections only, and all other objections, if any, shall be deemed to have been waived." No objection to the finding of the jury as to the question of necessity had been made by the appellant, and therefore was to be treated as waived. Under those circumstances it cannot be said that the supreme court deprived the respondents of any right by refusing to hear counsel in respect to the question of necessity, or connected with its determination.

With regard to the second, technically the decision on the mandamus proceeding and that on the appeal did not conflict. *The writ[577 of mandamus directed the circuit judge to set aside the order which he had entered vacating the award. It thus in effect declared that that judge ought not to have made such an order. On the appeal the supreme court itself ordered that the award be set aside, and a new jury impaneled, and remanded it to the circuit court for such new appraisal. This is within the letter of the statute (§ 3468), "on the hearing of such appeal, the court may direct a new appraisal before the same or new commissioners or jury, in its discretion." The decision by the supreme court that it had power to set aside the verdict and order a new appraisal was not a reversal of a ruling that the circuit court had no such power, although it may suggest consequences somewhat singular. Appreciating that fact, in the last opinion the court declared that in the former decision its language restricting the power of the circuit court had been too strong.

Coming now to the last point, the supreme court held that as upon the second appraisal the damages were less than those awarded on the first, and the amount of the first had been paid to the respondents, the petitioner was entitled to a judgment for the difference. The language of the statute (§ 3468) is "but if the amount is diminished, the difference shall be refunded to the company by the party to whom the same may have been paid, and judgments therefor and for all costs of the appeal shall be rendered against the party so appealing." It may be that this language is not entirely apt, for in this case the party appealing was not the landowner but the Depot Company, and so it cannot be said that judgments were rendered against "the party appealing." But the true intent of the statute is obvious, and at any rate we are bound to accept the construction placed upon it by the supreme court, and hold that it means that if the last appraisal was less than the first and the amount of the first had been paid, the company was entitled to recover the difference from the party to whom it had been paid. Nothing is said, it is true, in the statute about execution, but the supreme court ruled that under the general statutes the recovery of the judgment carried with it a right to an execution.

578] *These are all the questions in this case. We find nothing in them which justifies an interference by this court with the proceedings of the state courts; nothing in which it can be said that any ruling of those courts was in absolute disregard of the respondents' right to compensation. The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

Mr. Justice Brown took no part in the decision of this case.

Mr. Justice Harlan dissenting:

Did the trial court prescribe any rule of law for the guidance of the jury that was in absolute disregard of the right of the plaintiffs in error to such compensation?

In Chicago, Burlington, & Q. Railroad Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 241 [41: 979, 986], it was held that "a judgment of a state court, even if it be authorized by statute, whereby private property is taken for the state or under its direction for public use, without compensation made or secured to the owner, is, upon principle and authority, wanting in the due process of law required by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and the affirmance of such judgment by the highest court of the state is a denial by that state of a right secured to the owner by that instrument."

Before proceeding with his argument to the jury, Mr. Dickinson, the attorney for the plaintiffs in error, called the attention of the trial court to some of the principles which, in his judgment, should control the ascertainment of the just compensation to which they were entitled. Addressing the court in the presence of the jury, he said: "Now, as to what is compensation, I refer your honor to the case of Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad Co. v. Heisel, in 47 Mich. 393: 'It need hardly be said that nothing can be fairly termed compensation which does not put the party injured in as good a condition as he would have been in if the injury had not occurred. Nothing short of this is adequate compensation. In the case of land actually taken, it includes its value, or the amount to which the value of the property from which it is taken is depreciated; and in Jubb v. Hull Dock Co. 9 Q. B. 443, it was held that where the property taken was a brewery in *operation the damages included the [579 necessary loss in finding another place of business. In cases where damage is by injury aside from actual taking of property, the rule has been to make the party whole as nearly as practicable, and where it affected the rental value or enjoyment the same principle has been applied as in other cases. There is no reason, and, so far as we can discover, no law, which allows the wrong-doer to cast any portion of an actual and appreciable loss on the party whom he injures.' (In this case the same rule of damages would apply as in the Grand Rapids & Indiana Case, and the suit was brought for damages, and the question was what was compensation.) 'In such a case as this it is in the power of the company and always has been to have the compensation settled once for all, and to get any benefit which the law attaches to such a method of ascertainment. Until this is done the possession is a continuous wrong.'"

At this point the court interrupted the argument of counsel with this observation: "A question which arises in my mind is this: There is no question but what the Backuses are entitled to full compensation for such damages as they may suffer, but does not the other rule also attach, and that is, that the jury are not in any way to consider any speculative damages or any probable damages?" To this counsel made the following response: "They can only consider the damages which are actually shown, but the other rule follows, may it please your honor, that they are not to estimate those damages for a year, or estimate the present injury done by the railroad, but they must assume that the railroad is running to its maximum capacity, that it has other railroads, that it may double, treble, or quadruple its trains, so far as that is concerned, and they must estimate the damage for the future time, not for a year or three years or five years or ten years." The court then said: "That is undoubtedly true to a certain extent, but the question that I have thought about considerably within the last few days is in regard to the testimony which was admitted in the case in regard to their profits, the profits of their business. Do they not come within the rule which applies in regard to speculative damages?"

*Counsel then observed: "Not at all, [580 your honor. If the profits are shown and the business is destroyed, you can only show it by the effect upon the business, and upon that point I call your honor's attention to the unanimous opinion of the supreme court delivered by Mr. Justice Campbell in the case of Grand Rapids & Indiana R. R. Co. v. Weiden, 70 Mich. 393. 'Under our present Constitution there is never any presumption that a railroad is necessary, or that any particular land ought to be given up to its uses. Every landowner, therefore, has a perfect right to object to giving up his land, and is not confined to objections depending upon price or value. . . . And a road already established has no better claim than any other to extend or change its lines. Although railroads are allowed by public policy to condemn lands, because they cannot exist otherwise, nevertheless the enterprise is, under our laws, which prohibit public ownership of railways, one of private interest and emolument, and must show its claims to legal assistance.' Now upon the question of profits: 'We are bound to see that parties are not deprived of their property without necessity, or without full compensation for being compelled to relinquish it. And while respect is due to the honest action of juries, it is not conclusive, and is subject to comparison with the facts in the record. Both of the appellants were using their property in lucrative business, in which the locality and its surroundings had some bearing on its value. Apart from the money value of the property itself, they were entitled to be compensated so as to lose nothing by the interruption of their business and its damage by the change. A business stand is of some value to the owner of the business, whether he owns the fee of the land or not, and a diminution of business facilities may lead to serious results. There may be cases when the loss of a particular location may destroy business altogether, for want of access to any other that is suitable for it. Whatever damage is suffered must be compensated. Appellants are not legally bound to suffer for petitioner's benefit. Petitioner can only be authorized to oust them from their possession by making up to them the whole of their losses.' That goes directly 581] upon the question which *your honor suggests. Now I shall not take time to refer to the other cases."

I cannot doubt, from what passed between the court and counsel in the presence of the jury, that the court meant to characterize profits from the business of the parties owning the real estate as speculative damages.

After the counsel for the parties concluded their argument to the jury upon the whole case the trial judge delivered a carefully prepared charge, in which he said: "The question, and the only question before you for your determination, is that of compensation, and of compensation only. Your duty, and your only duty, is to ascertain and determine what compensation or damages ought justly to be paid by the Fort Street Union Depot Company to the respondents for the real-estate property, franchises, easements, and privileges described in the petition, viz.: 1. The amount to be allowed to Absalom Backus, Jr., as the owner of the fee of the land described. 2. The amount to be allowed to A. Backus, Jr., & Sons, a corporation, as tenants in possession of such lands. Upon this question, viz., compensation or damages, what I have to say must necessarily be in a broad and the most general way. This is a question for you, and from the very nature of a proceeding of this character you are vested with large powers and great discretion. These powers and this discretion should not be exercised arbitrarily, nor without proper regard for substantial justice. You should bear in mind that the greater the power the more jealous is the law of its careful exercise, and the greater is the responsibility of the persons vested therewith. You should exercise a cool, careful, intelligent, and unbiased judgment. The compensation or damages must be neither inadequate nor excessive, and your award must not furnish a just inference of the existence of undue influence, partiality, bias, and prejudice, or unfaithfulness in the discharge of the duties imposed upon you. You must, however, remember that the respondents' property is taken or its enjoyment interfered with under the so-called power of eminent domain, a power somewhat and necessarily arbitrary in its character, and that where this is done, the party whose property is taken, *or whose enjoyment[582 or use of the property is interfered with, is entitled to full compensation for the injury inflicted. While the allowance to be made should be liberal, still it must not be unreasonably exorbitant or grossly excessive. It should be a fair and liberal allowance and full and adequate compensation for the damages inflicted. You should not allow too little nor should you allow too much. Your award should be based upon that which is real and what is substantial, and not upon what is either fictitious or speculative. You should look at the conditions of things as they exist. Under the Constitution and laws the right to take another's property for public uses, the power to exercise the right of eminent domain, is a part of the law of the land, but when this power is exercised it can only be done by giving the party whose property is taken or whose use and enjoyment of such property is interfered with, full and adequate compensation, not excessive or exorbitant, but just compensation."

Is it not clear that the trial judge, while indulging in very general language as to the duty of the jury not to allow too much or too little compensation, gave the jury to understand that compensation was to be ascertained upon the basis only of the ownership by Absalom Backus, Jr., of the fee in the land described, and of the rights of A. Backus, Jr., & Sons as tenants in possession, excluding damages to the business of the plaintiffs in error, which would arise from the condemnation of their property rights? The jury were, in effect, instructed that the profits derived by them from their business were to be excluded from consideration as being "fictitious or speculative."

That he was so understood by counsel for the plaintiffs in error is manifest from the circumstance that, immediately upon the charge being concluded, he made the following exceptions to it: "We except to that part of the charge of the court wherein he says that the damages are to be confined to the damage to the real estate described and the improvements upon it; whereas, in our view, the damages are to the entire plant, including the injury to the business from the impairment of the mill as affecting its adjuncts, the lumber yard and 583]*the storehouse. . . . To what is said by the court as to avoiding the giving of speculative damages, in view of what has been said before by the court in regard to taking into consideration the profits. I refer to what has been said upon the records in the course of the testimony and upon the argument, expressing the views of the court against taking into consideration the profits. We except to the refusal of the court to charge as I requested in the language or in the substance, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court which I read in full upon the opening of my argument and called attention of the court to it, especially to the expression of Campbell, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Weiden, 70 Mich. 390, 395."

If the trial judge did not intend to say to the jury that injury to the business of the plaintiffs in error was to be deemed speculative, and therefore to be excluded from consideration, he would instantly have said that no such impression was intended to be made as that indicated by the exceptions taken to his charge.

The views expressed by counsel for the plaintiffs in error as to the principles which should guide the jury in the matter of compensation were sustained by the authorities. In addition to the cases in 47 and 70 Michigan above referred to, reference may be made to many others decided by the supreme court of Michigan.

In Detroit Park & B. Commissioners v. Chicago, D. & C. G. T. Junction Railroad Co. 91 Mich. 291, which was a case of the condemnation of the lands of a railroad company, that court said: "If, therefore, their adjoining land is rendered less valuable by the location of a public highway, or another railroad across its property, there is no reason why they should not recover compensation therefor. Situated near this crossing is a small tract of land used for warehouse purposes. It is insisted by the respondents that, by reason of this crossing, this land, with the warehouse thereon, is rendered less available and less valuable for the purposes for which it was constructed and used. This was a proper element of damage, and should have been submitted to the jury.

At the same term the court, in Detroit Park & B. Commissioners v. Moesta, 91 Mich 154, quoted 584] *with approval what had been said in Grand Rapids & I. Railroad Co. v. Weiden, 70 Mich. 295, saying: "The constitutional provision entitling the owner of private property, taken for public use, to just compensation, has uniformly been construed to require full and adequate compensation. The rules to be applied in fixing the compensation are not necessarily the same as obtain in fixing damages in actions upon contracts. The correct rule of compensation in such cases is more nearly analogous to the remedy afforded in an action in tort in which property rights have been interfered with without the owner's assent. In such cases damages for the interruption of the owner's business are allowed. Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 549." In City of Detroit v. John Brennan & Co. 93 Mich. 338, the court reaffirmed the doctrine of the former cases, that the full measure of compensation and the injury done to the business should be allowed, and said: "The law considers the rights of the property and business carried on by the respondent as of equal consideration, and entitled to as much protection as the right of the city to take the property and interfere with the business; and will not permit the property to be taken and the business to be interfered with unless an actual public necessity exists for the making of the improvement. . . . The elements of damage are: (1) The value of the property taken for the opening of the street; the injury to the works and property not taken, and left in the parcel of land from which the property is taken. (2) The injury to the business of the owner. (3) Compensation for all prospective loss or injury resulting from the opening of the street, and the taking of the property for that purpose."

See also Grand Rapids, L. & D. Railroad Co. v. Chesebro, 74 Mich. 466, where the court said: "An owner has a right to be indemnified for anything that he may have lost. The farming test which is the one petitioner sought to apply, would be of no particular use in a great many cases of suburban lands. . . . The mere taking of four acres for a right of way could not be regarded, in any sensible point of view, as compensated by one tenth of the value of the forty acres, taking acre for acre. *The damages in such a case must be [585 such as to fully make good all that results, directly or indirectly, to the injury of the owners in the whole premises and interests affected, and not merely the strip taken." Further: "The jury here, as in all cases where no certain measure exists, must trust somewhat to their own judgment. That is one of the purposes for which juries of inquest are provided. They are expected to view the premises and use their own senses. . . . But the purpose throughout is to give all the damages which they reasonably discover, past or present, and to result, but no more. No one can read this record without seeing that the jury did not deal fully with the case. It is manifest that they gave no damages beyond what they assumed to be the price of four acres by the acre. . . . It cannot be said that there is any real conflict as to the damages arising from the cutting off one part from the other of the forty acres, and this was left out altogether, unless they regarded the proofs of value wantonly, which we cannot believe." Without referring to other matters discussed at the bar and in the elaborate brief of counsel, I place my dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court upon the ground that the trial court committed error in its charge to the jury as to the principles which should guide them in determining the just compensation to which the plaintiffs in error were entitled. The rules laid down by the supreme court of Michigan as to what was just compensation, were, I think, in accord with the principles that obtain in the courts of the Union when determining the just compensation to be made for private property taken for public use.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, on the Relation of L. C. CALDWELL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 586-600.)

Suspension of state officer—state decision, when conclusive—jury trial—Federal question—departure from fundamental principles—contempt by taking possession of office.

1. The suspension by the governor of a railroad commissioner, under N. C. act 1891, chap. 320, which operates only until the next general assembly determines the question, is not wanting in due process of law, and does not deny the equal protection of the laws, because the governor refuses to produce to the officer the evidence against him, or give him an opportunity to confront his accusers and cross-examine the witnesses.
2. The decision of the highest court of a state that the procedure by which an officer has been suspended or removed from office was regular and was under a constitutional and valid statute must generally be conclusive in this court.
3. A jury trial of charges against an officer is not necessary to constitute due process of law in suspending or removing him.
4. There must be fair color for claiming that rights under the Federal Constitution have been violated, in order to give jurisdiction to this court to review a state judgment.
5. Plain and substantial departure from the fundamental principles upon which our government is based is necessary to make the procedure for the removal of an officer under a state statute obnoxious to the Federal Constitution.

Due process of law; what constitutes.

Due process of law is shown when an opportunity is conferred to invoke the equal protection of the law by judicial proceedings appropriate for the purpose and adequate to secure the end and object sought to be attained. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State, Omaha, 47 Neb. 549.

A statute making the receipt of deposits by a banker when insolvent embezzlement, is not unconstitutional as a deprivation of liberty or property without due process of law. Meadowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 35 L. R. A. 176.

Corporations are persons within the meaning of the constitutional provision forbidding the deprivation of property without due process of law, as well as a denial of the equal protection of the laws. Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578 (41: 560).

A town is not deprived of property without due process of law by a statute making it a part of an incorporated highway or bridge district under the control of commissioners who may draw upon the town for a fixed portion of the expenses of the district. State, Bulkeley, v. Williams, 68 Conn. 131.

The Connecticut statute of 1893, authorizing an action to determine adverse claims to real estate, is not unconstitutional as depriving defendants of due process of law. Miles v. Strong, 68 Conn. 273.

Seizure and destruction of nets by officers in obedience to a statute, in abating a nuisance caused by their voluntary use by the owner in violation of the fishery laws, does not deprive the owner of his property without due process of law. Bittenhaus v. Johnston, 92 Wis. 588, 32 L. R. A. 380.

A statute purporting to set apart tide lands as public grounds is constitutional as to land between high and low water mark, but unconstitutional in purporting to do more, as to a landowner whose boundary extends to low-water mark, as taking his land without compensation. Coburn v. San Mateo County, 75 Fed. Rep. 520.

The taking by a state of the private property of one person or corporation without the owner's consent, for the private use of another, is not due process of law and is a violation of the 14th article of Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 164 U. S. 403 (41: 489).

The Illinois statute making a pauper's relatives when able liable for his support is not unconstitutional as a deprivation of property without due process of law. People, Peoria County, v. Hill, 163 Ill. 186, 36 L. R. A. 635.

A statute imposing penalties for the keeping of houses of ill-fame, and declaring that repute in the neighborhood of the character of the house shall be sufficient without proving an overt act of prostitution in the house, is not unconstitutional as depriving the owner of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or as violating private property. State v. Allen, 3 Ohio N. P. 201.

Due process of law is denied by N. Y. Laws 1888, chap. 543, authorizing the vendor of a monument to remove the same from the cemetery and sell it at public auction upon the failure of the purchaser to pay the purchase price thereof within six months after the service of notice of the filing of a lien with the superintendent of the cemetery, without providing for a hearing as to the fact of payment or nonpayment. Brooks v. Tayntor, 17 Misc. 534.

Indiana Rev. Stat. 1894, § 7257, providing that a mechanic's lien may be acquired by filing in the recorder's office a notice of intention to hold the lien, within sixty days after performing labor or furnishing material, is not unconstitutional as depriving the owner of his property without due process of law. Smith v. Newbaur, 144 Ind. 95, 33 L. R. A. 685.

The owner of property is not deprived thereof, or of its use without due process of law, by Ohio act Feb. 28, 1888, §§ 32, 61, requiring all buildings of three or more stories in height to be provided with fire escapes, and that the owner, upon thirty days' notice by the fire inspectors, put up such escapes, and in case of his noncompliance with such order be punished and fined, or enjoined from using or occupying the building. Cincinnati v. Steinkamp, 54 Ohio St. 284.

Indiana Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2202, authorizing any agent of any society for the prevention of cruelty to animals to kill any animal found neglected or abandoned, and which is injured or diseased past recovery, or by age has become useless, is unconstitutional as depriving the owner of property without due process of law, so far as it permits

6. A relator in whom the title to an office is adjudged to be by a decision in quo warranto is not guilty of contempt in proceeding to take possession after the filing of a supersedeas bond, if he was ignorant of the fact of the allowance of a writ of error or the filing of the bond until after he had taken possession.

Submitted February 21, 1898. Decided March 21, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of North Carolina to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Superior Court of Iredell County, that the plaintiff is entitled to the office of railroad commissioner, and that the defendant had been lawfully suspended from that office, etc., in an action brought in the nature of a quo warranto to test the title to the office. On motion by defendant in error to dismiss the writ on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and on a rule against the relator Caldwell to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt in proceeding upon a judgment of the state court after a writ of error had been allowed and a supersedeas bond filed. Motion to dismiss granted. Rule to show cause discharged.

Statement by Mr. Justice Peckham:

Two motions were made in this case. The defendant in error made a motion to dismiss the writ on the ground of want of jurisdiction. The plaintiff in error obtained from this court a rule against the relator Caldwell to show cause why he should not be punished as for a contempt in a proceeding upon a judgment of the state court after a writ of error from this court had been allowed and a supersedeas bond duly filed. The two motions were heard together. The following were the facts presented upon the motion to dismiss:

By chapter 320 of the Laws of 1891, the general assembly of North Carolina passed an act creating a state railroad commission, the 1st such killing without notice to him. Loesch v. Koehler, 144 Ind. 278, 35 L. R. A. 682.

A person is not deprived of property without due process of law by a statute making anyone liable for all damages done to a highway on a hillside in driving a herd of animals over it, where the liability must be ascertained by judicial proceedings, and the statute clearly specifies the condition under which a presumption of neglect arises. Jones v. Brim, 165 U. S. 180 (41: 677), Affirming 11 Utah, 200, 29 L. R. A. 97.

The owner of a dead animal before it has become a nuisance has property rights in it of which he cannot be deprived without compensation, although the authorities may require its removal within a reasonable time before it actually becomes a nuisance. Schoen v. Atlanta, 97 Ga. 697, 33 L. R. A. 804.

The owner of hogs is not deprived of his property without due process of law by making it unlawful to permit them to run at large. Haigh v. Bell, 41 W. Va. 19, 31 L. R. A. 131.

The appropriation to public use of the real estate of a single owner for a public street, with the assessment back upon him, not only for the compensation awarded for the entire street, but of all the expenses of the proceeding, is a violation of U. S. Const. 14th Amendment, providing that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law. Baker v. Norwood, 74 Fed. Rep. 997.

Failure to provide for a notice to the person whose property may be affected by a local assessment, and to give opportunity to appear and contest the legality, justice, and correctness of the assessment, at some stage in the proceedings before it becomes final, renders the statute authorizing such assessments void for want of due process of law. Violett v. Alexandria, 92 Va. 561, 31 L. R. A. 382.

A statute validating assessments previously made for improving streets in a given city, which assessments were invalid because of certain omissions which might have been dispensed with if they had not been required by statute, does not violate the constitutional provision prohibiting the taking of property without due process of law. Hatzung v. Syracuse, 92 Hun, 203.

A city charter authorizing an assessment for sewers without any notice, either actual or constructive, to persons to be assessed, is unconstitutional as not providing for due process of law. Dietz v. Neenah, 91 Wis. 422.

A statute making the findings of viewers appointed by city councils with regard to damages and benefits arising upon the opening of streets or changing of grades binding and final unless appealed from is unconstitutional as making the city a judge in its own case. Re Fisher, 178 Pa. 325.

The adoption of an ad valorem method of assessing the lands in an irrigation district for the expense of the improvement is not a taking of the property without due process of law. Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112 (41: 369).

A statute making the issue of improvement bonds conclusive of the validity of an assessment, and permitting the issue of the bonds without actual notice to the owners of the property assessed, or on published notice only, within forty days after the assessment is finally determined, is unconstitutional as providing for deprivation of property without due process of law. Hayes v. Douglas County, 92 Wis. 429, 31 L. R. A. 213.

The constitutional prohibition against taking property without due process of law is not violated by N. Y. Penal Code, § 364a, making it a misdemeanor to have in possession with intent to sell or dispose of any article of merchandise marked with the word "sterling" or "sterling silver," or which shall be inclosed for sale or disposition in any package or other thing bearing thereon anything importing that the article is silver, sterling silver, or solid silver, unless nine hundred and twenty-five one thousandths of the component parts of the metal of which the article is manufactured is pure silver, as applied to articles in existence when the act was passed. People v. Webster, 17 Misc 410.

A village ordinance providing for the lighting of a railway within its limits by electric lights at designated points is the legitimate exercise of the police power, and is not a taking of the property of the railroad company without due process of law. St. Bernard v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 4 Ohio Dec. 371.

A railroad company is not deprived of property without due process of law by a statute making such companies liable for all fires caused and communicated from locomotives. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Mathews, 165 U. S. 1 (41: 611).

A statute reducing the tolls that may be charged by a turnpike company, so far as to prevent it from keeping its road in proper repair and earning any dividends whatever for stockholders, when the tolls previously charged are not unjust,—is unconstitutional as a deprivation of property without due process of law. Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578 (41: 560).

Said commissioner shall not jointly or severally, or in any way, be the holder of any stock or bond, or be the agent or attorney or employee of any such company, or have any interest in any way in such company, and shall so continue during the term of his office, and in case any commissioner shall, as distributee or legatee, or in any other way, have or become entitled to any stock or bonds or interest therein of any such company he shall at once dispose of the same; and in case any commissioner shall fail in this, or in case any one of them shall become disqualified to act, then it shall be the duty of the governor to suspend him from office and to report the fact of his suspension, together with the reason therefor, to the next general assembly, and the question of his removal from office shall be determined by a majority of the general assembly in joint session. In any case of suspension the governor shall fill the vacancy, and if the general assembly shall determine that the commissioner suspended shall be removed, then the appointee of the governor shall hold until his successor is elected and qualified as hereinbefore provided, but if the general assembly shall determine that the suspended commissioner shall not be removed from his office, then the effect shall be to reinstate him in said office. The person discharging the duties of said office shall be entitled to a salary for the time he is so engaged, but a commissioner who is suspended shall be allowed the salary during his suspension in case he should be reinstated by the next general assembly."

Due process of law is not furnished by a judgment pronounced without opportunity to be heard, by a court of competent jurisdiction in accordance with the provisions of a statute, unless that statute accords with the provisions of the fundamental law. People v. Havnor, 149 N. Y. 195, 31 L. R. A. 689, Affirming 1 App. Div. 459.

A remedy by motion in a state court, which gives notice and affords an opportunity to be heard, may be sufficient to constitute due process of law. Iowa C. R. Co. v. Iowa, 160 U. S. 389 (40: 467).

Notice necessary for due process of law in determining the right to the succession of real estate, whether by ordinary administration proceedings or by proceedings in escheat, is afforded by actual notice by service of summons to all known claimants, and constructive notice by publication to all possible claimants who are unknown. Hamilton v. Brown, 161 U. S. 256 (40: 691).

Due process of law requires that an accused person shall plead or be ordered to plead, or in a proper case that a plea of not guilty be filed for him, before his trial can rightfully proceed. Crain v. United States, 162 U. S. 625 (40: 1097).

The finding of an indictment by a grand jury of less than thirteen does not violate the due process clause of the Constitution. Talton v. Mayes, 163 U. S. 370 (40: 196).

No denial of due process of law appears by the decision of a state court against the claim of a prisoner that the state Constitution and laws respecting reprieves and warrants for execution has not been complied with. Lambert v. Barrett, 159 U. S. 660 (40 : 296).

A state law conferring judicial powers on jury commissioners in selecting jurors does not for that reason conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Murray v. Louisiana, 163 U. S. 101 (41: 87).

A denial of due process of law by a state court is not shown by the fact that one of the jurors by whom the trial was had was an alien, where it does not appear when this fact came to the knowledge of the defendant, or when he took exception to the juror. Kohl v. Lehlback, 160 U. S. 293 (40: 432).

Due process of law signifies a right to be heard in one's defense. Hovey v. Elliott, 167 U. S. 409 (42: 215).

The denial of the right of appeal from judgments of justices of the peace where the amount claimed does not exceed $20 does not violate the Nebraska Bill of Rights, § 3, prohibiting the taking of private property without due process of law. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Headrick, 49 Neb. 286.

Due process of law is not denied by Wash. act March 19, 1895, making it an offense to employ a female in a place where intoxicating liquor is sold. State v. Considine, 16 Wash. 358.

The right of a citizen of a state to send a notification by mail to an insurance company in another state, which is not authorized to do business in the state where he resides, in order that insurance previously provided for by a valid contract made and to be performed outside the state might attach to the property specified in a shipment mentioned in the notice, although the property was then within the state, cannot be prohibited by a state statute, since that right is included in the "liberty" of the citizen which is protected against deprivation without due process of law. Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578 (41: 832).

The dismissal of a writ of error taken by the accused from a conviction, because he has escaped and is a fugitive from justice, is not a denial of due process of law within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. Allen v. Georgia, 166 U. S. 138 (41: 949).

The provision of the United States Constitution against deprivation of liberty without due process of law does not govern the manner of arraigning and accusing a defendant under state laws. Re Krug, 79 Fed. Rep. 308.

The prohibition of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution against taking property without due process of law refers to all instrumentalities of a state, and is therefore violated whenever any person, by virtue of public position under a state government, deprives another of any right protected by that amendment against deprivation by the state. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 258 (41: 979, 993).

A decree pro confesso entered after striking defendant's answer from the files because of his contempt in refusing to obey an order of the court is void for want of due process of law. Hovey v. Elliott, 167 U. S. 409 (42: 215).

The state cannot take away or destroy the rights of a riparian owner without his consent and without compensation and without due process of law, for the sole purpose of benefiting some other riparian owner, or for any other mere private purpose. Priewe v. Wisconsin State Land & I. Co. 93 Wis. 534, 33 L. R. A. 645.

The provision of N. Y. Laws 1895, chap. 974, § 189, for a determination of the question of the forfeitlars regarding such violation, the governor directed him to show cause on a day named, at the office of the executive in Raleigh, why he should not be suspended from office, and a report thereof made to the next general assembly according to law, and he was directed on the return day of the notice to make answer and proofs in writing and to be present in person or by counsel, at his election.

On the return day the plaintiff in error appeared and denied in writing the various charges contained in the governor's communication, after which, in explanation of the charges, he made a written statement in regard to them. The plaintiff in error demanded of the governor that the evidence against him be produced, and that he have an opportunity to confront 588]*his accusers and cross-examine the witnesses. This demand was refused.

After receiving the answer and explanation of the plaintiff in error, and after hearing him upon the return day, the governor subsequently and on the 23d of September, 1897, sent him a written notice, in which he said to the plaintiff in error "that you have not only violated said act in the specification set out in said act, but that you have otherwise, within the meaning and intent and words of said act, become disqualified to act." The governor, therefore, assuming to proceed under the statute, further informed the plaintiff in error that he thereby suspended him "from the office of railroad commissioner and chairman of said commission, such suspension to continue until the question of your removal or restoration shall be determined by a majority of the general assembly in joint session. general assembly. You will further take notice that under and by virtue of the powers conferred and duties imposed by law upon the chief executive I have appointed L. C. Caldwell, Esq., of the county of Iredell, to fill the vacancy created by your suspension. Inasmuch as you are understood to deny the power of the executive to suspend you from office, as provided by the statutes, I have requested Mr. Caldwell to make demand upon you for the possession of the office, and, upon your refusal, to bring action therefor to the end that the title to the office may be judicially determined.

"D. L. Russell, Governor."

The plaintiff in error in reply to the communication of the governor sent him the following letter:

Raleigh, N. C., September 24, 1897.

To D. L. Russell, Governor.

Sir: Yours of the 23d inst. is hereby acknowledged. In reply I will say that I shall disregard your order to suspend, but will continue to do business at the old stand until re-

Jas. W. Wilson,
Chairman Railroad Commission.

Mr. Caldwell duly qualified as a railroad commissioner, and thereupon demanded that the plaintiff in error should surrender the office papers, records, etc., to him, which the plaintiff in error refused to do. Mr. Caldwell then obtained leave from the attorney general to bring this action in the nature of a quo warranto, to test the title to the office. In the complaint the foregoing facts are set forth and a judgment asked determining the title to the office to be in relator and granting him judgment for the possession thereof.

The defendant below served an answer, in which it was admitted that the governor undertook or attempted to suspend the defendant from his office, and that he designated the plaintiff, the relator, for the vacancy which he had attempted to create, and that the relator had taken the oath prescribed by law for railroad commissioner. It was also admitted that the defendant refused to vacate his office or to surrender the same to the relator, and the defendant alleged that he was advised that his suspension was illegal, and that he was still entitled to discharge the duties of his office. He also set up that by an act of the general assembly of the state the railroad commission had been constituted a court of record inferior to the supreme court, to be known as the board of railroad commissioners, and with general jurisdiction as to all subjects embraced in the act creating the commission. Being a judge of a court of record, the defendant alleged that the governor had no constitutional power to suspend him.

The answer then set forth the proceedings already mentioned, resulting in the suspension of the defendant by the governor, and it also set forth the various demands made by defendant before the governor, to be confronted with witnesses and to have an opportunity to cross examine them, and the governor's refusal 590] of those demands, and as a result *the defendant alleged that the governor had without evidence and without trial found that the defendant had violated the law, and had become disqualified to act as a railroad commissioner, and that he had, without a more specific finding, assumed to suspend the defendant and deprive him of his office.

The defendant also alleged in his answer that the action of the governor was taken in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Upon these pleadings the action came on for trial, and the record states that "at the conclusion of the reading of the pleadings the defendant tendered the following issues, and demanded a trial by jury:

"1. Is the plaintiff entitled to the office of railroad commissioner?

"2. Does the defendant unlawfully intrude into, hold, and exercise the office of railroad commissioner and chairman of said commission?

"3. Has the defendant acquired any interest in any way in the Southern Railway Company in violation of law?

"4. Has the defendant become disqualified to act as a fair judge or commissioner, or has he become in any way disqualified to act?

"5. Did the defendant prior to September 1, 1897, sell and convey for a valuable consideration the Round Knob Hotel to R. M. Brown?

"6. Did the defendant demand of the governor that the evidence against him be produced and that he have an opportunity to confront his accusers and cross-examine the witnesses against him?

"7. Was said demand refused?

"8. Was any evidence produced?"

The court refused to submit these questions to the jury, and the defendant excepted.

The plaintiff thereupon moved for judgment upon the complaint and answer. The defendant objected that the motion was irregular and that the plaintiff should either demur or go to trial before the jury, and that the statute in question and the action of the governor, set out in the pleadings, deprived *defendant of [591 his office without due process of law and denied to him the equal protection of the laws, in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the protection of which he expressly claimed.

The court ruled that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment upon the pleadings, which judgment was thereupon rendered, and the defendant excepted and appealed to the supreme court of the state. After argument that court adjudged that the defendant had been lawfully suspended from the office of railroad commissioner; that the relator had been duly appointed to fill the vacancy thus created, and that the defendant should be ousted from and the relator inducted into that office. Judgment to that effect was accordingly entered. The defendant then sued out a writ of error from this court, which was allowed by the chief justice of the supreme court of the state.

Messrs. R. O. Burton and Thomas N. Hill for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. James C. Mac Rae, William H. Day, and A. C. Avery for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

A consideration of the facts convinces us that the motion to dismiss this writ of error for lack of jurisdiction ought to be granted.

Under the statute of 1891, creating the railroad commission and providing for the appointment, suspension, and removal of the officers of such commission, the act of the governor in suspending the plaintiff in error was not a finality. Before there could be any removal, the fact of suspension was to be reported to the next legislature by the governor, and unless that body removed the officer the effect was to reinstate him in office, and he then became entitled to the salary during the time of his suspension.

592] *In speaking of the statute and the purpose of this particular provision the supreme court of the state said: "The duty of suspension was imposed upon the governor from the highest motives of public policy to prevent the danger to the public interests which might arise from leaving such great powers and responsibilities in the hands of men legally disqualified. To leave them in full charge of their office until the next biennial session of the legislature, or pending litigation which might be continued for years, would destroy the very object of the law. As the governor was, therefore, by the very letter and spirit of the law, required to act, and act promptly, necessarily upon his own findings of fact, we are compelled to hold that such official action was, under the circumstances, due process of law. Even if it were proper, the governor would have no power to direct an issue like a chancellor."

The highest court of the state has held that this statute was not a violation of the Constitution of the state; that the hearing before the governor was sufficient; that the office was substantially an administrative one, although the commission was designated, by a statute subsequent to that which created it, a court of record; that the officer taking office under the statute was bound to take it on the terms provided for therein; that he was lawfully suspended from office; and that he was not entitled to a trial by jury upon the hearing of this case in the trial court. As a result the court held that the defendant had not been deprived of his property without due process of law, nor had he been denied the equal protection of the laws.

The controversy relates exclusively to the title to a state office, created by a statute of the state, and to the rights of one who was elected to the office so created. Those rights are to be measured by the statute and by the Constitution of the state, excepting in so far as they may be protected by any provision of the Federal Constitution.

Authorities are not required to support the general proposition that in the consideration of the Constitution or laws of a state this court follows the construction given to those instruments by the highest court of the state. The ex-

593]ceptions to *this rule do not embrace the case now before us. We are therefore concluded by the decision of the supreme court of North Carolina as to the proper construction of the statute itself, and that as construed it does not violate the Constitution of the state.

The only question for us to review is whether the state, through the action of its governor and judiciary, has deprived the plaintiff in error of his property without due process of law, or denied to him the equal protection of the laws.

We are of opinion the plaintiff in error was not deprived of any right guaranteed to him by the Federal Constitution, by reason of the proceedings before the governor under the statute above mentioned, and resulting in his suspension from office.

The proceedure was in aecordance with the Constitution and laws of the state. It was taken under a valid statute creating a state office in a constitutional manner, as the state court has held. What kind and how much of a hearing the officer should have before suspension by the governor was a matter for the state legislature to determine, having regard to the Constitution of the state. The procedure provided by a valid state law for the purpose of changing the incumbent of a state office will not in general involve any question for review by this court. A law of that kind does but provide for the carrying out and enforcement of a policy of a state with reference to its political and internal administration, and a decision of the state court in regard to its construction and validity will generally be conclusive here. The facts would have to be most rare and exceptional which would give rise in a case of this nature to a Federal question.

Upon this subject it was said in the case of Allen v. Georgia, 166 U. S. 138 [41: 949], as follows: "To justify any interference upon our part it is necessary to show that the course pursued has deprived, or will deprive, the plaintiff in error of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Without attempting to define exactly in what due process of law consists, it is sufficient to say that, if the supreme court of a state has acted in consonance with the constitutional *laws of a state[594 and its own procedure, it could only be in very exceptional circumstances that this court would feel justified in saying that there had been a failure of due legal process. We might ourselves have pursued a different course in this case, but that is not the test. The plaintiff in error must have been deprived of one of those fundamental rights, the observance of which is indispensable to the liberty of the citizen to justify our interference."

This statement is quoted with approval in Hovey v. Elliott, 167 U. S. 409, at 443 [42: 215, at 230].

No such fundamental rights were involved in the proceedings before the governor. In its internal administration the state (so far as concerns the Federal government) has entire freedom of choice as to the creation of an office for purely state purposes, and of the terms upon which it shall be held by the person filling the office. And in such matters the decision of the state court that the procedure by which an officer has been suspended or removed from office was regular and was under a constitutional and valid statute, must generally be conclusive in this court.

In Kennard v. Louisiana [Morgan], 92 U. S. 480 [23: 478], the proceeding under which the title to the office of justice of the supreme court of the state was tried, was held not to violate the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The court said the officer had an opportunity to be heard before he was condemned. There was no intimation in that case that a hearing such as was had here would be insufficient or that the officer would be entitled to be "confronted with his accusers and to cross-examine the witnesses," and to have a jury trial. In Foster v. Kansas [Johnson], 112 U. S. 201 [28: 629], the Kennard Case was approved. Neither case gives any support to the claim that such a hearing as was given in this case would be insufficient under the 14th Amendment.

Nothing in that Amendment was intended to secure a jury trial in a case of this nature.

The demand made by the plaintiff in error for such a trial in the court below must have been for the purpose of submitting to the jury the question of the truth of the allegations set 595]*up in the answer regarding the proceedings before the governor, and to claim that if the jury found them to be true, he was not legally suspended. But the motion for judgment on the pleadings was equivalent to a demurrer to the answer for insufficiency, and was therefore an admission of all the facts well pleaded. The question then became one of law for the court to decide, and in granting the motion the court did decide that no defense was set forth in the answer In a case like this, such a decision of the state court is conclusive. The mere refusal of a jury trial, in and of itself, and separated from all other matters, raises no Federal question. Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90 [23: 678].

In the proceedings for trying the title to office in the case of Kennard v. Louisiana [Morgan], 92 U. S. supra, the statute provided for a hearing without a jury, and this court held it was not objectionable for that reason.

Upon the case made by the plaintiff in error, the Federal question which he attempts to raise is so unfounded in substance that we are justified in saying that it does not really exist; that there is no fair color for claiming that his rights under the Federal Constitution have been violated, either by depriving him of his property without due process of law or by denying him the equal protection of the laws

In Hamblin v. Western Land Company, 147 U. S 531 [37: 267], it was stated that "a real, and not a fictitious, Federal question is essential to the jurisdiction of this court over the judgments of state courts. Millingar v. Hartupee, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 258 [18: 829]; New Orleans v. New Orleans Water Works Co. 142 U. S 79, 87 [35: 943, 946]. In the latter case it was said that 'the bare averment of a Federal question is not in all cases sufficient. It must not be wholly without foundation. There must be at least color of ground for such averment, otherwise a Federal question might be set up in almost any case, and the jurisdiction of this court invoked simply for the purpose of delay.' "

We think this case falls within the principle thus stated. Although an office has been held in North Carolina to be generally and in a certain restricted sense the property of the incumbent, yet in this case the supreme court held that the *incumbent, in taking the office, [596 holds it subject to the act creating it, which binds him by all its provisions, all of which were held to be valid. We should be very reluctant to decide that we had jurisdiction in such a case, and thus in an action of this nature to supervise and review the political administration of a state government by its own officials and through its own courts. The jurisdiction of this court would only exist in case there had been, by reason of the statute and the proceedings under it, such a plain and substantial departure from the fundamental principles upon which our government is based that it could with truth and propriety be said that if the judgment were suffered to remain, the party aggrieved would be deprived of his life, liberty, or property in violation of the provisions of the Federal Constitution.

We are of opinion that the facts herein present no such case, and that the jurisdiction of this court does not extend to the case as made in the record now before us.

For these reasons the motion of the defendant in error to dismiss this writ should be granted, and the writ is accordingly dismissed.

The following are the facts upon the motion to punish defendant in error as for a contempt:

The plaintiff in error, after the entry of the judgment of the supreme court affirming the judgment of ouster, sued out a writ of error from this court, which was duly allowed by the chief justice of the supreme court of that state on the 23d day of December, 1897, and on the same day a good and sufficient bond, conditioned as required by law in cases of supersedeas, was tendered, and the chief justice duly approved it and signed the citation. A few minutes after 7 o'clock in the afternoon of that day the writ of error with the petition therefor and the assignment of errors and the citation and bond were filed in the clerk's office of the state supreme court, and at the same time copies of the writ of error were lodged in the clerk's office, for the state of North Carolina and for the relator. The plaintiff in error alleged, on *information and belief, that the [597 relator, with full knowledge of the issuing of the writ and of the action of the chief justice, broke into the room occupied as offices by the railroad commission and took possession. The judgment of affirmance directed the issuing of a writ of possession. On the morning of the 24th of December, 1897, counsel for the relator made a motion in the state court to set aside the supersedeas, while at the same time counsel for the plaintiff in error made a motion that the execution of the writ of possession issued on the judgment of the state court be recalled on account of the supersedeas. Both motions were refused, and an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Clark holding that the judgment of the court ex proprio vigore placed the relator in the possession of the office at the time the judgment was filed, and that such judgment took effect immediately upon being entered, and it was not superseded by the subsequent writ of error, regular or irregular. He also held that the court had no power to set aside the writ of error or to pass upon the regularity thereof.

The relator made answer under oath. He alleged that after the judgment of the supreme court of North Carolina was rendered, and pursuant to its directions, a writ was issued out of that court at half past 5 o'clock of that day, and was immediately placed in the hands of the sheriff, and that the sheriff went to the offices of the railroad commission for the purpose of executing the writ, but that the plaintiff in error could not be found, and that he was absent from the county and state for the purpose, as alleged, of avoiding service of the writ; that the doors of the commission's rooms were locked, and the sheriff left the building for the purpose of getting keys or other means of entry, but did not return, and that the relator, after waiting a reasonable time for the return of the sheriff and being advised by counsel that he had good right in law so to do, procured the door of the room to be opened, and he then entered therein and assumed to exercise the duties of the office of railroad commissioner.

He denied under oath that any notice of the filing of a supersedeas by the plaintiff in error was served upon him, or that he had any knowledge of the filing of said bond until the 598] *day after the taking possession of the rooms of the commission as above stated.

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error claims that by virtue of the allowance of the writ of error and the filing of the supersedeas bond, the relator was precluded from taking any step under the judgment of the state court, which ousted the plaintiff in error and adjudged the right to the office to be in the relator. It is argued that the filing of a proper bond operates as a supersedeas of the judgment in an action in the nature of a quo warranto, as well as in any other action. United States, Crawford, v. Addison, 63 U. S. 22 How. 174 [16: 304]. In that case Addison held the office of mayor of the city of Georgetown. Proceedings in the nature of quo warranto were commenced against him by the United States on the relation of Crawford. Upon the trial of the action judgment of ouster was entered against the defendant. A writ of error from this court was sued out by him and a sufficient bond was filed. The relator applied to this court for a peremptory writ of mandamus to be directed to the judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia commanding them to execute the judgment of that court by which Addison had been ousted and the relator adjudged entitled to the office. This court denied the motion, and decided that after a writ of error had been sued out from this court and the proper bond filed further proceedings were stayed in the court below. It was not a case where immediately upon the entering of the judgment of ouster the court had directed the possession of the office to be taken by the relator, who had taken possession accordingly. The court was asked to actively intervene to put the relator in possession of the office, notwithstanding the allowance of a writ of error and the filing of a bond. The court refused to do so, holding that the supersedeas bond stayed further proceedings under the judgment.

*In Foster v. Kansas [Johnson], 112 U. [599 S. 201 [28:629], the attorney general of Kansas had instituted a proceeding to remove Foster, the plaintiff in error, from the office of county attorney for Saline county. The supreme court of Kansas rendered judgment on the 1st of April, 1884, removing Foster, and, under a statute of the state making it his duty so to do, the judge of the district court of Saline county, upon being presented with an authenticated copy of the record of the supreme court which removed Foster, duly appointed Moore to such office, and approved his bond on the 7th of April. A writ of error from this court had been allowed in Washington on the 5th of April, and the supersedeas bond approved and citation signed. Although notice of these facts was telegraphed on the same day from Washington to counsel in Kansas, who immediately exhibited the telegram to the judge of the district court, and notified him of what had been done in Washington, yet neither the writ of error nor the supersedeas bond arrived from Washington until the 8th of April, on which day they were duly lodged in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the state. Moore, the appointee of the district judge, thereafter appeared as county attorney, and a rule was therefore granted requiring him to appear before this court and show cause why he should not be adjudged in contempt for violating the supersedeas. This court, after argument, held that he was not in contempt, and that the supersedeas was not in force when Moore was appointed to and accepted the office. The court said: "The judgment operated of itself to remove Foster and leave his office vacant. It needed no execution to carry it into effect. The statute gave the judge of the district court authority to fill the vacancy thus created. The judge was officially notified of the vacancy on the 7th, when the authenticated copy of the record of the supreme court was presented to him. The operation of that judgment was not stayed by the supersedeas until the 8th, that being the date of the lodging of the writ of error in the clerk's office. It follows that the office was in fact vacant when Moore accepted his appointment, gave his bond, and took the requisite oath. He was thus in office before the supersedeas became operative. *What effect the supersedeas had, when it [600 was afterwards obtained, on the previous appointment, we need not consider. This is not an appropriate form of proceeding to determine whether Foster or Moore is now legally in office." The rule was therefore discharged.

In this case it is also true that the judgment operated of itself to remove the plaintiff in error. The judgment also adjudged the title to the office to be in the relator. After the filing of the supersedeas bond it may be assumed that further action under the judgment was stayed. The question is whether the relator is shown to be guilty of a contempt in proceeding to take possession after he knew of the filing of the bond. He swears unequivocally that he was ignorant of the fact of the allowance of a writ or the filing of the bond at the time when he took possession of the room occupied by the commission, and that he was not informed of that fact until some time the next day. We think this a sufficient answer to the case as it is now presented to us, and that any further proceeding is rendered unnecessary because of our conclusion to dismiss the writ of error for want of jurisdiction. We see no evidence of any intentional contempt on the part of relator, and our conclusion is that the rule must be discharged.

In No. 559 (S. Otho Wilson, Plff. in Err., v. State of North Carolina, etc.), the same questions are involved and the same orders are made.

UNITED STATES, ex rel. ALFRED BERNARDIN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH, Commissioner of Patents.

Mandamus against public officer—abates by his death.

1. On the death of the commissioner of patents pending a writ of error in a proceeding against him for a mandamus, the proceeding abates, and his successor cannot be substituted instead of the deceased, without statutory authority.

2. An action for a mandamus against an officer of the government is a personal action, and abates on his death or retirement from office; and the Maryland law of 1785, chap. 80, § 1, providing that no action shall abate by the death of a party, but shall be continued, and that the person interested on the part of the defendant may appear therein does not apply to such action for mandamus.

Submitted February 21, 1898. Decided March 21, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of that District dismissing a petition for a mandamus to compel the Commissioner of Patents to issue a patent. On motion to substitute Hon. C. H. Duell, present Commissioner of Patents, as defendant in error in place of the Hon. Benjamin Butterworth, deceased. Motion refused and judgment of court of appeals reversed, and cause remanded to that court with directions to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and remand the cause to that court with directions to dismiss the petition for the writ of mandamus because of the death of the defendant Benjamin Butterworth.

See same case below, 10 App. D. C. 294.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Julian C. Dowell for Bernardin, plaintiff in error, in favor of motion.

Mr. John K. Richards, Solicitor General, for defendant in error, in opposition to motion.

Mr. J. M. Wilson for the Crown Cork & Seal Company, the party in interest, in opposition to motion.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

On March 23, 1895, John S. Seymour, Commissioner of Patents, on appeal in an interference proceeding between the applications of Alfred S. Bernardin and William H. Northall decided that Barnardin was entitled to a patent for the invention involved in the interference. From this decision an appeal was taken by Northall to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and the decision of the Commissioner was by that court reversed.

Bernardin then instituted proceedings in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, seeking to compel the Commissioner to issue a patent in accordance with his previous decision, claiming that the act of Congress approved February 9, 1893, which, in form, confers jurisdiction upon the court of appeals of the District of Columbia to hear appeals from the action of the Commissioner of Patents, is unconstitutional and void, in that it attempts to confer jurisdiction upon that court to review or reverse the action of the Commissioner.

The supreme court of the District of Columbia dismissed the petition for mandamus, and on appeal the court of appeals of the District sustained the judgment of the supreme court. Bernardin v. Seymour, 10 App. D. C. 294.

Thereafter John S. Seymour resigned his office as Commissioner of Patents, and, on April 12, 1897, Benjamin Butterworth was appointed his successor. On April 17, 1897, Bernardin filed a new petition for mandamus in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which was dismissed, and that decision was, on appeal to the court of appeals of the District, on May 11, 1897, affirmed.

*On May 25, 1897, a writ of error was [602 allowed from this court, and while the case was here pending, on January 16, 1898, Benjamin Butterworth died, and C. H. Duell was thereafter appointed to the office thus left vacant; and a motion has been made for leave to substitute Duell in the stead of Butterworth, notwithstanding that by the death of the latter the action had abated.

The question thus presented is not a novel one. In The Secretary v. McGarrahan [Cox v. United States, McGarrahan], 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 298 [19: 579], it was held that a judgment in mandamus ordering the performance of an official duty against an officer, as if yet in office, when in fact he had gone out after service of the writ, and before the judgment, is void, and cannot be executed against his successor. In United States v. Boutwell, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 604 [21: 721], it was held that, in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, a mandamus against an officer of the government abates on his death or retirement from office, and that his successor in office cannot be brought in by way of amendment of the proceeding, or on an order for the substitution of parties. The conclusion reached was put upon two independent grounds, and we quote the reasoning of the court, expressed in its opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Strong, as follows:

"The office of a writ of mandamus is to NOTE.—As to when mandamus will issue, see note to M'Cluny v. Silliman, 4: 263.

As to mandamus to control inferior courts; discretion,—see note to Re Morgan, 29: 135.

compel the performance of a duty resting upon the person to whom the writ is sent. That duty may have originated in one way or another. It may, as is alleged in the present case, have arisen from the acceptance of an office which has imposed the duty upon its incumbent. But no matter out of what facts or relations the duty has grown, what the law regards, and what it seeks to enforce by a writ of mandamus, is the personal obligation of the individual to whom it addresses the writ. If he be an officer, and the duty be an official one, still the writ is aimed exclusively against him as a person, and he only can be punished for disobedience. The writ does not reach the office. It cannot be directed to it. It is, therefore, in substance, a personal action, and it rests upon the averred and assumed fact that the defendant has neglected or refused to perform a personal duty, to the performance of which by him the relator has a clear right. 603]*Hence it is an imperative rule that previous to making application for writ to command the performance of any particular act, an express and distinct demand or request to perform it must have been made by the relator or prosecutor upon the defendant, and it must appear that he refused to comply with such demand, either in direct terms or by conduct from which a refusal can be conclusively inferred. Thus it is the personal default of the defendant that warrants impetration of the writ, and if a peremptory mandamus be awarded, the costs must fall upon the defendant. It necessarily follows from this, that on the death or retirement from office of the original defendant, the writ must abate in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary. When the personal duty exists only so long as the office is held, the court cannot compel the defendant to perform it after his power to perform has ceased. And if a successor in office may be substituted, he may be mulcted in costs for the fault of his predecessor, without any delinquency of his own. Besides were a demand made upon him, he might discharge the duty and render the interposition of the court unnecessary. At all events, he is not in privity with his predecessor, much less is he his predecessor's personal representative. . . .

"And, even if the retirement of the defendant from office and his consequent inability to perform the act demanded to be done does not abate the writ, or necessitate its discontinuance, there is still an insuperable difficulty in the way of our directing the substitution asked for. We can exercise only appellate power. We have no original jurisdiction in the case. But any summons issued, or rule upon . . . [the successor in office] requiring him to become a party to the suit, would be the exercise of original jurisdiction over both a new party and a new cause, for the duty which he would be required to perform would be his own, not that of his predecessor."

In Thompson v. United States, 103 U. S. 480 [26: 521], the distinction is pointed out between proceedings where the obligation sought to be enforced devolves upon a corporation or continuing body, and those where the duty is personal with the officer. In the former case there is no abatement. The duty is perpetual *upon the corporation; in the latter, the [604 delinquency charged is personal, and involves no charge against the government, against which a proceeding would not lie.

United States, Warden, v. Chandler, 122 U. S. 643 [30: 1244], was the case of a writ of error in review of a judgment of the supreme court of the District of Columbia refusing a mandamus against William E. Chandler, Secretary of the Navy, to require of him the performance of certain alleged official duties. When the case was called it appeared that Mr. Chandler was no longer secretary, and that the office was filled by his successor. Thereupon this court, upon the authority of United States v. Boutwell, held that the suit had abated, and dismissed the writ of error.

A similar view prevailed in United States, Long, v. Lochren, 164 U. S. 701 [41: 1181].

In Warner Valley Stock Company v. Smith 165 U. S. 28]41: 621], the subject was considered at some length. There a bill had been filed against Hoke Smith, as Secretary of the Interior, to compel him to cause patents to be issued to the plaintiff for certain tracts of land. The supreme court of the District sustained a demurrer to the bill and dismissed the suit. While an appeal in this court was pending Hoke Smith resigned his office, and it was held that the bill could not be amended by making his successor a defendant, because he was not in office before the bill was filed and had no part in the doings complained of, and accordingly the cause was remanded with directions to dismiss the bill. In discussing the case Mr. Justice Gray cited the cases just mentioned and several others to the same effect, and again pointed out the difference between the case of a public officer of the United States and that of a municipal board, which is a continuing corporation, although its individual members may be changed, to which in its corporate capacity a writ of mandamus may be directed; and in respect to which the language of Chief Justice Waite, in Learenworth County Commissioners v. Sellew, 99 U. S. 626 [25: 335], was quoted: "One of the objects in creating such corporations, capable of suing and being sued, and having perpetual succession, is that the very inconvenience which manifested itself in Boutwell's Case may be avoided."

*In the absence, therefore, of statutory [605 authority, we cannot, after a cause of this character has abated, bring a new party into the case. Nor is the want of such authority supplied by the consent of a person not a party in the cause.

It is, however, contended that an act of the state of Maryland enacted in 1785, chap. 80, § 1, and which, it is claimed, became the law of the District of Columbia when the territory thereof was ceded to the United States, is applicable. The terms of said section are as follows:

"No action brought, or to be brought, in any court of this state shall abate by the death of either of the parties to such action, but upon the death of any defendant, in a case where the action by such death would have abated before this act, the action shall be continued, and the heir, devisee, executor, or administrator of the defendant, as the case may require, or other persons interested on the part of the defendant, may appear to such action."

It is suggested that the attention of this court was not called to this statute in the previous cases. However that may have been, we are unable to perceive that this statute, either in its terms or its spirit, is applicable to cases like the present one. Neither the heir, devisee, executor, or administrator of a deceased official would have any legal interest in such a controversy. Nor, in the case of a resignation, could the successor be said to be "a person interested on the part of the defendant."

In view of the inconvenience, of which the present case is a striking instance, occasioned by this state of the law, it would seem desirable that Congress should provide for the difficulty by enacting that, in the case of suits against the heads of the departments abating by death or resignation, it should be lawful for the successor in office to be brought into the case by petition, or some other appropriate method.

The motion is refused and the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, the costs in this court to be paid by the plaintiff in error, and 606] *the cause remanded to that court with directions to reverse the judgment of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and remand the cause to that court with directions to dismiss the petition for the writ of mandamus because of the death of the defendant Butterworth.

Validity of patent—attempted reissue—due process of law.

1. If the owner of a patent applies to the patent office for a reissue of it, and includes in his application the same claims as were in the old patent, and the primary examiner rejects some of such claims for want of patentable novelty, and allows others, both old and new, the owner of the patent, by taking no appeal and abandoning his application for reissue, does not hold the original patent, the return of which he procures from the patent office, invalidated as to those of its claims which were so disallowed in the proceeding for reissue.
2. Until the amended patent has been issued the original stands precisely as if a reissue had never been applied for.
3. To cancel a patent upon an application for reissue, when the first patent is considered invalid by the examiner, would be to deprive the applicant of his property without due process of law.

Argued December 1, 2, 1897. Decided March 21, 1898.

ON A CERTIFICATE from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit certifying a question upon which instruction is desired in a suit in equity brought by the McCormick Harvesting Machine Company against C. Aultman et al., and also in a suit in equity brought by the same plaintiff against the Aultman-Miller Company, in each of which it was sought to restrain the defendant from the future infringement of two patents, one of which was issued to Marquis L. Gorham, February 9, 1875, and to recover damages for past infringements. Question answered in the negative.

See same case below, 58 Fed. Rep. 778.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was a question certified to this court by the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit, involving the authority of a primary examiner of the Patent Office to reject as invalid claims of an original patent which were incorporated in an application for a reissue.

It appears that the McCormick Harvesting Machine Company filed a bill of equity in the United States circuit court for the northern district of Ohio against C. Aultman et al., and also one against the Aultman-Miller Company, in each of *which it was sought to re- [607 strain the defendant from the future infringement of two patents covering automatic twine binders for harvesting machines. As the interests of the several defendants were closely identified the two cases were heard together.

The question certified involves only patent No. 159,506, issued to Marquis L. Gorham February 9, 1875, and the other patent sued upon will therefore not be considered. The record shows that there was filed in the Patent Office by the executrix of Gorham an application for a reissue of this patent, in which were included several claims of the original patent, as well as many new claims. Upon consideration, the assistant or primary examiner decided that claims 3, 10, 11, 25, and 26 of the original patent should be rejected for want of patentable novelty, and reference was made to prior patented devices. No appeal was taken from this decision, and subsequently, in compliance with a request, the original patent was returned to the plaintiff corporation, which had become the owner thereof. Thereafter these suits were brought against the defendants upon the original patent.

In the circuit court it was decided that, as the original claims 3, 10, 11, 25, and 26 had been determined by the examiner to be invalid, and no appeal had been taken from that decision, but the same had apparently been acquiesced in, the adverse action must be regarded as fatal to the claims in question, and to the same extent as if the rejection had been incident to the original application for the patent. 58 Fed. Rep. 778.

Upon appeal the circuit court of appeals [37 C. C. A. 358, note] decided that there was no infringement by the defendants as to claims 25 and 26, but that there was infringement of claims 3, 10, and 11 of the original patent, unless it should be determined that they were invalidated by their being rejected by the examiner upon an application for a reissue of the same; and, desiring instruction upon this point, it certified to this court the following question. "If the owner of a patent applies to the Patent Office for a reissue of it, and includes among the claims in the application the same claims as those which were included in the 608] *old patent, and the primary examiner rejects some of such claims for want of patentable novelty, by reference to prior patents, and allows others (both old and new, does the owner of the patent, by taking no appeal and by abandoning his application for reissue, hold the original patent (the return of which he procures from the Patent Office) invalidated as to those of its claims which were disallowed for want of patentable novelty by the primary examiner in the proceeding for reissue?"

Mr. Robert H. Parkinson for appellant.

Messrs. Thomas A. Banning, Edmund Wetmore, and Ephraim Banning for appellees.

Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court:

The validity of the claims in question depends upon the view taken of the action of the examiner in rejecting them when incorporated in an application for a reissue of the patent, upon the ground that the claims were wanting in patentable novelty, as evidenced by prior patents cited by him. No appeal was taken from this decision, and the matter lay in abeyance for nearly two years before the plaintiff corporation, which had in the meantime become the owner of the patent, abandoned the application for a reissue and requested and obtained from the Patent Office the return of the original patent.

It has been settled by repeated decisions of this court that when a patent has received the signature of the Secretary of the Interior, countersigned by the Commissioner of Patents, and has had affixed to it the seal of the Patent Office, it has passed beyond the control and jurisdiction of that office, and is not subject to be revoked or canceled by the President, or any other officer of the government. United States, McBride, v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378 [26: 167]; United States v. American Bell Telephone Co. 128 U. S. 315, 363 [32: 450, 460]. It has *become the property of the patentee, [609 and as such is entitled to the same legal protection as other property. Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 516 [20: 33]; Cammeyer v. Newton, 94 U. S. 225 [24: 72]; United States v. Palmer, 128 U. S. 262, 271 [32: 442, 445], citing James v. Campbell, 104 U. S. 356 [26: 786].

The only authority competent to set a patent aside, or to annul it, or to correct it for any reason whatever, is vested in the courts of the United States, and not in the department which issued the patent. Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530, 533 [24: 848, 850]; United States v. American Bell Telephone Co. 128 U. S. 315, 364 [32: 450, 461]; Michigan Land & Lumber Co. v. Rust, 168 U. S. 589, 593 [ante, 591, 592]. And in this respect a patent for an invention stands in the same position and is subject to the same limitations as a patent for a grant of lands. The power to issue either one of these patents comes from Congress and is vested in the same department. In the case of a patent for lands it has been held that when one has obtained a patent from the government he cannot be called upon to answer in regard to that patent before the officers of the Land Department, and that the only way his title can be impeached is by suit. United States v. Stone [Stone v. United States], 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 525, 535 [17: 765, 767]; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Campbell, 135 U. S. 286 [34: 155]; Noble v. Union River Logging Railroad Co. 147 U. S. 165 [37: 123]. But a suit may be maintained by the United States to set aside a patent for lands improperly issued by reason of mistake or fraud; but only in the case where the government has a direct interest, or is under obligation respecting the relief invoked. United States v. Missouri, K. & T. R. R. Co. 141 U. S. 358 [35: 766].

While a patent for a grant of lands is absolutely free from the future control of the officers of the Land Department after it has once issued, and jurisdiction over the matter cannot again be obtained, this is subject to a single qualification in the case of a patent for an invention where the patentee, his legal representatives or assigns, find the original patent inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming as his invention or discovery more than he had a right to claim as new (provided the error has arisen through inadvertence,*accident, or mistake, and with [610 out fraudulent or deceptive intention). In such case a reissue will be granted by the Commissioner upon the surrender of the patent, but such surrender takes effect only upon the issue of the amended patent. This provision is embodied in Rev. Stat. § 4916, which also declares that "the specifications and claim in every such case shall be subject to revision and restriction in the same manner as original applications, . . . but no new matter shall be introduced into the specification."

The plain purpose of this section is to give the patentee an opportunity to make valid and operative that which was before invalid and inoperative; invalid, because it claimed as new that which had been previously invented or used by the public; inoperative, because the specification was defective or insufficient. New matter cannot be introduced, nor can the scope of the invention be enlarged. All that the applicant can do is to so amend his patent as to enable him to receive some practical and beneficial result from his actual invention, of which he has been deprived by defects or omissions in the original patent. The object of a patentee applying for a reissue is not to reopen the question of the validity of the original patent, but to rectify any error which may have been found to have arisen from his inadvertence or mistake. But until the amended patent shall have been issued the original stands precisely as if a reissue had never been applied for (Allen v. Culp, 166 U. S. 501, 505 [41: 1093, 1095]), and must be returned to the owner upon demand. The fact that the rules of the Patent Office require that the original patent should be placed in its custody for the purpose of surrendering it upon the issue of an amended patent gives that department no right to the possession of it upon the rejection of the application for a reissue. If the patentee abandoned his application for a reissue, he is entitled to a return of his original patent precisely as it stood when such application was made and the Patent Office has no greater authority to mutilate it by rejecting any of its claims than it has to cancel the entire patent.

In Peck v. Collins, 103 U. S. 660 [26: 512], an application for reissue made under the laws in [611] force in 1866 was held to absolutely *extinguish the original patent. Subsequent to that time the law of 1870, of which Rev. Stat. § 4916, forms a part, was passed. Mr. Justice Bradley, in discussing the clause in that section which declares that the surrender "shall take effect upon the issue of the amended patent," said: "What may be the effect of this provision in cases where a reissue is refused, it is not necessary now to decide. Possibly it may be to enable the applicant to have a return of his original patent if a reissue is refused on some formal or other ground which does not affect the original claim. But if his title to the invention is disputed and adjudged against him, it would still seem that the effect of such a decision should be as fatal to his original patent as to his right to a reissue." This same question was considered but not decided in Eby v. King, 158 U. S. 366 [39: 1018], and in Allen v. Culp, 166 U. S. 501, 505 [41: 1093, 1095], it was held that if the original application for a reissue be rejected the original patent stands precisely as though a reissue had never been applied for; but the effect of the refusal of the reissue upon some ground equally affecting the original patent was not considered.

In neither of these cases was this court called upon to decide the question which has been certified, and the expression of opinion in Peck v. Collins, relied upon by the defendants, must be considered merely a dictum, and lacking the force of a judicial determination.

In the case under consideration the examiner acted upon the application as if it were a new proceeding, and dealt with it as the evidence before him seemed to warrant, but his action in rejecting some of the claims which had been repeated from the original patent did not affect that patent. It is true that it was within his power to reject any claims contained in the application for a reissue which he judged to be invalid, whether contained in the original patent or not. It is also true that the reasons given for the rejection of such claims might apply equally to the same claims contained in the original patent; but with respect to such claims he was functus officio. His opinion thereon was but his personal opinion, and however persuasive it might be, did not oust* the jurisdiction of any court [612] to which the owner might apply for an adjudication of his rights, and as the examiner had no authority to affect the claims of the original patent, no appeal was necessary from his decision.

Had the original patent been procured by fraud or deception it would have been the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to have had the matter referred to the Attorney General with the recommendation that a suit be instituted to cancel the patent; but to attempt to cancel a patent upon an application for reissue when the first patent is considered invalid by the examiner would be to deprive the applicant of his property without due process of law, and would be in fact an invasion of the judicial branch of the government by the executive.

Our conclusion upon the whole case is that, upon the issue of the original patent, the Patent Office had no power to revoke, cancel, or annul it. It had lost jurisdiction over it, and did not regain such jurisdiction by the application for a reissue. Upon application being made for such reissue the Patent Office was authorized to deal with all its claims, the originals as well as those inserted first in the application, and might declare them to be invalid, but such action would not affect the claims of the original patent, which remained in full force, if the application for a reissue were rejected or abandoned.

The validity of the claims, so far as their merits are concerned, has been sustained by the circuit court of appeals, and, as the original patent must stand precisely as though a reissue had never been applied for, the question certified to this court must be answered in the negative.

Federal question—state statute, when not repugnant to act of Congress—act of March 29, 1884—Kansas statute—effect of act of 1884—damages for bringing diseased cattle into state—regulation of commerce—Federal Constitution—state regulations—rule of evidence—U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5258—review of state judgment.

1. The answer and claim made by defeudant in the state court, that an act of Congress furnished a complete defense to the action to enforce a state statute, raised a Federal question; and the overruling of that defense by that court gives this court jurisdiction to review the state judgment.
2. A state statute enacted in execution of a reserved power of the state is not inconsistent with an act of Congress passed in execution of a clear power under the Federal Constitution, unless the repugnance is so direct and positive that the two acts cannot be reconciled or stand together.
3. The power of the states to protect their domestic cattle from contagious diseases was left untouched and unimpaired by the act of Congress of March 29, 1884.
4. The Kansas statute of 1885, as amended in 1891, for the protection of domestic animals from contagious diseases, is not inconsistent with the said act of Congress of March 29, 1884, for the suppression and extinction of contagious diseases of cattle.
5. The regulations established by virtue of said act of Congress did not take away from anyone the right to recover damages for bringing diseased cattle into contact with his domestic cattle.
6. The said Kansas statute giving a right of action for such damages is not a regulation of interstate commerce, but only declares a rule of civil liability, and was passed in execution of the power of the state to protect the rights of property and to provide for the redress of wrongs within its limits.
7. Nor is said statute of Kansas a regulation of commerce among the states simply because it may incidentally affect such commerce.
8. The Federal Constitution does not by its own force give anyone the right to introduce into a state, against its will, and without liability for damages, cattle so infected with disease as to be dangerous to domestic cattle.
9. State regulations of the enjoyment of rights or the performance of duties, that do not directly interfere with the Federal Constitution or act of Congress, must be respected until Congress intervenes: even although the subject may be within its control.
10. The rule established by said Kansas statutes that proof that the cattle were brought from south of the 37th parallel of north latitude should be prima facie evidence that they were capable of imparting Texas fever, and that their owner, or person in charge had knowledge or notice thereof, does not violate any right secured by the Federal Constitution, or obstruct commerce, as the rule implies that damages shall not be recovered if from all the evidence it appears that such owner or person had no such knowledge or notice.
11. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5258, which authorizes railroads to carry freight and property from one state to another, does not authorize them to carry into a state, in violation of state law, cattle known, or which by due diligence may be known, to be in such condition as to impart disease to the domestic cattle of such state.
12. This court cannot enter into the inquiry whether the finding of the jury in a state court is against the evidence; it can only consider, in this case, whether the state statute as interpreted by the jury is in violation of the Federal Constitution.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas to review a judgment of that court which affirmed by one final judgment judgments in favor of the plaintiff Charles Haber, and of each of several cross petitioners, in an action brought by said Charles Haber against the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company to recover damages sustained by said plaintiff, Charles Haber, by reason of the defendant having brought into that state certain cattle affected with the disease known as Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever and communicated by them to plaintiff's cattle whereby the latter sickened and died; in which action many persons having like causes of action intervened as parties defendant, and each by a cross petition asked and obtained judgment against the railway company. Affirmed.

See same case below, 56 Kan. 694.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Hagerman, T. N. Sedgwick, and Simon Sterne for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. E. W. Cunningham, J. Jay Buck, W. C. Perry, Eugene Hagan, and Madden Bros. for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in one of the courts of Kansas against the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company, a corporation of that state, and certain persons constituting the respective firms of F. Brogan & Sons and Hozier Bros. Its object was to recover the damages sustained by the plaintiff Charles Haber, one of the appellees, by reason of the defendants having brought and caused to be brought into that state certain cattle alleged to have been affected with the disease known as Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever, and communicated by them to the plaintiff's cattle whereby the latter sickened and died.

Many persons having like causes of action intervened as parties defendant, and each by cross petition asked judgment against the railway company.

It appeared in evidence that Hozier Bros. in the spring of 1892 owned and controlled a ranch of several thousand acres of land in Pecos county, Texas, upon which cattle known as Texas cattle were permitted to range. They entered into an agreement with F. Brogan & Sons, whereby the latter were to receive from the former a part of the above cattle at some point in Lyon county, Kansas, and take them to their ranch in Chase county in the same state to be there grazed during the summer of 1892. In execution of that agreement, Hozier Bros. caused to be shipped by railroad into Kansas from Pecos county, Texas, about 2,500 head of cattle which were delivered by defendant company in its stock yards at Hartford, Kansas, to F. Brogan & Sons, and by the latter were driven through Lyon and Chase counties to their range. These cattle, it was alleged, communicated Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever to domestic cattle that were owned by the plaintiff and by the cross petitioners.

The case was tried and submitted to the jury only as between the plaintiff, the cross petition-[616]ers, and the railway *company, the latter denying liability for any damages sustained by the former. The trial resulted in verdicts and judgments in favor of the plaintiff and of each of the cross petitioners. The judgments having been affirmed by one final judgment in the supreme court of Kansas, the case is here upon a writ of error sued out by the railway company, which contends that effect has been given to statutes of the state that are repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States. That contention involves the Federal question presented for determination.

In 1881 the legislature of Kansas passed an act for the protection of cattle in that state against contagious diseases. Laws of Kansas 1881, chap. 161. But those provisions need not be set out here, because they appear in subsequent enactments to which we will presently refer.

By a state enactment approved March 25, 1884, provision was made for a Live Stock Sanitary Commission, which was charged with the duty of protecting "the health of the domestic animals of the state from all contagious or infectious diseases of a malignant character," and was empowered to establish, maintain, and enforce such quarantine, sanitary, and other regulations as it deemed necessary. Laws of 1884, chap. 2. And by an act approved March 26, 1884, that commission was authorized to create and enforce quarantine against the disease known as Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever in the unorganized counties of the state. Laws of 1884, chap. 4, § 1. The commission was also authorized and directed by another act approved on the same day to co operate with the Commissioner of Agriculture of the United States or any officer of the general government in the suppression and extirpation of contagious diseases among domestic animals, and in the enforcement and execution of all acts of Congress passed to prevent the importation or exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious or contagious disease among domestic animals. Laws of 1884, chap. 5, § 1.

In 1885 another statute was passed, which was amended in 1891. Laws of 1891, chap. 201. As amended, and as it appears in General Statutes of Kansas of 1897, vol. 2, chap. 139, p. 761, *that statute made it a misdemeanor for [617 any person, between the 1st day of February and the 1st day of December of any year, to drive or cause to be driven into or through any county in the state, or to turn upon or cause to be turned or kept upon any highway, range, common or pasture within the state, any cattle capable of communicating or liable to impart what is known as Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever. § 13. By another section it was made the duty of any sheriff, under sheriff, deputy sheriff, or constable within the state, upon complaint made to him that there were within the county where such officer resided cattle believed to be capable of communicating or liable to impart the disease known as Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever, to forthwith take charge of and restrain them under such temporary quarantine regulations as would prevent the communication of such disease, and make immediate report thereof to the Live Stock Sanitary Commission. § 14.

Other sections provided—

"Sec. 16. Any person or persons who shall drive, ship, or transport, or cause to be shipped, driven, or transported, into or through any county in this state, any cattle liable or capable of communicating Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever to any domestic cattle of this state, shall be liable to any person or persons injured thereby for all damages that they may sustain by reason of the communication of said disease, or Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever; to be recovered in a civil action in any court of competent jurisdiction, and the parties so injured shall have a first and prior lien to all other liens for such damages on the cattle communicating the disease of Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever.

"Sec. 17. In the trial of any person charged with the violation of any provisions of this act, and in the trial of any civil action brought to recover damages for the communication of Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever, proof that the cattle which such person or persons are charged with shipping, driving, or keeping, or which are claimed to have communicated the said disease, were brought into this state from south of the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude, shall be taken as *prima facie [618 evidence that such cattle were, between the 1st day of February and the 1st day of December of the year in which the offense was committed, capable of communicating and liable to impart Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever, within the meaning of this act, and that the owner or owners or person or persons in charge of such cattle had full knowledge and notice thereof. If the owner or owners or person or persons in charge of said cattle shall show by such certificate or certificates as shall hereafter be designated by the Live Stock Sanitary Commission of the state, that the said cattle had been kept since the 1st day of December of the previous year west of the twenty-second meridian of longitude west from Washington, and north of the thirty-fourth parallel of north latitude, the provisions of this section shall not apply thereto.

"Sec. 18. Whenever two or more persons shall in violation of this act, at the same time or at different times during the same year, drive or cause to be driven upon the same highway, range, common, or pasture within this state any cattle capable of communicating or liable to impart Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever, they shall be jointly and severally liable for all damages that may arise from the communication of such disease at any time thereafter during the same year to any native, domestic, or acclimated cattle that shall have been upon the same highway, range, common, or pasture so previously traveled over by such first-mentioned cattle."

The general contention of the plaintiff in error is that the act of Congress of May 29, 1884 (23 Stat. at L. 31, chap. 60) known as the animal industry act, together with the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 1044, 1049, chap. 544), appropriating money to carry out the provisions of that act, and § 5258 of the Revised Statutes relating to the transportation of passengers, freight, property, etc., from one state to another state by railroad, cover substantially the whole subject of the transportation from one state to another state of live stock liable to impart or capable of communicating infectious or contagious diseases, and therefore that the state of Kansas has no authority to deal in any form with that subject.

619] *Are the acts of Congress and the regulations established under their authority of such a character that the legislation of Kansas is without effect so far as it relates to injury done to domestic cattle by the bringing into that state of cattle liable to impart or capable of communicating Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever to domestic cattle?

The act of Congress of May 29, 1884 (23 Stat. at L. 31, chap. 60), provided for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for the appointment of a chief thereof and two competent, practical stock raisers or experienced business men familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live stock, whose duty it should be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to investigate and report upon the condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other dangerous, contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases. §§ 1, 2.

By other sections of the act it was provided:

"Sec. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each state and territory, and invite said authorities to co operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any state or territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such state or territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and whenever the governor of a state or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions *of this [620 act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, and in such disinfection and quarantine measures, as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease from one state or territory into another.

"Sec. 4. That in order to promote the exportation of live stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro pneumonia, or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries, and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to ports from which live stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, from time to time, establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live stock as the results of said investigations may require.

"Sec. 5. That to prevent the exportation from any port of the United States to any port in a foreign country of live stock affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and especially pleuro pneumonia, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to take such steps and adopt such measures, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as he may deem necessary.

"Sec. 6. That no railroad company within the United States, or the owners or masters of any steam or sailing or other vessel or boat, shall receive for transportation or transport, from one state or territory to another, or from any state into the District of Columbia, or from the District into any state, any live stock affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro pneumonia; nor shall any person, company, or corporation deliver for such transportation to any railroad company, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, any live stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease; nor shall any person, company, or corporation drive on foot or transport in private con-621] veyance from *one state or territory to another, or from any state into the District of Columbia, or from the District into any state, any live stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro pneumonia: Provided, That the so-called splenetic or Texas fever shall not be considered a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease within the meaning of §§ 4 5, 6, and 7 of this act, as to cattle being transported by rail to market for slaughter, when the same are unloaded only to be fed and watered in lots on the way thereto.

"Sec. 7. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to notify, in writing, the proper officials or agents of any railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company doing business in or through any infected locality, and by publication in such newspapers as he may select, of the existence of said contagion; and any person or persons operating any such railroad, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, or owner or custodian of or person having control over such cattle or other live stock within such infected district, who shall knowingly violate the provisions of § 6 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

"Sec. 10. That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act."

1. The answer of the railway company as well as its requests for instructions, and the opinion of the supreme court of the state, show that the company contended throughout this litigation that legislation by Congress and the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture in execution of the animal industry act, furnished a complete defense to all claims for damages asserted in this action. That 622] contention *was overruled by the trial court, as well as by the supreme court of the state. If the contention of the railway company had been sustained, the verdict and judgment must have been in its favor without reference to any other question in the case. In other words, the state court could not properly have disposed of the case without deciding the Federal question raised by the company. This court therefore has jurisdiction to inquire whether the supreme court of Kansas erred in holding that the legislation of Congress and the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior† gave to the railway company the right, privilege, and immunity specially set up and claimed by it. The motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction in this court is consequently overruled. Willson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 245, 251 [7: 412, 414]; Chicago Life Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574, 579 [28: 1084, 1087]; Saycard v. Denny, 158 U. S. 180, 184 [39: 941, 943]; Chicago, Burlington, & Q. Rd. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 232 [41: 979, 983].

2. If §§ 16 and 17 of the Kansas act of 1885, as amended in 1891, are not inconsistent with the legislation of Congress, no question can be raised as to other provisions of the Kansas statutes. The 16th section, we have seen, provides that any person or persons, driving, shipping, or transporting, or causing to be driven, shipped, or transported, into or through any county in that state, cattle liable to impart or capable of communicating Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever to any domestic cattle of Kansas, shall be liable in a civil action to any person injured thereby for all damages sustained by reason of the communication of such fever to his cattle; while the 17th section makes the bringing into the state, from south of the 37th parallel of north latitude, of cattle alleged to have communicated Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever *to domestic cattle, prima facie [623 evidence that such cattle were, between February 1 and December 1 in any year, capable of communicating that disease, and that the owner or person in charge of such cattle had full knowledge and notice thereof.

May not these statutory provisions stand without obstructing or embarrassing the execution of the act of Congress? This question must of course be determined with reference to the settled rule that a statute enacted in execution of a reserved power of the state is not to be regarded as inconsistent with an act of Congress passed in the execution of a clear power under the Constitution, unless the repugnance or conflict is so direct and positive that the two acts cannot be reconciled or stand together. Sinnot v. Davenport, 63 U. S. 22 How. 227, 243 [16: 243, 247].

We have seen that the 1st section of the animal industry act provided for an investigation as to the condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of such diseases. The 2d section provided for an examination as to the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro pneumonia, and to guard against the spreading of other dangerous, contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases. If any state was ready to co-operate with the Commissioner of Agriculture, then, by the 3d section, that officer was authorized to use the money appropriated by Congress in such investigations and in such disinfection and quarantine measures as were necessary "to prevent the spread of the disease from one state or territory into another." While the states were invited to co-operate with the general government in the execution and enforcement of the act, whatever power they had to protect their domestic cattle against such diseases was left untouched and unimpaired by the act of Congress.

†By the act approved February 9, 1889 (25 Stat. at L. 659, chap. 122), the Department of Agriculture was made an executive department. And by the act of March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. at L. 835, 840, chap. 373), the authority granted to the Commissioner of Agriculture by the act of May 29, 1884 (23 Stat. at L. 31, chap. 60), establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, and by the provision of the appropriation act for the Agricultural Department, approved July 18, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 328, chap. 677), relating to that bureau, was vested in the Secretary of Agriculture. The regulations above referred to were issued by Secretary Rusk, February 26, 1892.

The act of Congress did not assume to give any corporation, company, or person the affirmative right to transport from one state to another state cattle that were liable to impart or capable of communicating contagious, in-624] fectious, or *communicable diseases. On the contrary, it was made a misdemeanor to deliver for transportation, or to transport or drive from one state to another, cattle known to be affected with contagious, infectious, or communicable diseases. Whether a corporation transporting, or the person causing to be transported from one state to another cattle of the class specified in the Kansas statute, should be liable in a civil action for any damages sustained by the owners of domestic cattle by reason of the introduction into their state of such diseased cattle, is a subject about which the animal industry act did not make any provision. That act does not declare that the regulations established by the Department of Agriculture should have the effect to exempt from civil liability one who, but for such regulations, would have been liable either under the general principles of law or under some state enactment, for damages arising out of the introduction into that state of cattle so affected. And, as will be seen from the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, that officer did not assume to give protection to anyone against such liability.

By those regulations the Secretary gave notice to the "managers and agents of railroad and transportation companies of the United States, stockmen, and others" that "a contagious and infectious disease known as splenetic or southern fever exists among cattle" within certain parts of the United States, the outer line of which area or boundary was fully defined by that officer. The same regulations provided that from the 1st day of March, to the 1st day of December, 1892, no cattle should be transported from any part of the country included in that area or boundary to any part of the United States north or west of the described line except by rail for immediate slaughter, and when so transported certain directions were to be observed in handling and caring for them. The regulations made provision for moving cattle from specified parts of Tennessee in accordance with the rules established by the authority of that state. Rules were also prescribed for moving cattle from named counties in Texas to the states of Colorado, Wyoming, and Montana, "in accordance 625] *with the regulations made by said states for the admission of southern cattle thereto."

The cattle in question were originally received by the Texas & Pacific Railroad at Midland, Texas, outside of but near to the boundary of the "infected district" as defined by the Secretary of Agriculture. They were received by the defendant company at Dennison, Texas, as a connecting carrier, in the same cars in which they were loaded, and the entire route to the southern boundary line of Kansas was through that district. It may be that in the transportation of the cattle in question from Pecos county, Texas, through the infected district, all the regulations prescribed by the secretary were observed. But that fact does not show that Congress intended or assumed to exempt anyone complying with those regulations from liability to the owners of domestic cattle to which were communicated the contagious disease with which the cattle brought into the state were affected. The controlling object of the regulations was to prevent the spreading from one state to another of the cattle disease in question, not to deprive anyone of the right to recover damages for injury inflicted upon his domestic cattle by reason of their being brought into contact with diseased cattle.

It is said that the statute of Kansas giving a right of action for damages is, in itself, a regulation of commerce among the states, and, therefore, inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate such commerce. But that statute is not, within the meaning of the Constitution, nor in any just sense, a regulation of commerce among the states. It cannot be supposed to have been so intended, even if its validity were to depend upon the intent with which it was enacted. It did nothing more than declare as a rule of civil liability in Kansas, that anyone driving, shipping, or transporting, or causing to be driven, shipped, or transported, into or through any county in that state, cattle liable to impart or capable of communicating Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever to domestic cattle, should be responsible in damages to any persons injured thereby. In fact, the state law is in aid of the objects which Congress had in view when it passed the animal industry act. It was *passed in execu 626] tion of a power with which the state did not part when entering the Union, namely, the power to protect the people in the enjoyment of their rights of property, and to provide for the redress of wrongs within its limits. We must not be understood as saying that this power may be so exerted as to defeat or burden the exercise of any power granted to Congress. On the contrary, a state statute, although enacted in pursuance of a power not surrendered to the general government, must, in the execution of its provisions, yield in case of conflict to a statute constitutionally enacted under authority conferred upon Congress; and this, as was said by Mr. Justice Nelson, speaking for the court in Sinnot v. Davenport, above cited, "without regard to the source of power whence the state legislature derived its enactment." This results, as was said by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 210 [6: 23, 73], as well from the nature of the government as from the words of the Constitution. In that case the argument was pressed that if a law passed by a state in the exercise of its acknowledged sovereignty comes into conflict with a law passed by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution, they affect the subject and each other like "equal opposing powers." Touching that view, the Chief Justice said: "But the framers of our Constitution foresaw this state of things, and provided for it, by declaring the supremacy, not only of itself, but of the laws made in pursuance of it. The nullity of any act inconsistent with the Constitution is produced by the declaration that the Constitution is the supreme law. The appropriate application of that part of the clause which confers the same supremacy on laws and treaties is to such acts of the state legislatures as do not transcend their powers, but, though enacted in the execution of acknowledged state powers, interfere with, or are contrary to the laws of Congress, made in pursuance of the Constitution, or some treaty made under the authority of the United States. In every such case, the act of Congress, or the treaty, is supreme; and the law of the state, though enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted, must yield to it."

Nor is the statute of Kansas to be deemed a 627] regulation of *commerce among the states, simply because it may incidentally or indirectly affect such commerce. Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 317 [41: 166, 174]; New York, N. H. & H. Railroad Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628, 631 [41: 853, 854]; Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133 [ante, 317]; Richmond & Alleghany Railroad Co. v. R. A. Patterson Tobacco Co. 169 U. S. 311 [ante, 385], and authorities cited in each case. Although the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states, and the power of the states to regulate their purely domestic affairs, are distinct powers, which, in their application, may at times bear upon the same subject, no collision that would disturb the harmony of the national and state governments, or produce any conflict between the two governments in the exercise of their respective powers, need occur, unless the national government, acting within the limits of its constitutional authority, takes under its immediate control and exclusive supervision the entire subject to which the state legislation may refer. "The same bale of goods," Mr. Justice Johnson well said in his concurring opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden, "the same cask of provisions, or the same ship, that may be the subject of commercial regulation, may also be the vehicle of disease. And the health laws that require them to be scopped and ventilated are no more intended as regulations on commerce then the laws which permit their importation are intended to inoculate the community with disease. Their different purposes mark the distinction between the powers brought into action; and, while frankly exercised, they can produce no serious collision." 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 235 [6: 79]. It is therefore a mistake to say that the Kansas statute, so far as it gives a right of action for injuries arising from disease communicated to domestic cattle by cattle of a particular kind brought into the state, comes into conflict with any regulation established under the authority of Congress to prevent the spread of contagious or infectious diseases from one state to another. That statute, we repeat, only embodies a rule of civil conduct prescribed by a state whose government is competent to regulate—in subordination always to 628] the supreme law of the land and its *own fundamental law—the relative rights and obligations of all within its jurisdiction. Neither corporations nor individuals are entitled, by force alone of the Constitution of the United States and without liability for injuries resulting therefrom to others, to bring into one state from another state cattle liable to impart or capable of communicating disease to domestic cattle. The contrary cannot be affirmed under any sound interpretation of the Constitution. This court, while sustaining the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states, has steadily adhered to the principle that the states possess, because they have never surrendered, the power to protect the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, by any legislation appropriate to that end which does not encroach upon rights guaranteed by the national Constitution, nor come in conflict with acts of Congress passed in pursuance of that instrument. Although the powers of a state must in their exercise give way to a power exerted by Congress under the Constitution, it has never been adjudged that that instrument by its own force gives anyone the right to introduce into a state, against its will, cattle so affected with disease that their presence in the state will be dangerous to domestic cattle.

This principle is illustrated in many adjudged cases. In Hannibal & St. J. Railroad Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 471, 473 [24: 527, 530, 531],—a case much relied on by the plaintiff in error,—this court held to be unconstitutional a statute of Missouri declaring that no Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle, not kept the entire previous winter in that state, should be driven or otherwise conveyed into or remain in any county in that state between the 1st day of March and the 1st day of November in each year. The statute contained a proviso to the effect that "when such cattle shall come across the line of this state, loaded upon a railroad car or steamboat, and shall pass through the state without being unloaded, such shall not be construed as prohibited by the act; but the railroad company or owners of a steamboat performing such transportation shall be responsible for all damages which may result from the disease called the Spanish or Texas fever, should the same occur along the line *of such [629 transportation; and the existence of such disease along the line of such route shall be prima facie evidence that such disease has been communicated by such transportation." It also provided: "If any person or persons shall bring into this state any Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle in violation of the 1st section of this act, he or they shall be liable, in all cases, for all damages sustained on account of disease communicated by said cattle." In that case the court cited with approval the language of the supreme court of Vermont in Thorpe v. Rutland & Burlington Railroad Co. 27 Vt. 149 [62 Am. Dec. 625], in which it was said that, by the general police power of a state, "persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens, in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state; of the perfect right of the legislature to do which no question ever was, or, upon acknowledged general principles, ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned." Under that power, this court said that while a state by legislation may not invade the domain of the national government, it may exclude from its limits convicts, paupers, idiots, and lunatics, persons likely to become a public charge, as well as persons affected by contagious or infectious diseases—adding that the same principle "would justify exclusion of property dangerous to the property of citizens of the state, for example, animals having contagious or infectious diseases." Such exertions of power by a state, it was said, were self defensive. In affirming the invalidity of state legislation professing to be an exercise of police powers for protection against evils from abroad, but which was beyond the necessity for its exercise, and interfered with the rights and powers of the Federal government, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Strong, said: "Tried by this rule, the statute of Missouri is a plain intrusion upon the exclusive domain of Congress. It is not a quarantine law. It is not an inspection law. It says to all natural persons and to all transportation companies, 'You shall not bring into the state any Texas cattle or any Mexican cattle or Indian cattle, between March 1 and December 1, in any year, no matter whether they are free from disease or not, no matter whether 630]*they may do an injury to the inhabitants of the state or not; and if you do bring them in, even for the purpose of carrying them through the state without unloading them, you shall be subject to extraordinary liabilities.' Such a statute, we do not doubt, it is beyond the power of a state to enact. To hold otherwise would be to ignore one of the leading objects which the Constitution of the United States was designed to secure."

The decision in that case was placed distinctly on the ground that although the state could prevent persons and animals suffering under contagious or infectious diseases, or convicts, etc., from entering the state, it could not, under the cover of exerting its police powers, substantially prohibit or burden either foreign or interstate commerce, and the Missouri statute was held to be unconstitutional because it went beyond the necessities of the case, having been so drawn as to exclude all Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle from the state (except cattle to be transported across and out of the state) whether free from disease or not, or whether they would or would not do injury to the inhabitants of the state.

No such criticism can be made of the statute of Kansas. It does not prohibit the bringing into the state of all Texas cattle. It does not in any true sense prohibit or burden any commerce among the states especially authorized by Congress; but, for the purpose of self-protection only and in the exercise of its inherent power to protect the property of its people, declared that any corporation or person bringing into the state or driving into or through any county of the state cattle liable to impart or capable of communicating Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever to domestic cattle, should be responsible in damages to anyone to whose cattle that disease was communicated by the cattle so brought into the state.

The general views we have expressed are sustained by Kimmish v. Ball, 129 U. S. 217, 220, 222 [32: 695, 696, 697, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 407]. That case involved the validity of § 4059 of the Iowa Code, providing, in respect of Texas cattle that had not been wintered at least one winter north of the southern boundary of Missouri or Kansas, that "if any person 631] now or hereafter has in his possession *in this state any such Texas cattle, he shall be liable for any damages that may accrue from allowing said cattle to run at large, and thereby spreading the disease among other cattle known as the Texas fever, and shall be punished as is prescribed in the preceding section." It was contended that that section was in conflict with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states, as well as with § 2 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States relating to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states. The court stated that the statute of Iowa was based upon the notorious fact that cattle which were brought during the spring and summer months from Texas and Arkansas and from the Indian territory, were often affected with what is known as Texas fever, and that all danger of infection therefrom could be removed by cold weather, such as was usual in the country north of the southern boundary of Missouri and Kansas. Speaking by Mr. Justice Field, it said: "Section 4059, with which we are concerned, provides that any person who has in his possession in the state of Iowa any Texas cattle which have not been wintered north shall be liable for any damages that may accrue from allowing such cattle to run at large and thereby spread the disease. We are unable to appreciate the force of the objection that such legislation is in conflict with the paramount authority of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. We do not see that it has anything to do with that commerce; it is only levelled against allowing diseased Texas cattle held within the state to run at large." In reference to the other objection made to the act, the court said: "There is no denial of any rights and privileges to citizens of other states which are accorded to citizens of Iowa. No one can allow diseased cattle to run at large in Iowa without being held responsible for the damages caused by the spread of disease thereby; and the clause of the Constitution declaring that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states does not give non-resident citizens of Iowa any greater privileges and immunities in that state than her own citizens there enjoy. So far as liability is concerned for the act mentioned, *citizens [632 of other states and citizens of Iowa stand upon the same footing."

The case of Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 103 [23: 819, 820], well illustrates the principle which, we think, must control the present case. That was an action for damages under a statute of Indiana, giving a right of action in favor of the personal representative of one whose death was caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, whenever the latter, if he had lived, could sue for an injury for the same act or omission. In that case the death, on account of which the suit was brought, occurred by reason of a collision between two steamboats navigating the Ohio river. It appears from the report of the case that one of the grounds of defense was that at the time of the alleged injuries the colliding boats were engaged in carrying on interstate commerce under the laws of the United States, and that the defendants, as their owners, were not liable for injuries occurring in navigation through the carelessness of their officers, except as prescribed by Congress; and that the acts of Congress did not cover the liability asserted by the plaintiff under the statute of Indiana. The act of Congress referred to was that of August 30, 1852 (10 Stat. at. L. 65, chap. 106), providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam. After referring to some of the principal cases in which state enactments had been held void for interfering with the freedom of interstate commerce, the court said that the Indiana statute "imposes no tax, prescribes no duty, and in no respect interferes with any regulations for the navigation and use of vessels. It only declares a general principle respecting the liability of all persons within the jurisdiction of the state for torts resulting in the death of parties injured. And in the application of the principle it makes no difference where the injury complained of occurred in the state, whether on land or on water. General legislation of this kind, prescribing the liabilities or duties of citizens of a state, without distinction as to pursuit or calling, is not open to any valid objection because it may affect persons engaged in foreign or interstate commerce. Objection might with 633 equal propriety *be urged against legislation prescribing the form in which contracts shall be authenticated, or property descend or be distributed on the death of its owner, because applicable to the contracts or estates of persons engaged in such commerce. In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce, it was never intended to cut the states off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Legislation, in a great variety of ways, may affect commerce and persons engaged it it without constituting a regulation of it, within the meaning of the Constitution." Again, in the same case: "Until Congress, therefore, makes some regulation touching the liability of parties for marine torts resulting in the death of the persons injured, we are of opinion that the statute of Indiana applies, giving a right of action in such cases to the personal representatives of the deceased, and that, as thus applied, it constitutes no encroachment upon the commercial power of Congress."

In Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 505 [24: 1115, 1117], this court said that "the states may, by police regulations, protect their people against the introduction within their respective limits of infected merchandise," and by like regulations "exclude from their midst, not only convicts, paupers, idiots, lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, but animals having contagious diseases."

So it has been held that in the absence of legislation by Congress on the subject, a state may prescribe, as a rule of civil conduct, that engineers on railroad trains engaged in the transportation of passengers and freight, including interstate trains, shall undergo an examination by a state board as to their qualifications before becoming entitled to operate locomotive engines within such state, and that persons employed on railways shall be subjected to like examination with respect to their powers of vision. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 482 [31: 508, 514, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804]; Nashville, C. & St. L. Railway Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 101 [32: 352, 354, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 238]

In New York, N. H. & H. Railroad Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628, 633 [41:853, 855], it was contended that § 5258 of *the Revised Stat- [634 utes, relating to transportation of persons and property from one state to another state, so far covered the whole subject of interstate transportation as to render inapplicable to interstate carriers a statute of New York regulating the heating of steam passenger cars, and directing guards and guard posts to be placed on railroad bridges and trestles. But this court said that the authority conferred by Congress "upon railroad companies engaged in commerce among the states, whatever may be the extent of such authority, does not interfere in any degree with the passage by the states of laws having for their object the personal security of passengers while traveling within their respective limits, from one state to another on cars propelled by steam."

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 660 [40: 1105, 1108], this court sustained as valid a statute of Georgia requiring every telegraph company, with a line of wires wholly or partly within that state, to receive despatches, and, on payment of the usual charges, to transmit or deliver them with due diligence, under a penalty of $100. It was contended in that case, as to telegraph messages from points outside to points inside the state, that the local statute was a regulation of interstate commerce, and therefore void. That contention was overruled, the court saying: "It would not unfavorably affect or embarrass it in the course of its employment, and hence until Congress speaks upon the subject, it would seem that such a statute must be valid. It is the duty of a telegraph company which receives a message for transmission, directed to an individual at one of its stations, to deliver that message to the person to whom it is addressed, with reasonable diligence and in good faith. That is a part of its contract, implied by taking the message and receiving payment therefor. The statute in question is of a nature that is in aid of the performance of a duty of the company that would exist in the absence of any such statute, and it is in no wise obstructive of its duty as a telegraph company. It imposes a penalty for the purpose of enforcing this general duty of the company. The direction that the delivery of the message shall be made without impartiality and in good faith *and with due [635 diligence is not an addition to the duty which it would owe in the absence of such a statute. Can it be said that the imposition of a penalty for the violation of a duty which the company owed by the general law of the land is a regulation of or an obstruction to interstate commerce within the meaning of that clause of the Federal Constitution under discussion? We think not."

These cases all proceed upon the ground that the regulation of the enjoyment of the relative rights, and the performance of the duties, of all persons within the jurisdiction of a state belongs primarily to such state under its reserved power to provide for the safety of all persons and property within its limits; and that even if the subject of such regulations be one that may be taken under the exclusive control of Congress, and be reached by national legislation, any action taken by the state upon that subject that does not directly interfere with rights secured by the Constitution of the United States or by some valid act of Congress must be respected until Congress intervenes.

It is suggested that the statute is so drawn that the railway company would be liable, even if it acted in good faith, and had no reason to believe, after the exercise of the utmost diligence, that the cattle it received for transportation were liable to impart or were capable of communicating the fever named in the statute. If the statutes were thus interpreted, it might be—though upon that point we express no opinion—that it would be so oppressive in its necessary operation as to be deemed a burden upon the transportation of all cattle from Texas, whether diseased or not, and for that reason be liable to the same objection urged against the statute involved in Hannibal & St. J. Railroad Co. v. Husen. But we do not so construe the statute. Its 16th section must be interpreted in connection with the 17th section. The latter, as we have stated, declares that in the trial of any civil action, under the statute, proof that the cattle were brought into the state from south of the 37th parallel of north latitude—the southern boundary line of Kansas—should be prima facie evidence that they were, between the 1st day of February and 636]*the 1st day of December, capable of communicating and liable to impart Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever, and that "the owner or owners, or person or persons, in charge of such cattle had full knowledge or notice thereof." As the state is competent to protect its domestic cattle against disease that may be communicated by cattle coming from beyond its limits, this rule of evidence cannot be regarded as inconsistent with any right secured by the national Constitution or as obstructing commerce among the states; for the rule finds its justification in the fact, heretofore recognized by this court, and substantially by the act of Congress, that Texas cattle, when brought northward during the spring and summer months, often carry the germs of fever, or are often, though not always, infected with fever that may be communicated by them to domestic cattle. That rule as prescribed implies that damages shall not be recovered if, from all the evidence, it appears that the defendant had no knowledge or notice that the cattle were of the kind forbidden by the statute to be brought into the state. This was the interpretation placed upon the statute by the plaintiff. His petition alleges that before the cattle in question were shipped, transported, and driven as stated, the defendants had knowledge, and were put upon inquiry, and had reason to know, that "said Texas cattle so kept, shipped, transported, and driven, were of a kind capable of communicating and liable to communicate and impart said disease to the domestic cattle of this state and to the aforesaid cattle of the plaintiff." And under this construction of the statute the case was tried. The trial court, among other things, instructed the jury: "The mere fact that the cattle of the plaintiff or those of any of the cross-petitioning defendants became sick and died from this disease imparted to them by cattle transported by the said defendant into Lyon or Chase counties is not sufficient to warrant a finding against said defendant railway company. You must find from the evidence, first, that Texas cattle were, in fact, brought into this state; of this there is no denial, and you can consider that fact as established; second, that the cattle of the plaintiff and each of the cross petitioning defendants who seek to recover herein against *said railway because of the loss of cattle, [637 became infected and died because of the disease imparted to them by such Texas cattle, and that such disease was Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever; and, third that the officers, employees, or agents of the railway company defendant had knowledge that such Texas cattle transported by it to this state were liable to impart such disease to the native cattle of this state, or that they ought by the exercise of diligence and care to have known of the dangerous character of these cattle, and that they would or were liable to impart said disease to the native cattle of this state." We do not understand from the opinion of the supreme court of the state that it disagreed with this interpretation of the statute.

3. In support of the contention that national legislation leaves no room for state enactments relating to the bringing of deceased cattle into one state from another state, the railway company refers to the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 1044, 1049, chap. 544), appropriating $500,000 for carrying out the provisions of the act for establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, and which authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to use any part of that sum he might deem necessary or expedient, and in such manner as he might think best, to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases of animals, and for this purpose to employ as many persons as he might deem necessary, and to expend any part of that sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals and the quarantine of the same, whenever in his judgment it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia or other diseases of animals from one state into another. This contention is disposed of by what has been already said.

4. In support of the same contention, the company refers to § 5258 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (brought forward from the act of June 15, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 66, chap. 124), which authorizes every railroad company in the United States operated by steam, its successors and assigns, "to carry upon and over its road, boats, bridges, and ferries, all passengers, troops, government supplies, mails, freight, *and property on their way [638 from any state to another state, and to receive compensation therefor, and to connect with roads of other states so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination." It is scarcely necessary to say that an act of Congress that does no more than give authority to railroad companies to carry "freight and property" over their respective roads from one state to another state will not authorize a railroad company to carry into a state cattle known, or which by due diligence may be known, to be in such a condition as to impart or communicate disease to the domestic cattle of such state. A railroad company carrying diseased cattle into a state cannot claim the protection of § 5258, any more than it could when carrying into a state rags known, or which by proper diligence could have been known, to be infected with yellow fever. If the carrier takes diseased cattle into a state, it does so subject for any injury thereby done to domestic cattle to such liability as may arise under any law of the state that does not go beyond the necessities of the case and burden or prohibit interstate commerce. A statute prescribing as a rule of civil conduct that a person or corporation bringing into the state cattle that are known, or which by proper diligence could be known, to be capable of communicating disease to domestic cattle, cannot be regarded as beyond the necessities of the case, nor as interfering with any right intended to be given or recognized by § 5258 of the Revised Statutes.

Applying the principles settled in prior cases to the case before us, it is clear that a railroad company is not in any just sense hindered or obstructed by the statute of Kansas in the exercise of any privilege given or authority conferred by § 5258 of the Revised Statutes. This must be so, unless the company should be held to be entitled, of right, to carry into a state from another state, as freight or property, cattle liable to impart or capable of communicating disease, and of whose condition at the time it had knowledge, or could have had knowledge by the exercise of reasonable diligence. We cannot so hold. And we adjudge that if Congress could authorize the carrying of such cattle from one state into another state, 639] *and by legislation protect the carrier against all suits for damages arising therefrom, it has not done so, nor has it enacted any statute that prevents a state from prescribing such a rule of civil conduct as that found in the statute of Kansas.

5. Much was said at the bar about the finding of the jury being against the evidence. We cannot enter upon such an inquiry. The facts must be taken as found by the jury, and this court can only consider whether the statute, as interpreted to the jury, was in violation of the Federal Constitution. Chicago, Burlington, & Q. Rd. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 242-246 [41: 979, 987, 988].

Perceiving no error in the record in respect of any question of a Federal nature, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Kansas is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Brewer dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the opinion filed in this case. The statute provides that a carrier bringing into the state cattle which are capable of communicating Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever to domestic cattle shall be liable to any persons injured thereby for all damages they may sustain by reason of the communication of said fever. This liability is not limited to the injury which may be done by the cattle while in the possession of the carrier, but extends to that which may be done at any time thereafter in whosesoever possession they may be. And in this particular case it is found by the jury that the fever was communicated and the injury done after the cattle had passed out of the custody of the carrier and into the possession of other persons. The statute also provides that proof that the cattle were brought into Kansas from territory south of the Kansas state line shall be prima facie evidence that they were capable of communicating the fever, and that the carrier had knowledge of that fact.

I am not disposed to belittle this question, or the difficulties which attend the effort to prevent a communication of Texas fever and the injuries which result therefrom. On the contrary, *I fully appreciate the importance [640 of securing to all stock owners in Kansas and elsewhere the fullest protection against this so fatal disease, and believe that stringent measures may properly be adopted to accomplish this result. I differ with my brethren only as to the authority by which such measures should be enacted, and as to the validity of the legislation before us. It is conceded in the opinion of the majority that Congress has full control over interstate commerce, and that it is the only authority by which that commerce can be regulated. On the other hand, it is equally clear, as pointed out, that the states may make many police restrictions and provisions which, while indirectly affecting interstate commerce, do not directly regulate it, and the question is whether this particular statute comes within the category of such police regulations.

It must be premised that southern cattle which are capable of communicating this disease are not necessarily themselves diseased, or their meat unfit for consumption. This is not a mere conjecture, but a well-established fact. In the report of the Bureau of Animal Industry for the years 1891 and 1892, which contains the results of investigations into the nature, cause, and prevention of cattle fever, it is said, on pages 266 and 267: "The presence of the parasite in southern cattle does not seem to materially affect their health, although it may maintain a more or less constant breaking up of the red corpuscles on a small scale, which would necessarily tax certain vital organs. . . . From a practical economic standpoint we must maintain that southern cattle may be healthy and yet be the cause of Texas fever:" and in the final summing up of the conclusions of the investigators, on page 290, it is further stated: "Cattle from the permanently infected territory, though otherwise healthy, carry the microparasite of Texas fever in their blood."

And in the regulations concerning cattle transporation, promulgated by the United States Department of Agriculture on February 26, 1892, as appears from the record in this case, as also in similar regulations issued by the same department on December 15, 1897, it is provided that within certain *specified [641 dates no cattle are to be transported from below the Federal quarantine line except by rail or boat for immediate slaughter. These cattle are being constantly forwarded by the thousands to the packing houses of this country, and when butchered their meat is shipped all over the world and used with impunity. Statistics found in the cases of Cotting v. Kansas City Stock- yards Company and Hopkins v. United States, now pending in this court, show that in the year 1896 (and that is but a sample of other years) of something over 1,700,000 head of cattle shipped to the Kansas City stockyards, more than 500,000 came from the territory proscribed by the Kansas statute, and that of these cattle 60 per cent or more were sold to the packing houses there situate for immediate slaughter.

It appears from the report above referred to that this fever is generally disseminated by means of a tick, technically called boophilus bovis, though the jury in this case in answer to specific questions, found that the fever was communicable otherwise than in that way. The presence of ticks upon the cattle does not necessarily indicate disease. They are purely external, like fleas on a dog, and do not prove that the body is in an unhealthy condition. It may be a curious fact, the cause of which is not yet fully explained, that these cattle range in the south without developing in themselves or communicating to others this Texas fever, while when brought into the temperate zone they seem to communicate it freely and in a most dangerous form. Whatever may be the explanation of this fact does not abridge its significance. Hence it is that these southern cattle, although they may have ticks upon them, and thus be liable to communicate the disease to northern cattle, may be entirely free from any disease, their meat a perfectly healthy article of food, and they themselves legitimate subjects of commerce. If they are, when brought into the north, pastured at a distance from native cattle, and the latter are not thereafter permitted to range in the field in which the former have been kept, the disease will not be communicated, the southern cattle may safely be fattened and prepared for market and use. It 642] is only when the native *cattle are permitted to pasture in or near the grounds in which the southern cattle are or have recently been kept that injury results. The case presented, therefore, is not that of legislation to prevent importation of diseased meat—that which in itself is unhealthy and unfit for use—but something which, if improperly or carelessly handled, may communicate disease and do injury. The very phraseology of the statute indicates this. It does not name diseased cattle, but only those liable to communicate disease. If other northern states follow with like legislation commerce between the two sections of the country in this most important product of portions of the south will be practically interrupted.

The cases referred to in the opinion of the majority in which the police power of the state has been sustained were cases in which the restrictions or regulations only indirectly affected interstate commerce. As, for instance, requiring an engineer to take out a state license (Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465 [31: 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804]), or to be free from and submit to an examination for color blindness (Nashville, C. & St. L. Railway Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96 [32: 352, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 238]); prescribing the mode of boating passenger cars (New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628 [41: 853]; requiring the prompt delivery of telegraphic messages under conditions of a penalty (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650 [40: 1105]). Nothing of that kind is prescribed by this statute. No inspection is provided for by the state; none required of the carrier; no duty imposed in respect to the handling and care of the cattle while in its possession. It simply prescribes the conditions upon which the carrier may bring cattle into the state, to wit, liability, not merely for injury which its own improper handling may cause, but for injury which may result at any time thereafter from any future improper handling by the consignee or subsequent party into whose custody the cattle may pass. It seems to me, beyond any peradventure, this is legislation directly regulating commerce between the states, and, as such, is within the sole dominion of Congress. It materially affects the conduct of the carrier outside of the limits of the state, and that is one of the tests of invalidity. Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485-488 [24: 547, 548]; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. Railway Co. 125 U. S. 465-486 [31: 700-707, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823]. *Suppose cattle are presented [643 to a carrier in Texas for shipment to Kansas, can it properly refuse to receive and transmit it? Can it plead the Kansas statute in defense of its duty as a common carrier? If it says that the cattle have ticks upon them and therefore are liable to communicate Texas fever, or if not having ticks upon them may otherwise (as shown by the verdict of this jury) communicate the disease, the shipper may reply that he intends them for immediate slaughter, and that they are a legitimate article of commerce. But that will not relieve the carrier. The liability imposed by the Kansas statute does not depend upon the intent with which the cattle are shipped into the state; and having delivered them to the consignee, the carrier has no further control. Although shipped with the intention of immediate slaughter, the consignee may change his mind and pasture them within the state. Whatever may have been the intention of the shipment, the liability of the carrier is the same.

I cannot believe that the carrier is thus placed beneath the upper and the nether millstone, liable under the law of Texas to the owner of the cattle if he refuses to ship them (Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. Railway Co. supra), and liable to anyone in Kansas under the Kansas statute if injuries result from the improper handling by the consignee or others. The presumption of knowledge, which is provided for in § 17, is, in this aspect of the case, entirely immaterial, and does not affect the validity of the statute. Apply the principle of this legislation to other objects than cattle, and see in what it results. Gunpowder, dynamite, many of the drugs used in medicine, while legitimate articles of commerce, and of great value for certain purposes, may, if improperly or carelessly handled, be the means of doing immense injury. Can a state say to a carrier, You may bring gunpowder or any other article of danger into the state, but if you know its dangerous character you shall be responsible for all damages that it may cause in the hands of the consignee or any subsequent party through improper handling? It certainly places it in the power of the state to most materially in-644] terfere with *interstate commerce if it can prescribe that as a condition of its being carried on. The number of articles and the amount of interstate commerce thus subjected to the will of the state can scarcely be overestimated.

It is undoubtedly true that legislation should be had in respect to matters of this kind, but in my judgment such legislation can only come from Congress, and that body, and that body alone, can prescribe the condition upon which commerce in these cattle can be carried on. Congress has legislated, but only partially, and the fact that its legislation does not go so far as in the judgment of the legislature of Kansas is required, is not, in my opinion, sufficient to warrant the state in enacting this statute. For these reasons thus briefly stated, I am compelled to dissent from the opinion of the court.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY et al., Appts., v. HENRY W. BEHLMER.

Motion to vacate supersedeas—appeal to this court—act of March 3, 1891—§ 2 of the same act.

1. This court will not grant a motion to declare that an appeal to it from the circuit court of appeals, when perfected and bond approved, does not operate as a supersedeas, or to vacate the supersedeas, in a case where the judgment of that court reversed the decree of the circuit court dismissing a suit to enforce an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and directed the enforcement of such order.

2. The words in § 11 of the act of 1891, "all provisions for bonds or other securities" which were in force at the time of the adoption of that act do not include, as applicable to appeals from the circuit court of appeals, the provision of § 16 of the Interstate Commerce Act that the appeal therein referred to shall not operate to stay or supersede.

Submitted March 14, 1898. Decided March 28, 1898.

APPEAL from a judgment of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit reversing the decree of the Circuit Court and directing that an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission be enforced. On motion for an order to vacate the supersedeas. Motion denied.

See same case below, 71 Fed. Rep. 835, 42 U. S. App. 581.

Mr. Claudian B. Northrop for appellee, in favor of motion.

Messrs Edward Baxter and Joseph W. Barnwell for appellants, in opposition to motion.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered [645 the opinion of the court:

Henry W. Behlmer filed a petition before the Interstate Commerce Commission, which resulted in an order requiring the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and other companies to abstain from charging, demanding, collecting, or receiving any greater compensation in the aggregate for transportation on hay or other commodities carried by them, under circumstances and conditions similar to those appearing in the case, from Memphis, Tennessee, to Summerville, South Carolina, to that contemporaneously charged and received for the transportation of hay and other commodities from Memphis to Charleston, South Carolina. The companies having failed to comply with that order, Behlmer filed his petition in the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina, setting out the action before the Commission, and the failure of the companies to comply with the order, and prayed for a writ of injunction or other proper process restraining the companies from continuing in their violation and disobedience to said order.

On final hearing the circuit court entered a decree dismissing the bill. 71 Fed. Rep. 835. Behlmer appealed to the circuit court of appeals for the fourth circuit and that court reversed the decree of the circuit court and directed that the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission be enforced. 42 U. S. App. 581.

An appeal was then allowed and perfected to this court, which operated as a supersedeas, and Behlmer now moves the court to declare the appeal not to have that effect; or to vacate the supersedeas resulting from the allowance of the appeal and the approval of the bond tendered.

The 16th section of the act to regulate commerce (24 Stat. at L. 379, chap. 104), as amended by the act of March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. at L. 855, chap. 382), under which resort to the circuit courts could be had for the enforcement of lawful orders or requirements of the Interstate Commerce Commission, provided that: "When the subject in dispute *shall be [646 of the value of two thousand dollars or more, either party to such a proceeding before said court may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, under the same regulations now provided by law in respect of security for such appeal; but such appeal shall not operate to stay or supersede the order of the court or the execution of any writ or process thereon."

At the date of the passage of these acts the rapid growth of the country and the steady increase of its litigation had so congested the docket of this court that years frequently elapsed before appeals and writs of error could be heard. When, then, the Interstate Commerce Commission was created and provision made for the enforcement of its orders by the circuit courts, while appeals were allowed from the decrees of those courts to this court, it was the legislative will that such appeals should not suspend the operation of the decrees appealed from. It is quite true that if the circuit court reversed the order of the Commission and dismissed the petition, the question of superseding such a decree might not be material, but as the section provided that either party might appeal, the inhibition on the effect of the appeal applied alike to either.

The primary object of the judiciary act of March 3, 1891, was to relieve this court of the overburden of cases which impeded the prompt administration of justice. McLish v. Roff, 141 U. S. 661 [35: 893]. Accordingly all cases in which the judgments and decrees of the circuit courts of appeals were made final by the act can only be brought to this court on certiorari, although in other cases, of which this is one, appeal or error will lie. The act also provided that when a case reaches this court through the circuit court of appeals, by appeal, writ of error, or certiorari, the cause shall be remanded to the proper district or circuit court for further proceedings in pursuance of the determination of this court, exactly as if the case came here directly from the district or circuit court.

Assuming that § 16 of the Interstate Commerce Act remained unrepealed, it was never-647 theless so far affected* as that the appeal from the trial court had to be prosecuted to the circuit court of appeals instead of to this court. Intersate Commerce Commission v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Railroad Company, 149 U. S. 264 [37: 727].

But such appeal would not operate to supersede the decree of the trial court, nor would such decree be superseded if the case were brought to this court from the circuit court of appeals, even though the judgment of the latter court were superseded. In this case the petition was dismissed by the circuit court. The court of appeals reversed that decree, but it still remained in force because the judgment of the circuit court of appeals had been superseded. If the circuit court had decreed the enforcement of the order of the Commission, and the circuit court of appeals had affirmed that order, and then the case had been brought here, the result would have been the same.

This application of the plain words of the statute gives the same effect to the appeal to this court from the intermediate court as if the appeal had been taken directly to this court from the circuit court.

Section 11 of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 829, chap. 517), provided, among other things, as follows: "And all provisions of law now in force regulating the methods and system of review, through appeals or writs of error, shall regulate the methods and system of appeals and writs of error provided for in this act in respect to the circuit courts of appeals, including all provisions for bonds or other securities to be required and taken on such appeals and writs of error, and any judge of the circuit courts of appeals, in respect of cases brought or to be brought to that court, shall have the same powers and duties as to the allowance of appeals or writs of error, and the conditions of such allowance, as now by law belong to the justices or judges in respect of the existing courts of the United States respectively."

And it is argued that the words "all provisions for bonds or other securities," which were in force at the time of the adoption of the act of 1891, include as applicable to appeals from the circuit courts of appeals the provision 648 *of § 16 of the Interstate Commerce Act, that the appeal therein referred to shall not operate to stay or supersede. We cannot accede to that view, for the appeal treated of in § 16 is an appeal from the trial court, and does not refer to an appeal from the circuit courts of appeals. "Either party to such proceeding before said court may appeal," is the language, and as "said court" confessedly referred to the circuit court, the only question would be whether the scope of the provision had been enlarged by the act of 1891, in the matter under consideration, which we do not think it had.

When cases are brought here from the circuit courts of appeals, we are, of course, called on to review the judgments of those courts, in revision of the judgments of the courts below, but our mandate goes to the court of first instance, and is there carried into effect, though the court of appeals may have sent its own mandate down before the case was brought to this court by appeal, writ of error, or certiorari. The Conqueror, 156 U. S. 110 [41: 937].

The rule prescribed by the statute has necessarily not been changed by the omission to strictly observe it in the entry of judgment in some cases.

Motion denied.

WONG KIM ARK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 649-732.)

Chinese child born in the United States is a citizen thereof—United States Constitution—common law—unfounded theory—right to citizenship—opinion of court—14th Amendment—Chinese exclusion acts—right of Congress to restrict citizenship.

1. A child born in the United States, of parents of Chinese descent, who at the time of his birth are subjects of the Emperor of China, but have a permanent domicil and residence in the United States, and are there carrying on business, and are not employed in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China,—becomes at the time of his birth a citizen of the United States, by virtue of the 1st clause of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution.
2. The Constitution of the United States must be interpreted in the light of the common law.
3. By the common law every child born in England of alien parents was a natural-born subject, unless the child of an ambassador or other diplomatic agent of a foreign state, or of an alien enemy in hostile occupation of the place where the child was born.

4. There is no ground for the theory that at the time of the adoption of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution there was any settled and definite rule of international law inconsistent with the ancient rule of citizenship by birth within the dominion.

5. It is the inherent right of every independent nation to determine for itself and according to its own Constitution and laws what classes of persons shall be entitled to its citizenship.

6. General expressions in an opinion of the court are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used.

7. The opening sentence of the 14th Amendment is affirmative of existing law, and declaratory of existing rights, and was intended to allay doubts and to settle controversies which had arisen, and not to impose any new restrictions upon citizenship.

8. The Chinese exclusion acts, passed after the adoption of the 14th Constitutional Amendment, cannot control its meaning or impair its effect, but must be construed and executed in subordination to its provisions.

9. The 14th Amendment, while it leaves the power, where it was before, in Congress, to regulate naturalization, has conferred no authority upon Congress to restrict the effect of birth, declared by the Constitution to constitute a sufficient and complete right to citizenship.

APPEAL from an order of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California discharging upon habeas corpus Wong Kim Ark, who was restrained of his liberty by the general manager of a steamship company acting under the direction of the collector of customs of the port of San Francisco, and denied permission to land in the United States upon the pretense that he was not a citizen thereof. The order of the district court discharging Wong Kim Ark was made upon the ground that he was a citizen of the United States. Affirmed.

See same case below, 71 Fed. Rep. 382.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was a writ of habeas corpus issued October 2, 1895, by the district court of the United States for the northern district of California, to the collector of customs at the port of San Francisco, in behalf of Wong Kim Ark who alleged that he was a citizen of the United States, of more than twenty-one years of age, and was born at San Francisco in 1873 of parents of Chinese descent and subjects of the Emperor of China, but domiciled residents at San Francisco; and that, on his return to the United States on the steamship Coptic in August, 1895, from a temporary visit to China, he applied to said collector of customs for permission to land, and was by the collector refused such permission, and was restrained of his liberty by the collector, and by the general manager of the steamship company acting under his direction in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, not by virtue of any judicial order or proceeding, but solely upon the pretense that he was not a citizen of the United States.

At the hearing, the district attorney of the United States was permitted to intervene in behalf of the United States in opposition to the writ, and stated the grounds of his intervention in writing as follows:

"That, as he is informed and believes, the said person in *whose behalf said application [650 was made is not entitled to land in the United States, or to be or remain therein, as is alleged in said application, or otherwise.

"Because the said Wong Kim Ark, although born in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, United States of America, is not, under the laws of the state of California and of the United States, a citizen thereof, the mother and father of the said Wong Kim Ark being Chinese persons and subjects of the Emperor of China, and the said Wong Kim Ark being also a Chinese person and a subject of the Emperor of China.

"Because the said Wong Kim Ark has been at all times, by reason of his race, language, color, and dress, a Chinese person, and now is, and for some time last past has been, a laborer by occupation.

"That the said Wong Kim Ark is not entitled to land in the United States, or to be or remain therein, because he does not belong to any of the privileged classes enumerated in any of the acts of Congress, known as the Chinese exclusion acts,† which would exempt him from the class or classes which are especially excluded from the United States by the provisions of the said acts.

"Wherefore the said United States attorney asks that a judgment and order of this honorable court be made and entered in accordance with the allegations herein contained, and that the said Wong Kim Ark be detained on board of said vessel until released as provided by law, or otherwise to be returned to the country from whence he came, and that such further order be made as to the court may seem proper and legal in the premises."

The case was submitted to the decision of the court upon the following facts agreed by the parties:

"That the said Wong Kim Ark was born in the year of 1873, at No. 751 Sacramento street, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, United States of America, and *that his mother and father were persons [651 of Chinese descent and subjects of the Emperor of China, and that said Wong Kim Ark was and is a laborer.

"That at the time of his said birth his mother and father were domiciled residents of the United States, and had established and enjoyed a permanent domicil and residence therein at said city and county of San Francisco, state aforesaid.

"That said mother and father of said Wong Kim Ark continued to reside and remain in the United States until the year 1890, when they departed for China.

†Acts of May 6, 1882 (22 Stat. at L. 58, chap. 126); July 5, 1884 (23 Stat. at L. 115, chap. 220); September 13, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 476, chap. 1015); October 1, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 504, chap. 1064); May 5, 1892 (27 Stat. at L. 25, chap. 60); August 18, 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 390, chap. 301).

"That during all the time of their said residence in the United States as domiciled residents therein the said mother and father of said Wong Kim Ark were engaged in the prosecution of business and were never engaged in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China.

"That ever since the birth of said Wong Kim Ark, at the time and place hereinbefore stated and stipulated, he has had but one residence, to wit, a residence in said state of California, in the United States of America, and that he has never changed or lost said residence or gained or acquired another residence, and there resided, claiming to be a citizen of the United States.

"That in the year 1890 the said Wong Kim Ark departed for China upon a temporary visit and with the intention of returning to the United States, and did return thereto on July 26, 1890, on the steamship Gaelic, and was permitted to enter the United States by the collector of customs upon the sole ground that he was a native-born citizen of the United States.

"That after his said return the said Wong Kim Ark remained in the United States, claiming to be a citizen thereof, until the year 1894, when he again departed for China upon a temporary visit, and with the intention of returning to the United States, and did return thereto in the month of August, 1895, and applied to the collector of customs to be permitted to land; and that such application was denied upon the sole ground that said Wong Kim Ark was not a citizen of the United States.

652] *"That said Wong Kim Ark has not, either by himself or his parents acting for him, ever renounced his allegiance to the United States, and that he has never done or committed any act or thing to exclude him therefrom."

The court ordered Wong Kim Ark to be discharged, upon the ground that he was a citizen of the United States. 71 Fed. Rep. 382. The United States appealed to this court.

Messrs. Holmes Conrad, Solicitor General, and George D. Collins for appellant, on first submission of the case.

Mr. Thomas D. Riordan for appellee, on the first submission of the case.

Mr. Holmes Conrad, Solicitor General, for appellant, on final oral argument.

Messrs. Maxwell Evarts and J. Hubley Ashton for appellee, on final oral argument.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case, as agreed by the parties, are as follows: Wong Kim Ark was born in 1873 in the city of San Francisco, in the state of California and United States of America, and was and is a laborer. His father and mother were persons of Chinese descent, and subjects of the Emperor of China; they were at the time of his birth domiciled residents of the United States, having previously established and still enjoying a permanent domicil and residence at San Francisco; they continued to reside and remain in the United States until 1890, when they departed for China; and during all the time of their residence in the United States they were engaged in business, and were never employed in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China. Wong Kim Ark, ever since his birth, has had but one residence, to wit, in California within the United States, and has there resided, claiming to be a citizen of the United States, and has never lost or changed that residence, or gained or acquired another residence; and neither he nor his parents acting for him, ever renounced his allegiance to the United States, or did or committed any act or thing to exclude him *therefrom. In 1890 (when he must have [653 been about seventeen years of age) he departed for China on a temporary visit and with the intention of returning to the United States, and did return thereto by sea in the same year, and was permitted by the collector of customs to enter the United States, upon the sole ground that he was a native-born citizen of the United States. After such return, he remained in the United States, claiming to be a citizen thereof, until 1894, when he (being about twenty-one years of age, but whether a little above or a little under that age does not appear) again departed for China on a temporary visit with the intention of returning to the United States; and he did return thereto by sea in August, 1895, and applied to the collector of customs for permission to land; and was denied such permission, upon the sole ground that he was not a citizen of the United States.

It is conceded that, if he is a citizen of the United States, the acts of Congress known as the Chinese exclusion acts, prohibiting persons of the Chinese race, and especially Chinese laborers, from coming into the United States, do not and cannot apply to him.

The question presented by the record is whether a child born in the United States, of parents of Chinese descent, who at the time of his birth are subjects of the Emperor of China, but have a permanent domicil and residence in the United States, and are there carrying on business, and are not employed in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China, becomes at the time of his birth a citizen of the United States, by virtue of the first clause of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside."

1. In construing any act of legislation, whether a statute enacted by the legislature, or a Constitution established by the people as the supreme law of the land, regard is to be had, not only to all parts of the act itself, and of any former act of the same lawmaking power, of which the act in question is an amendment; but also to the condition, and to the history, of *the law as previously existing, and in [654 the light of which the new act must be read and interpreted.

The Constitution of the United States, as originally adopted, uses the words, "citizens of the United States," and "natural born citizen of the United States." By the original Constitution, every representative in Congress is required to have been "seven years a citizen of the United States, and every Senator to have been "nine years a citizen of the United States;" and "no person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of president." The 14th article of Amendment, besides declaring that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside," also declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." And the 15th article of Amendment declares that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The Constitution nowhere defines the meaning of these words, either by way of inclusion or of exclusion, except in so far as this is done by the affirmative declaration that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States." In this, as in other respects, it must be interpreted in the light of the common law, the principles and history of which were familiarly known to the framers of the Constitution. Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 162 [22: 627]; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 422 [29: 89, 91]; Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 624, 625 [29: 746, 749]; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465 [31: 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804]. The language of the Constitution, as has been well said, could not be understood without reference to the common law. 1 Kent, Com. 336; Bradley, J., in Moore v. United States, 91 U. S. 270, 274 [23 346, 347].

655 *In Minor v. Happersett, Chief Justice Waite, when construing, in behalf of the court, the very provision of the 14th Amendment now in question, said: "The Constitution does not, in words, say who shall be natural-born citizens. Resort must be had elsewhere to ascertain that." And he proceeded to resort to the common law as an aid in the construction of this provision. 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 167 [22: 628].

In Smith v. Alabama, Mr. Justice Matthews, delivering the judgment of the court, said: "There is no common law of the United States, in the sense of a national customary law, distinct from the common law of England as adopted by the several states each for itself, applied as its local law, and subject to such alteration as may be provided by its own statutes." "There is, however, one clear exception to the statement that there is no national common law. The interpretation of the Constitution of the United States is necessarily influenced by the fact that its provisions are framed in the language of the English common law, and are to be read in the light of its history." 124 U. S. 478 [31: 512, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804].

II. The fundamental principle of the common law with regard to English nationality was birth within the allegiance, also called "ligealty," "obedience," "faith," or "power," of the King. The principle embraced all persons born within the King's allegiance and subject to his protection. Such allegiance and protection were mutual—as expressed in the maxim, protectio trahit subjectionem subjectio protectionem—and were not restricted to natural-born subjects and naturalized subjects, or to those who had taken an oath of allegiance; but were predicable of aliens in amity, so long as they were within the Kingdom. Children born in England of such aliens were therefore natural-born subjects. But the children born within the realm of foreign ambassadors, or the children of alien enemies, born during and within their hostile occupation of part of the King's dominions, were not natural born subjects, because not born within the allegiance, the obedience, or the power, or, as would be said at this day, within the jurisdiction of the King.

This fundamental principle, with these qualifications or *explanations of it, was clear- [656 ly, though quaintly, stated in the leading case, known as Calvin's Case, or the Case of the Postnati, decided in 1608, after a hearing in the exchequer chamber before the lord chancellor and all the judges in England, and reported by Lord Coke and by Lord Ellesmere. Calvin's Case, 7 Coke, 1, 4*b*–6*a*, 18*a*, 18*b*; Ellesmere on Postnati, 62–64; S. C. 2 How. St. Tr. 559, 607, 613–617, 639, 640, 659, 679.

The English authorities ever since are to the like effect. Co. Litt. 8*a*, 128*b*; Lord Hale, in Hargrave's Law Tracts, 210, and in 1 Hale, P. C. 61, 62; 1 Bl. Com. 366, 369, 370, 374; 4 Bl. Com. 74, 92; Lord Kenyon, in Doe, Durroure, v. Jones, 4 T. R. 300, 308; Cockburn, Nationality, 7; Dicey, Confl. Laws, pp. 173–177, 741.

In Udny v. Udny (1869) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 441, the point decided was one of inheritance, depending upon the question whether the domicil of the father was in England or in Scotland, he being in either alternative a British subject. Lord Chancellor Hatherley said: "The question of naturalization and of allegiance is distinct from that of domicil." p. 452. Lord Westbury, in the passage relied on by the counsel for the United States, began by saying: "The law of England, and of almost all civilized countries, ascribes to each individual at his birth two distinct legal states or conditions; one by virtue of which he becomes the subject of some particular country, binding him by the tie of natural allegiance, and which may be called his political status; another, by virtue of which he has ascribed to him the character of a citizen of some particular country, and as such is possessed of certain municipal rights, and subject to certain obligations, which latter character is the civil status or condition of the individual, and may be quite different from his political status." And then, while maintaining that the civil status is universally governed by the single principle of domicil, domicilium, the criterion established by international law for the purpose of determining civil status, and the basis on which "the personal rights of the party, that is to say, the law which determines his majority or minority, his marriage, succession, testacy, or *intestacy, must depend;" he yet distinct [657 ly recognized that a man's political status, his country, patria, and his "nationality, that is, natural allegiance, . . . may depend on different laws in different countries." pp. 457, 460. He evidently used the word "citizen," not as equivalent to "subject," but rather to "inhabitant;" and had no thought of impeaching the established rule that all persons born under British dominion are natural born subjects.

Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, in the same year, reviewing the whole matter, said: "By the common law of England, every person born within the dominions of the Crown, no matter whether of English or of foreign parents, and, in the latter case, whether the parents were settled, or merely temporarily sojourning, in the country, was an English subject; save only the children of foreign ambassadors (who were excepted because their fathers carried their own nationality with them), or a child born to a foreigner during the hostile occupation of any part of the territories of England. No effect appears to have been given to descent as a source of nationality." Cockburn, Nationality, 7.

Mr. Dicey, in his careful and thoughtful Digest of the Law of England with Reference to the Conflict of Laws, published in 1896, states the following propositions, his principal rules being printed below in italics: "'British subject' means any person who owes permanent allegiance to the Crown. Permanent allegiance is used to distinguish the allegiance of a British subject from the allegiance of an alien who, because he is within the British dominions, owes temporary allegiance to the Crown. 'Natural-born British subject' means a British subject who has become a British subject at the moment of his birth. Subject to the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, any person who (whatever the nationality of his parents) is born within the British dominions, is a natural-born British subject. This rule contains the leading principle of English law on the subject of British nationality." The exceptions afterwards mentioned by Mr. Dicey are only these two: "1. Any person who (his father being an alien enemy) is born in a part of the British dominions [658] which at the time of such *person's birth is in hostile occupation, is an alien." "2. Any person whose father (being an alien) is at the time of such person's birth an ambassador or other diplomatic agent accredited to the Crown by the sovereign of a foreign state is (though born within the British dominions) an alien." And he adds: "The exceptional and unimportant instances in which birth within the British dominions does not of itself confer British nationality are due to the fact that, though at common law nationality or allegiance in substance depended on the place of a person's birth, it in theory at least depended, not upon the locality of a man's birth, but upon his being born within the jurisdiction and allegiance of the King of England; and it might occasionally happen that a person was born within the dominions without being born within the allegiance, or, in other words, under the protection and control of the Crown." Dicey, Confl. Laws, pp. 173-177, 741.

It thus clearly appears that by the law of England for the last three centuries, beginning before the settlement of this country, and continuing to the present day, aliens, while residing in the dominions possessed by the Crown of England, were within the allegiance, the obedience, the faith or loyalty, the protection, the power, the jurisdiction, of the English sovereign; and therefore every child born in England of alien parents was a natural-born subject, unless the child of an ambassador or other diplomatic agent of a foreign state, or of an alien enemy in hostile occupation of the place where the child was born.

III. The same rule was in force in all the English colonies upon this continent down to the time of the Declaration of Independence, and in the United States afterwards, and continued to prevail under the Constitution as originally established.

In the early case of The Charming Betsy [Murray v. The Charming Betsy] (1804), it appears to have been assumed by this court that all persons born in the United States were citizens of the United States; Chief Justice Marshall saying: "Whether a person born within the United States, or becoming a citizen according to the established laws of the country, can devest himself absolutely of *that [659 character otherwise than in such manner as may be prescribed by law, is a question which it is not necessary at present to decide." 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 64, 119 [2: 208, 226].

In Inglis v. Sailors' Snug Harbor (1830) 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 99 [7: 617], in which the plaintiff was born in the city of New York, about the time of the Declaration of Independence, the justices of this court (while differing in opinion upon other points) all agreed that the law of England as to citizenship by birth was the law of the English colonies in America. Mr. Justice Thompson, speaking for the majority of the court, said: "It is universally admitted, both in the English courts and in those of our own country, that all persons born within the colonies of North America, whilst subject to the Crown of Great Britain, were natural-born British subjects." 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 120 [7: 625]. Mr. Justice Johnson said: "He was entitled to inherit as a citizen born of the state of New York." 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 136 [7: 630]. Mr. Justice Story stated the reasons upon this point more at large, referring to Calvin's Case, Blackstone's Commentaries, and Doe, Duroure, v. Jones, above cited, and saying: "Allegiance is nothing more than the tie or duty of obedience of a subject to the sovereign under whose protection he is, and allegiance by birth is that which arises from being born within the dominions and under the protection of a particular sovereign. Two things usually concur to create citizenship; first, birth locally within the dominions of the sovereign; and, secondly, birth within the protection and obedience, or, in other words, within the ligeance of the sovereign. That is, the party must be born within a place where the sovereign is at the time in full possession and exercise of his power, and the party must also at his birth derive protection from, and consequently owe obedience or allegiance to, the sovereign, as such, de facto. There are some exceptions, which are founded upon peculiar reasons, and which, indeed, illustrate and confirm the general doctrine. Thus, a person who is born on the ocean is a subject of the prince to whom his parents then owe allegiance; for he is still deemed under the protection of his sovereign, and born in a place where he has dominion in common with all other sovereigns. So the children of an ambas-660] sador are held to be *subjects of the prince whom he represents, although born under the actual protection and in the dominions of a foreign prince." 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 155 [7: 637]. "The children of enemies, born in a place within the dominions of another sovereign, then occupied by them by conquest, are still aliens." 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 156 [7: 637]. "Nothing is better settled at the common law than the doctrine that the children even of aliens born in a country while the parents are resident there under the protection of the government, and owing a temporary allegiance thereto, are subjects by birth." 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 164 [7: 640].

In Shanks v. Dupont, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 242 [7: 667], decided (as appears by the records of this court) on the same day as the last case, it was held that a woman born in South Carolina before the Declaration of Independence, married to an English officer in Charleston during its occupation by the British forces in the Revolutionary War, and accompanying her husband on his return to England, and there remaining until her death, was a British subject, within the meaning of the treaty of peace of 1783, so that her title to land in South Carolina, by descent cast before that treaty, was protected thereby. It was of such a case, that Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The incapacities of femes covert, provided by the common law, apply to their civil rights, and are for their protection and interest. But they do not reach their political rights, nor prevent their acquiring or losing a national character. Those political rights do not stand upon the mere doctrines of municipal law, applicable to ordinary transactions, but stand upon the more general principles of the law of nations." 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 248 [7: 668]. This last sentence was relied on by the counsel for the United States, as showing that the question whether a person is a citizen of a particular country is to be determined, not by the law of that country, but by the principles of international law. But Mr. Justice Story certainly did not mean to suggest that, independently of treaty, there was any principle of international law which could defeat the operation of the established rule of citizenship by birth within the United States; for he referred (p. 245 [7: 667]) to the contemporaneous opinions in Inglis v. Sailors' Snug Har- 661]bor, *above cited, in which this rule had been distinctly recognized, and in which he had said (p. 162 [7: 639]) that "each government had a right to decide for itself who should be admitted or deemed citizens;" and in his Treatise on the Conflict of Laws, published in 1834, he said that, in respect to residence in different countries or sovereignties "there are certain principles which have been generally recognized by tribunals administering public law [adding, in later editions, "or the law of nations] as of unquestionable authority," and stated, as the first of those principles, "Persons who are born in a country are generally deemed to be citizens and subjects of that country." Story, Confl. Laws, § 48.

The English statute of 11 & 12 Wm. III. (1700) chap. 6, entitled "An Act to Enable His Majesty's Natural-Born Subjects to Inherit the Estate of Their Ancestors, Either Lineal or Collateral, Notwithstanding Their Father or Mother Were Aliens," enacted that "all and every person or persons, being the King's natural-born subject or subjects, within any of the King's realms or dominions," might and should thereafter lawfully inherit and make their titles by descent to any lands "from any of their ancestors, lineal or collateral, although the father and mother, or father or mother, or other ancestor, of such person or persons, by, from, through, or under whom" title should be made or derived, had been or should be "born out of the King's allegiance, and out of His Majesty's realms and dominions," as fully and effectually as if such parents or ancestors "had been naturalized or natural born subject or subjects within the King's dominions." 7 Statutes of the Realm, 590. It may be observed that, throughout that statute, persons born within the realm, although children of alien parents, were called "natural-born subjects." As that statute included persons born "within any of the King's realms or dominions," it of course extended to the colonies, and, not having been repealed in Maryland, was in force there. In McCreery v. Somerville (1824) 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 354 [6: 109], which concerned the title to land in the state of Maryland, it was assumed that children born in that state of an alien who was still living, and who had not been naturalized, were "native-born citizens of the *United States;" and without such as [662 sumption the case would not have presented the question decided by the court, which, as stated by Mr. Justice Story in delivering the opinion, was, "whether the statute applies to the case of a living alien ancestor, so as to create a title by heirship, where none would exist by the common law, if the ancestor were a natural born subject." 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 366 [6: 109].

Again, in Levy v. M'Cartee (1832) 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 102, 112, 113, 115 [8: 334, 338, 339], which concerned a descent cast since the American Revolution, in the state of New York, where the statute of 11 and 12 Wm. III. had been repealed, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Story, held that the case must rest for its decision exclusively upon the principles of the common law; and treated it as unquestionable that by that law a child born in England of alien parents was a natural-born subject; quoting the statement of Lord Coke in Co. Litt. 8*a*, that "if an alien cometh into England and hath issue two sons, these two sons are indigenæ, subjects born, because they are born within the realm;" and saying that such a child "was a native-born subject, according to the principles of the common law stated by this court in McCreery v. Somerville, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 354 [6: 109]."

In Dred Scott v. Sanford (1857) 60 U. S. 19 How. 393 [15: 691], Mr. Justice Curtis said: "The 1st section of the 2d article of the Constitution uses the language, 'a natural-born citizen.' It thus assumes that citizenship may be acquired by birth. Undoubtedly, this language of the Constitution was used in reference to that principle of public law, well understood in this country at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, which referred citizenship to the place of birth. 60 U. S. 19 How. 576 [15:

772]. And to this extent no different opinion was expressed or intimated by any of the other judges.

In United States v. Rhodes (1866), Mr. Justice Swayne, sitting in the circuit court, said: "All persons born in the allegiance of the King are natural-born subjects, and all persons born in the allegiance of the United States are natural-born citizens. Birth and allegiance go together. Such is the rule of the common law, and it is the common law of this country, as well as of England. . . . We find no warrant for [663] the opinion *that this great principle of the common law has ever been changed in the United States. It has always obtained here with the same vigor, and subject only to the same exceptions, since as before the Revolution." 1 Abb. (U. S.) 28, 40, 41.

The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, speaking by Mr. Justice (afterwards Chief Justice) Sewall, early held that the determination of the question whether a man was a citizen or an alien was "to be governed altogether by the principles of the common law," and that it was established, with few exceptions, "that a man born within the jurisdiction of the common law is a citizen of the country wherein he is born. By this circumstance of his birth he is subjected to the duty of allegiance, which is claimed and enforced by the sovereign of his native lands, and becomes reciprocally entitled to the protection of that sovereign and to the other rights and advantages which are included in the term 'citizenship.'" Gardner v. Ward (1805) 2 Mass. 244, note. And again: "The doctrine of common law is, that every man born within its jurisdiction is a subject of the sovereign of the country where he is born; and allegiance is not personal to the sovereign in the extent that has been contended for; it is due to him in his political capacity of sovereign of the territory, where the person owing the allegiance was born." Kilham v. Ward (1806) 2 Mass. 236, 265. It may here be observed that in a recent English case Lord Coleridge expressed the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division that the statutes of 4 Geo. II. (1731) chap. 21, and 13 Geo. III. (1773) chap. 21 (hereinafter referred to), "clearly recognize that to the King in his politic, and not in his personal capacity, is the allegiance of his subjects due." Isaacson v. Durant, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 54, 65.

The supreme court of North Carolina, speaking by Mr. Justice Gaston, said: "Before our Revolution, all free persons born within the dominions of the King of Great Britain, whatever their color or complexion, were native-born British subjects—those born out of his allegiance were aliens. . . . Upon the Revolution, no other change took place in the law of North Carolina, than was consequent upon the transition from a colony dependent on an Euro- [664] pean King to a free and *sovereign state; . . . British subjects in North Carolina became North Carolina freemen; . . . and all free persons born within the state are born citizens of the state. . . . The term 'citizen,' as understood in our law, is precisely analogous to the term 'subject' in the common law, and the change of phrase has entirely resulted from the change of government. The sovereignty has been transferred from one man to the collective body of the people—and he who before was a 'subject of the King' is now 'a citizen of the state.'" State v. Manuel (1838) 4 Dev. & B. L. 20, 24–26.

That all children, born within the dominion of the United States, of foreign parents holding no diplomatic office, became citizens at the time of their birth, does not appear to have been contested or doubted until more than fifty years after the adoption of the Constitution, when the matter was elaborately argued in the court of chancery of New York, and decided upon full consideration by Vice Chancellor Sandford in favor of their citizenship. Lynch v. Clarke (1844) 1 Sandf. Ch. 583.

The same doctrine was repeatedly affirmed in the executive departments, as, for instance, by Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, in 1854 (2 Whart. Int. Dig. (2d ed.) p. 394); by Attorney General Black in 1859 (9 Ops. Atty. Gen. 373); and by Attorney General Bates in 1862 (10 Ops. Atty. Gen. 328, 382, 394, 396).

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, speaking of the "general division of the inhabitants of every country, under the comprehensive title of aliens and natives," says: "Natives are all persons born within the jurisdiction and allegiance of the United States. This is the rule of the common law, without any regard or reference to the political condition or allegiance of their parents, with the exception of the children of ambassadors, who are in theory born within the allegiance of the foreign power they represent. . . . To create allegiance by birth, the party must be born, not only within the territory, but within the ligeance of the government. If a portion of the country be taken and held by conquest in war, the conqueror acquires the right of the conquered as to its dominion and government, and children born in the armies of a state, while abroad and *occupying a foreign country, are [665] deemed to be born in the allegiance of the sovereign to whom the army belongs. It is equally the doctrine of the English common law, that during such hostile occupation of a territory, and the parents be adhering to the enemy as subjects de facto, their children, born under such a temporary dominion, are not born under the ligeance of the conquered." 2 Kent, Com. (6th ed.) 39, 42. And he elsewhere says: "And if, at common law, all human beings born within the ligeance of the King, and under the King's obedience, were natural-born subjects, and not aliens, I do not perceive why this doctrine does not apply to these United States, in all cases in which there is no express constitutional or statute declaration to the contrary. . . "Subject" and "citizen" are, in a degree, convertible terms as applied to natives; and though the term citizen seems to be appropriate to republican freemen, yet we are, equally with the inhabitants of all other countries, subjects, for we are equally bound by allegiance and subjection to the government and law of the land." 2 Kent, Com. 258, note.

Mr. Binney, in the second edition of a paper on the Alienigenæ of the United States, printed in pamphlet in Philadelphia, with a preface bearing his signature and the date of December 1, 1853, said: "The common-law principle of allegiance was the law of all the states at the time of the Revolution, and at the adoption of the Constitution; and by that principle the citizens of the United States are, with the exceptions before mentioned [namely, foreign born children of citizens, under statutes to be presently referred to], such only as are either born or made so, born within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States, or naturalized by the authority of law, either in one of the states before the Constitution, or since that time, by virtue of an act of Congress of the United States." p. 20. "The right of citizenship never descends in the legal sense, either by the common law, or under the common naturalization acts. It is incident to birth in the country, or it is given personally by statute. The child of an alien, if born in the country, is as much a citizen as the natural-born child of a citizen, and by operation of the 666]same *principle." p. 22, note. This paper, without Mr. Binney's name, and with the note in a less complete form and not containing the passage last cited, was published (perhaps from the first edition) in the American Law Register for February, 1854. 2 Am. Law Reg. 193, 203, 204.

IV. It was contended by one of the learned counsel for the United States that the rule of the Roman law, by which the citizenship of the child followed that of the parent, was the true rule of international law, as now recognized in most civilized countries, and had superseded the rule of the common law, depending on birth within the realm, originally founded on feudal considerations.

But at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States in 1789, and long before, it would seem to have been the rule in Europe generally, as it certainly was in France, that, as said by Pothier, "Citizens, true and native-born citizens, are those who are born within the extent of the dominion of France," and "mere birth within the realm gives the rights of a native born citizen, independently of the origin of the father or mother, and of their domicil;" and children born in a foreign country, of a French father who had not established his domicil there nor given up the intention of returning, were also deemed Frenchmen, as Laurent says, by "a favor, a sort of fiction," and Calvo, "by a sort of fiction of exterritoriality, considered as born in France, and therefore invested with French nationality." Pothier, Traité des Personnes, pt. 1, tit. 2, § 1, Nos. 43, 45; Walsh-Serrant v. Walsh-Serrant (1802) 3 Journal du Palais, 884; S. C., 8 Merlin, Jurisprudence, 5th ed. Domicil, § 13; Preft du Nord v. Lebeau (1862) Journal du Palais, 1863, 312, and note; 1 Laurent, Droit Civil, No. 321; 2 Calvo, Droit International, 5th ed. § 542; Cockburn, Nationality, 13, 14; Hall, International Law, 4th ed. § 68. The general principle of citizenship by birth within French territory prevailed until after the French Revolution, and was affirmed in successive constitutions, from the one adopted by the Constituent Assembly in 1791 to that of the French Republic in 1799. Constitutions et 667]Chartes, ed. 1830, pp. 100, 136, 148, *186. The Code Napoleon of 1807 changed the law of France, and adopted, instead of the rule of country of birth, jus soli, the rule of descent of blood, jus sanguinis, as the leading principle; but an eminent commentator has observed that the framers of that Code "appear not to have wholly freed themselves from the ancient rule of France, or rather, indeed, ancient rule of Europe—de la vieï le règle française, ou plutôt même de la vieille règle européenne—according to which nationality had always been, in former times, determined by the place of birth." 1 Demolombe, Cours de Code Napoleon, 4th ed. No. 146.

The later modifications of the rule in Europe rest upon the constitutions, laws, or ordinances of the various countries, and have no important bearing upon the interpretation and effect of the Constitution of the United States. The English naturalization act of 33 Vict. (1870) chap. 14, and the commissioners' report of 1869 out of which it grew, both bear date since the adoption of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution; and, as observed by Mr. Dicey, that act has not affected the principle by which any person who, whatever the nationality of his parents, is born within the British dominions, acquires British nationality at birth, and is a natural-born British subject. Dicey, Confl. Laws, 741. At the time of the passage of that act, although the tendency on the continent of Europe was to make parentage, rather than birthplace the criterion of nationality, and citizenship was denied to the native born children of foreign parents in Germany, Switzerland, Sweden, and Norway, yet it appears still to have been conferred upon such children in Holland, Denmark, and Portugal, and, when claimed under certain specified conditions, in France, Belgium, Spain, Italy, Greece, and Russia. Cockburn, Nationality, 14–21.

There is therefore little ground for the theory that, at the time of the adoption of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, there was any settled and definite rule of international law, generally recognized by civilized nations, inconsistent with the ancient rule of citizenship by birth within the dominion.

*Nor can it be doubted that it is the [668 inherent right of every independent nation to determine for itself, and according to its own Constitution and laws, what classes of persons shall be entitled to its citizenship.

Both in England and in the United States, indeed, statutes have been passed, at various times, enacting that certain issue born abroad of English subjects, or of American citizens, respectively, should inherit, to some extent at least, the rights of their parents. But those statutes applied only to cases coming within their purport; and they have never been considered, in either country, as affecting the citizenship of persons born within its dominion.

The earliest statute was passed in the reign of Edward III. In the rolls of Parliament of 17 Edw. III. (1343), it is stated that "before these times there have been great doubt and difficulty among the lords of this realm, and the commons, as well men of the law as others, whether children who are born in parts beyond sea ought to bear inheritance after the death of their ancestors in England, because no certain law has been thereon ordained;" and by the King, lords, and commons, it was unanimously agreed that "there was no manner of doubt that the children of our Lord the King, whether they were born on this side the sea or beyond the sea, should bear the inheritance of their ancestors;" "and in regard to other children, it was agreed in this Parliament, that they also should inherit wherever they might be born in the service of the King;" but, because the Parliament was about to depart, and the business demanded great advisement and good deliberation how it should be best and most surely done, the making of a statute was put off to the next Parliament. 2 Rot. Parl. 139. By reason, apparently, of the prevalence of the plague in England, no act upon the subject was passed until 25 Edw. III. (1350), when Parliament passed an act entitled "A Statute for Those Who Are Born in Parts beyond Sea," by which—after reciting that "some people be in doubt if the children born in the parts beyond the sea, out of the ligeance of England, should be able to demand any inheritance within the same ligeance, or not, whereof a petition [669] was put *in the Parliament" of 17 Edw. III., "and was not at the same time wholly assented"—it was (1) agreed and affirmed, "that the law of the Crown of England is, and always hath been such, that the children of the Kings of England, in whatsoever parts they be born, in England or elsewhere, be able and ought to bear the inheritance after the death of their ancestors;" (2) also agreed that certain persons named, "which were born beyond the sea, out of the ligeance of England, shall be henceforth able to have and enjoy their inheritance after the death of their ancestors, in all parts within the ligeance of England, as well as those that should be born within the same ligeance;" (3) and further agreed "that all children inheritors, which from henceforth shall be born without the ligeance of the King, whose fathers and mothers at the time of their birth be and shall be at the faith and ligeance of the King of England, shall have and enjoy the same benefits and advantages to have and bear the inheritance within the same ligeance, as the other inheritors aforesaid, in time to come; so always, that the mothers of such children do pass the sea by the license and wills of their husbands." 2 Rot. Parl. 231; 1 Statutes of the Realm, 310.

It has sometimes been suggested that this general provision of the statute of 25 Edw. III. was declaratory of the common law. See Bacon, arguendo, in Calvin's Case, 2 How. St. Tr. 585; Westlake and Pollock, arguendo, in De Geer v. Stone, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 243 247; 2 Kent, Com. 50, 53; Lynch v. Clarke, 1 Sandf. Ch. 583. 659, 660; Ludlam v. Ludlam, 26 N. Y. 356 [84 Am. Dec. 193]. But all suggestions to that effect seem to have been derived, immediately or ultimately, from one or the other of these two sources: The one, the Year Book of 1 Richard III. (1483) fol. 4, pl. 7, reporting a saying of Hussey, Ch. J., "that he who is born beyond sea, and his father and mother are English, their issue inherit by the common law, but the statute makes clear, etc.," —which, at best, was but obiter dictum, for the chief justice appears to have finally rested his opinion on the statute. The other, a note added to the edition of 1688 of Dyer's Reports, 224*a*, stating that at Trinity Term, 7 Edw. III. Rot. 2 B. R., it was adjudged that children [670] of subjects born *beyond the sea in the service of the King were inheritable—which has been shown, by a search of the roll in the King's bench so referred to, to be a mistake inasmuch as the child there in question did not appear to have been born beyond sea, but only to be living abroad. Westlake, Private International Law, 3d ed. 324.

The statute of 25 Edw. III. recites the existence of doubts as to the right of foreign-born children to inherit in England; and, while it is declaratory of the rights of children of the King, and is retrospective as to the persons specifically named, yet as to all others it is, in terms, merely prospective, applying to those only "who shall be born henceforth." Mr. Binney, in his paper above cited, after a critical examination of the statute, and of the early English cases, concluded: "There is nothing in the statute which would justify the conclusion that it is declaratory of the common law in any but a single particular, namely, in regard to the children of the King, nor has it at any time been judicially held to be so." "The notion that there is any common-law principle to naturalize the children born in foreign countries of native-born American father and mother, father or mother, must be discarded. There is not, and never was, any such common-law principle." Binney, Alienigenæ, 14, 20; 2 Am. Law Reg. 199, 203. And the great weight of the English authorities, before and since he wrote, appears to support his conclusion. Calvin's Case, 7 Coke, 17*a*, 18*a*; Co. Litt. 8*a*, and Hargrave's note 36; 1 Bl. Com. 373; Barrington, Statutes, 5th ed. 268; Lord Kenyon, in Doe, Duroure, v. Jones, 4 T. R. 300 308; Lord Chancellor Cranworth in Shedden v. Patrick, 1 Macq. 535, 611; Cockburn, Nationality, 7, 9; De Geer v. Stone, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 243, 252; Dicey, Confl. Laws, pp. 178, 741. "The acquisition," says Mr. Dicey (p. 741), "of nationality by descent is foreign to the principles of the common law, and is based wholly upon statutory enactments."

It has been pertinently observed that if the statute of Edward III. had only been declaratory of the common law, the subsequent legislation on the subject would have been wholly unnecessary. Cockburn, Nationality, 9. By the *statute of 29 Car. II. (1677) chap. 6, § 1, [671] entitled "An Act for the Naturalization of Children of His Majesty's Subjects Born in Foreign Countries During the Late Troubles," all persons who, at any time between June 14, 1641, and March 24, 1660, "were born out of His Majesty's dominions, and whose fathers or mothers were natural-born subjects of this realm," were declared to be natural-born subjects. By the statute of 7 Anne (1708) chap. 5, § 3, "the children of all natural-born subjects, born out of the ligeance of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors"—explained by the statute of 4 Geo. II. (1731) chap. 21, to mean all children born out of the ligeance of the Crown of England, "whose fathers were or shall be natural-born subjects of the Crown of England, or of Great Britain, at the time of the birth of such children respectively . . . shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be natural-born subjects of this Kingdom, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever." That statute was limited to foreign-born children of natural-born subjects; and was extended by the statute of 13 Geo. III. (1773) chap. 21, to foreign-born grandchildren of natural born subjects, but not to the issue of such grandchildren; or, as put by Mr. Dicey, "British nationality does not pass by descent or inheritance beyond the second generation." See De Geer v. Stone, above cited. Dicey, Confl. Laws, p. 742.

Moreover, under those statutes, as is stated in the report in 1869 of the commissioners for inquiring into the laws of naturalization and allegiance, "no attempt has ever been made on the part of the British government (unless in eastern counties where special jurisdiction is conceded by treaty), to enforce claims upon, or to assert rights in respect of, persons born abroad, as against the country of their birth whilst they were residents therein, and when by its law they were invested with its nationality." In the appendix to their report are collected many such cases in which the British government declined to interpose, the reasons being most clearly brought out in a despatch of March 13, 1858, from Lord Malmesbury, the Foreign Secretary, to the British Ambassador at Paris, saying: "It is competent to any country to confer by general or special legislation the privileges of nationality upon those who [672] *are born out of its own territory; but it cannot confer such privileges upon such persons as against the country of their birth, when they voluntarily return to and reside therein. Those born in the territory of a nation are (as a general principle) liable when actually therein to the obligations incident to their status by birth. Great Britain considers and treats such persons as natural-born subjects, and cannot therefore deny the right of other nations to do the same. But Great Britain cannot permit the nationality of the children of foreign parents born within her territory to be questioned." Naturalization Commission Report, pp. iii., 67; United States Foreign Relations, 1873–74, pp. 1237, 1337. See also Drummond's Case (1834) 2 Knapp P. C. 295.

By the Constitution of the United States, Congress was empowered "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization." In the exercise of this power, Congress, by successive acts, beginning with the act entitled "An Act to Establish an Uniform Rule of Naturalization," passed at the second session of the first Congress under the Constitution, has made provision for the admission to citizenship of three principal classes of persons: First. Aliens, having resided for a certain time "within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States," and naturalized individually by proceedings in a court of record. Second. Children of persons so naturalized, "dwelling within the United States, and being under the age of twenty-one years at the time of such naturalization." Third. Foreign-born children of American citizens, coming within the definitions prescribed by Congress. Acts of March 26, 1790 (1 Stat. at L. 103, chap 3); January 29, 1795 (1 Stat. at L. 414, chap. 20); June 18, 1798 (1 Stat. at L. 566, chap 5); April 14, 1802 (2 Stat. at L. 153, chap. 28); March 26, 1804 (2 Stat. at L. 292, chap. 47); February 10, 1855 (10 Stat. at L. 604, chap. 71); Rev. Stat. §§ 2165, 2172, 1993.

In the act of 1790, the provision as to foreign-born children of American citizens was as follows: "The children of citizens of the United States, that may be born beyond sea, or out of the limits of the United States, shall be considered as natural born citizens: Provided, that the right of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers have never been resident *in the United States." 1 Stat. at L. 104, [673 chap. 3. In 1795 this was re-enacted, in the same words, except in substituting, for the words, "beyond sea, or out of the limits of the United States," the words "out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States." 1 Stat. at L. 415, chap. 20.

In 1802 all former acts were repealed, and the provisions concerning children of citizens were re-enacted in this form: "The children of persons duly naturalized under any of the laws of the United States, or who, previous to the passing of any law on that subject, by the government of the United States, may have become citizens of any one of the said states, under the laws thereof, being under the age of twenty-one years at the time of their parents being so naturalized or admitted to the rights of citizenship, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens of the United States, and the children of persons who now are, or have been, citizens of the United States, shall, though born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, be considered as citizens of the United States: Provided, that the right of citizensbip shall not descend to persons whose fathers have never resided within the United States." Act of April 14, 1802 (2 Stat. at L. 155, chap. 28, § 4).

The provision of that act, concerning "the children of persons duly naturalized under any of the laws of the United States," not being restricted to the children of persons already naturalized, might well be held to include children of persons thereafter to be naturalized. 2 Kent, Com. 51, 52; West v. West, 8 Paige, 433; United States v. Kellar, 11 Biss. 314; Boyd v. Thayer [Boyd v. Nebraska, Thayer], 143 U. S. 135, 177 [36: 103, 115].

But the provision concerning foreign-born children, being expressly limited to the children of persons who then were or had been citizens, clearly did not include foreign-born children of any person who became a citizen since its enactment. 2 Kent, Com. 52, 53; Binney, Alienigenæ, 20, 25; 2 Am. Law Reg. 203, 205. Mr. Binney's paper, as he states in his preface, was printed by him in the hope that Congress might supply this defect in our law.

In accordance with his suggestions, it was enacted by the *statute of February 10, [674 1855, chap. 71, that "persons heretofore born, or hereafter to be born, out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose fathers were or shall be at the time of their birth citizens of the United States, shall be deemed and considered and are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States: Provided, however, that the rights of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers never resided in the United States." 10 Stat. at L. 604; Rev. Stat. § 1993.

It thus clearly appears that, during the half century intervening between 1802 and 1855, there was no legislation whatever for the citizenship of children born abroad, during that period, of American parents who had not become citizens of the United States before the act of 1802; and that the act of 1855, like every other act of Congress upon the subject, has, by express proviso, restricted the right of citizenship thereby conferred upon foreign-born children of American citizens to those children themselves, unless they became residents of the United States. Here is nothing to countenance the theory that a general rule of citizenship by blood or descent has displaced in this country the fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within its sovereignty.

So far as we are informed, there is no authority, legislative, executive, or judicial, in England or America, which maintains or intimates that the statutes (whether considered as declaratory, or as merely prospective), conferring citizenship on foreign born children of citizens, have superseded or restricted, in any respect, the established rule of citizenship by birth within the dominion. Even those authorities in this country which have gone the farthest towards holding such statutes to be but declaratory of the common law, have distinctly recognized and emphatically asserted the citizenship of native-born children of foreign parents. 2 Kent, Com. 39, 50 53, 258, note; Lynch v. Clarke, 1 Sandf. Ch. 583, 659; Ludlam v. Ludlam, 26 N. Y. 356, 371 [84 Am. Dec. 193].

Passing by questions once earnestly controverted, but finally put at rest by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, it is beyond doubt that, before the enactment of the civil rights act of 1866, or the adoption of the consti-675]tutional *amendment, all white persons, at least, born within the sovereignty of the United States, whether children of citizens or of foreigners, excepting only children of ambassadors or public ministers of a foreign government, were native born citizens of the United States.

V. In the fore front, both of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, and of the civil rights act of 1866, the fundamental principle of citizenship by birth within the dominion was reaffirmed in the most explicit and comprehensive terms.

The civil rights act, passed at the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, began by enacting that "all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States; and such citizens, of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right, in every state and territory in the United States, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." Act of April 9, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 27, chap. 31, § 1).

The same Congress, shortly afterwards, evidently thinking it unwise, and perhaps unsafe, to leave so important a declaration of rights to depend upon an ordinary act of legislation, which might be repealed by any subsequent Congress, framed the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, and on June 16, 1866, by joint resolution proposed it to the legislatures of the several states; and on July 28, 1868, the Secretary of State issued a proclamation showing it to have been ratified by the legislatures of the requisite number of states. 14 Stat. at L. 358; 15 Stat. at L. 708.

The 1st section of the 14th Amendment of the *Constitution begins with the words, [676 "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside." As appears upon the face of the Amendment, as well as from the history of the times, this was not intended to impose any new restrictions upon citizenship, or to prevent any persons from becoming citizens by the fact of birth within the United States, who would thereby have become citizens according to the law existing before its adoption. It is declaratory in form, and enabling and extending in effect. Its main purpose doubtless was, as has been often recognized by this court, to establish the citizenship of free negroes, which had been denied in the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Taney in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) 60 U. S. 19 How. 393 [15: 691], and to put it beyond doubt that all blacks, as well as whites, born or naturalized within the jurisdiction of the United States, are citizens of the United States. The Slaughter-House Cases (1873) 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 73 [21: 394, 408]; Strauder v. West Virginia (1879) 100 U. S. 303, 306 [25: 664, 665]; Ex parte Virginia (1879) 100 U. S. 339, 345 [25: 676, 678]; Neal v. Delaware (1880) 103 U. S. 370, 386 [26: 567, 570]; Elk v. Wilkins (1884) 112 U. S. 94, 101 [28: 643, 646]. But the opening words, "All persons born," are general, not to say universal, restricted only by place and jurisdiction, and not by color or race—as was clearly recognized in all the opinions delivered in the Slaughter-House Cases, above cited.

In those cases, the point adjudged was that a statute of Louisiana, granting to a particular corporation the exclusive right for twenty-five years to have and maintain slaughterhouses within a certain district including the city of New Orleans, requiring all cattle intended for sale or slaughter in that district to be brought to the yards and slaughterhouses of the grantee, authorizing all butchers to slaughter their cattle there, and empowering the grantee to exact a reasonable fee for each animal slaughtered, was within the police powers of the state, and not in conflict with the 13th Amendment of the Constitution as creating an involuntary servitude, nor with the 14th Amendment as abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, *or as [677 depriving persons of their liberty or property without due process of law, or as denying to them the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the majority of the court, after observing that the 13th, 14th, and 15th articles of Amendment of the Constitution were all addressed to the grievances of the negro race, and were designed to remedy them, continued as follows: "We do not say that no one else but the negro can share in this protection. Both the language and spirit of these articles are to have their fair and just weight in any question of construction. Undoubtedly, while negro slavery alone was in the mind of the Congress which proposed the 13th article, it forbids any other kind of slavery, now or hereafter. If Mexican peonage or the Chinese coolie labor system shall develop slavery of the Mexican or Chinese race within our territory, this Amendment may safely be trusted to make it void. And so if other rights are assailed by the states, which properly and necessarily fall within the protection of these articles, that protection will apply, though the party interested may not be of African descent." 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 72 [21: 407]. And in treating of the 1st clause of the 14th Amendment, he said: "The distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a state is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a state, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the state to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union." 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 73, 74 [21: 408].

Mr. Justice Field, in a dissenting opinion, in which Chief Justice Chase and Justices Swayne and Bradley concurred, said of the same clause: "It recognizes in express terms, if it does not create, citizens of the United States, and it makes their citizenship dependent upon the place of their birth, or the fact of their adoption, and not upon the Constitution or laws of any state or the condition of their ancestry." 678 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 95, 111 [21: 415, *420]. Mr. Justice Bradley also said: "The question is now settled by the 14th Amendment itself, that citizenship of the United States is the primary citizenship in this country; and that state citizenship is secondary and derivitive, depending upon citizenship of the United States and the citizen's place of residence. The states have not now, if they ever had, any power to restrict their citizenship to any classes or persons." 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 112 [21: 420]. And Mr. Justice Swayne added: "The language employed is unqualified in its scope. There is no exception in its terms, and there can be properly none in their application. By the language 'citizens of the United States' was meant all such citizens; and by 'any person' was meant all persons within the jurisdiction of the state. No distinction is intimated on account of race or color. This court has no authority to interpolate a limitation that is neither expressed nor implied. Our duty is to execute the law, not to make it. The protection provided was not intended to be confined to those of any particular race or class, but to embrace equally all races, classes, and conditions of men." 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 128, 129 [21: 425, 426].

Mr. Justice Miller, indeed, while discussing the causes which led to the adoption of the 14th Amendment, made this remark: "The phrase, 'subject to its jurisdiction,' was intended to exclude from its operation children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states born within the United States." 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 73 [21: 408]. This was wholly aside from the question in judgment, and from the course of reasoning bearing upon that question. It was unsupported by any argument, or by any reference to authorities; and that it was not formulated with the same care and exactness, as if the case before the court had called for an exact definition of the phrase, is apparent from its classing foreign ministers and consuls together—whereas it was then well-settled law, as has since been recognized in a judgment of this court in which Mr. Justice Miller concurred, that consuls, as such, and unless expressly invested with a diplomatic character in addition to their ordinary powers, are not considered as intrusted with authority to represent their sovereign in his *intercourse with foreign [679 states or to vindicate his prerogatives, or entitled by the law of nations to the privileges and immunities of ambassadors or public ministers, but are subject to the jurisdiction, civil and criminal, of the courts of the country in which they reside. 1 Kent, Com. 44; Story, Confl. Laws, § 48; Wheaton, International Law, 8th ed. § 249; The Anne (1818) 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 435, 445, 446 [4: 428, 430, 431]; Gittings v. Crawford (1838) Taney, 1, 10; Re Baiz (1890) 135 U. S. 403, 424 [34: 222, 229].

In weighing a remark uttered under such circumstances, it is well to bear in mind the often quoted words of Chief Justice Marshall: "It is a maxim not to be disregarded, that general expressions, in every opinion, are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care, and considered in its full extent. Other principles which may serve to illustrate it are considered in their relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated." Cohens v. Virginia (1821) 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 264, 399 [5: 257, 290].

That neither Mr. Justice Miller, nor any of the justices who took part in the decision of The Slaughter-House Cases understood the court to be committed to the view that all children born in the United States of citizens or subjects of foreign states were excluded from the operation of the first sentence of the 14th Amendment, is manifest from a unanimous judgment of the court, delivered but two years later, while all those judges but Chief Justice Chase were still on the bench, in which Chief Justice Waite said: "Allegiance and protection are, in this connection [that is, in relation to citizenship] reciprocal obligations. The one is a compensation for the other; allegiance for protection and protection for allegiance. . . . At common law, with the nomenclature of which the framers of the Constitution were familiar, it was never doubted that all children born in a country of *parents who [680 were its citizens became themselves, upon their birth, citizens also. These were natives, or natural born citizens, as distinguished from aliens or foreigners. Some authorities go further and include as citizens children born within the jurisdiction without reference to the citizenship of their parents. As to this class there have been doubts, but never as to the first. For the purposes of this case it is not necessary to solve these doubts. It is sufficient, for everything we have now to consider, that all children born of citizen parents within the jurisdiction are themselves citizens." Minor v. Happersett (1874) 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 162, 166–168 [22: 627, 628]. The decision in that case was that a woman born of citizen parents within the United States was a citizen of the United States, although not entitled to vote, the right to the elective franchise not being essential to citizenship.

The only adjudication that has been made by this court upon the meaning of the clause, "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," in the leading provision of the 14th Amendment, is Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 94 [28: 643], in which it was decided that an Indian born a member of one of the Indian tribes within the United States, which still existed and was recognized as an Indian tribe by the United States, who had voluntarily separated himself from his tribe, and taken up his residence among the white citizens of a state, but who did not appear to have been naturalized, or taxed, or in any way recognized or treated as a citizen, either by the United States or by the state, was not a citizen of the United States, as a person born in the United States, "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," within the meaning of the clause in question.

That decision was placed upon the grounds that the meaning of those words was, "not merely subject in some respect or degree to the jurisdiction of the United States, but completely subject to their political jurisdiction, and owing them direct and immediate allegiance;" that by the Constitution, as originally established, "Indians not taxed" were excluded from the persons according to whose numbers representatives in Congress and direct taxes 681] were apportioned among the *several states, and Congress was empowered to regulate commerce, not only "with foreign nations," and among the several states, but "with the Indian tribes;" that the Indian tribes, being within the territorial limits of the United States, were not, strictly speaking, foreign states, but were alien nations, distinct political communities, the members of which owed immediate allegiance to their several tribes, and were not part of the people of the United States; that the alien and dependent condition of the members of one of those tribes could not be put off at their own will, without the action or assent of the United States; and that they were never deemed citizens, except when naturalized, collectively or individually, under explicit provisions of a treaty, or of an act of Congress; and, therefore, that "Indians born within the territorial limits of the United States, members of, and owing immediate allegiance to, one of the Indian tribes [an alien, though dependent, power,] although in a geographical sense born in the United States, are no more 'born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof,' within the meaning of the 1st section of the 14th Amendment, than the children of subjects of any foreign government born within the domain of that government, or the children born within the United States, of embassadors or other public ministers of foreign nations." And it was observed that the language used, in defining citizenship, in the 1st section of the civil rights act of 1866, by the very Congress which framed the 14th Amendment, was "all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed." 112 U. S. 99–103 [28: 645–647].

Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice Woods, dissenting, were of opinion that the Indian in question, having severed himself from his tribe and become a bona fide resident of a state, had thereby become subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, within the meaning of the 14th Amendment; and, in reference to the civil rights act of 1866, said: "Beyond question, by that act, national citizenship was conferred directly upon all persons in this country, of whatever race [excluding only 'Indians not taxed'], who were born within *the territorial [682 limits of the United States, and were not subject to any foreign power." And that view was supported by reference to the debates in the Senate upon that act, and to the ineffectual veto thereof by President Johnson, in which he said. "By the first section of the bill all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are declared to be citizens of the United States. This provision comprehends the Chinese of the Pacific states, Indians subject to taxation, the people called gypsies, as well as the entire race designated as blacks, persons of color, negroes, mulattoes, and persons of African blood. Every individual of those races, born in the United States, is, by the bill, made a citizen of the United States." 112 U. S. 112–114 [28: 650].

The decision in Elk v. Wilkins concerned only members of the Indian tribes within the United States, and had no tendency to deny citizenship to children born in the United States of foreign parents of Caucasian, African, or Mongolian descent, not in the diplomatic service of a foreign country.

The real object of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, in qualifying the words, "all persons born in the United States," by the addition, "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," would appear to have been to exclude, by the fewest and fittest words (besides children of members of the Indian tribes, standing in a peculiar relation to the national government, unknown to the common law), the two classes of cases—children born of alien enemies in hostile occupation, and children of diplomatic representatives of a foreign state—both of which, as has already been shown by the law of England, and by our own law, from the time of the first settlement of the English colonies in America, had been recognized exceptions to the fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the country. Calvin's Case, 7 Coke, 1 18*b*; Cockburn, Nationality, 7; Dicey, Confl. Laws, 177; Inglis v. Sailor's Snug Harbor, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 99, 155 [7: 617, 637]; 2 Kent, Com. 39, 42.

The principles upon which each of those exceptions rests were long ago distinctly stated by this court.

683] *In United States v. Rice (1819) 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 246 [4: 562], goods imported into Castine, in the state of Maine, while it was in the exclusive possession of the British authorities during the last war with England, were held not to be subject to duties under the revenue laws of the United States, because, as was said by Mr. Justice Story in delivering judgment: "By the conquest and military occupation of Castine, the enemy acquired that firm possession which enabled him to exercise the fullest rights of sovereignty over that place. The sovereignty of the United States over the territory was, of course, suspended, and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced there, or be obligatory upon the inhabitants who remained and submitted to the conquerors. By the surrender the inhabitants passed under a temporary allegiance to the British government, and were bound by such laws, and such only, as it chose to recognize and impose. From the nature of the case, no other laws could be obligatory upon them, for where there is no protection or allegiance or sovereignty, there can be no claim to obedience." 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 254 [4: 564].

In the great case of The Exchange [The Exchange v. McFaddon] (1812) 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 116 [3: 287], the grounds upon which foreign ministers are, and other aliens are not, exempt from the jurisdiction of this country, were set forth by Chief Justice Marshall in a clear and powerful train of reasoning, of which it will be sufficient, for our present purpose, to give little more than the outlines. The opinion did not touch upon the anomalous case of the Indian tribes, the true relation of which to the United States was not directly brought before this court until some years afterwards in Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (1831) 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 1 [8: 25]; nor upon the case of a suspension of a sovereignty of the United States over part of their territory by reason of a hostile occupation, such as was also afterwards presented in United States v. Rice, above cited. But in all other respects it covered the whole question of what persons within the territory of the United States are subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

The Chief Justice first laid down the general principle: "The jurisdiction of the nation with-684]in its own territory is *necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it deriving validity from an external source would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction. All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories, must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source. This consent may be either express or implied. In the latter case, it is less determinate, exposed more to the uncertainties of construction; but, if understood, not less obligatory." 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 136 [3: 298].

He then stated, and supported by argument and illustration, the propositions, that "this full and absolute territorial jurisdiction being alike the attribute of every sovereign, and being incapable of conferring extra territorial power," has "given rise to a class of cases in which every sovereign is understood to waive the exercise of a part of that complete exclusive territorial jurisdiction which has been stated to be the attribute of every nation"—the first of which is the exemption from arrest or detention of the person of a foreign sovereign entering its territory with its license, because "a foreign sovereign is not understood as intending to subject himself to a jurisdiction incompatible with his dignity, and the dignity of his nation;" "a second case, standing on the same principles with the first, is the immunity which all civilized nations allow to foreign ministers;" "a third case in which a sovereign is understood to cede a portion of his territorial jurisdiction is, where he allows the troops of a foreign prince to pass through his dominions;" and, in conclusion, that "a public armed ship, in the service of a foreign sovereign, with whom the government of the United States is at peace and having entered an American port open for her reception, on the terms on which ships of war are generally permitted to enter the ports of a friendly power, must be considered as having come into the American territory, under an implied promise that while necessarily within it, and demeaning herself in a friendly *manner, she should be ex- [685 empt from the jurisdiction of the country." 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 137-139, 147 [3: 294, 297].

As to the immunity of a foreign minister, he said: "Whatever may be the principle on which this immunity is established, whether we consider him as in the place of the sovereign he represents, or by a political fiction suppose him to be extraterritorial, and, therefore, in point of law, not within the jurisdiction of the sovereign at whose court he resides; still the immunity itself is granted by the governing power of the nation to which the minister is deputed. This fiction of extraterritoriality could not be erected and supported against the will of the sovereign of the territory. He is supposed to assent to it. . . . The assent of the sovereign to the very important and extensive exemptions from territorial jurisdiction which are admitted to attach to foreign ministers is implied from the considerations that, without such exemption, every sovereign would hazard his own dignity by employing a public minister abroad. His minister would owe temporary and local allegiance to a foreign prince, and would be less competent to the objects of his mission. A sovereign committing the interests of his nation with a foreign power to the care of a person whom he has selected for that purpose cannot intend to subject his minister in any degree to that power; and, therefore, a consent to receive him implies a consent that he shall possess those privileges which his principal intended he should retain —privileges which are essential to the dignity of his sovereign, and to the duties he is bound to perform." 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 138, 139 [3: 294].

The reasons for not allowing to other aliens exemption "from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are found" were stated as follows: "When private individuals of one nation spread themselves through another as business or caprice may direct, mingling indiscriminately with the inhabitants of that other, or when merchant vessels enter for the purposes of trade, it would be obviously inconvenient and dangerous to society, and would subject the laws to continual infraction, and the government to degradation, if such individuals or merchants did not owe temporary and 686]local allegiance, and were *not amenable to the jurisdiction of the country. Nor can the foreign sovereign have any motive for wishing such exemption His subjects thus passing into foreign countries are not employed by him, nor are they engaged in national pursuits. Consequently there are powerful motives for not exempting persons of this description from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are found, and no one motive for requiring it. The implied license, therefore, under which they enter, can never be construed to grant such exemption." 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 144 [3: 296].

In short, the judgment in the case of The Exchange declared, as incontrovertible principles, that the jurisdiction of every nation within its own territory is exclusive and absolute, and is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by the nation itself; that all exceptions to its full and absolute territorial jurisdiction must be traced up to its own consent, express or implied; that upon its consent to cede, or to waive the exercise of, a part of its territorial jurisdiction, rest the exemptions from that jurisdiction of foreign sovereigns or their armies entering its territory with its permission, and of their foreign ministers and public ships of war; and that the implied license under which private individuals of another nation enter the territory and mingle indiscriminately with its inhabitants, for purposes of business or pleasure, can never be construed to grant to them an exemption from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are found See also Carlisle v. United States (1872) 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 147, 155 [21: 426, 430]; Radich v. Hutchins (1877) 95 U. S. 210 [24: 409]; Wildenhus's Case [Mali v Common Jail Keeper] (1887) 120 U. S. 1 [30: 565]; Chae Chan Ping v. United States (1889) 130 U. S. 581, 603, 604 [32: 1068, 1075].

From the first organization of the national government under the Constitution, the naturalization acts of the United States, in providing for the admission of aliens to citizenship by judicial proceedings, uniformly required every applicant to have resided for a certain time "within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States;" and thus applied the words "under the jurisdiction of the United States" to aliens residing here before they had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, or had renounced 687] allegiance *to a foreign government. Acts of March 26, 1790 (1 Stat. at L. 103, chap. 3); January 29, 1795 (1 Stat. at L. 414, chap. 20, § 1); June 18, 1798 (1 Stat. at L. 566, 568, chap. 54, §§ 1, 6); April 14, 1802 (2 Stat. at L. 153, chap. 28, § 1); March 22, 1816 (3 Stat. at L. 258, chap. 32, § 1); May 24, 1828 (4 Stat. at L. 310, chap. 116, § 2); Rev. Stat. § 2165. And, from 1795, the provisions of those acts, which granted citizenship to foreign-born children of American parents, described such children as "born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States." Acts of January 29, 1795 (1 Stat. at L. 415, chap. 20, § 3); April 14, 1802 (2 Stat. at L. 155, chap. 28, § 4); February 10, 1855 (10 Stat. at L. 604, chap. 71); U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 1993, 2172. Thus Congress, when dealing with the question of citizenship in that aspect, treated aliens residing in this country as "under the jurisdiction of the United States," and American parents residing abroad as "out of the jurisdiction of the United States."

The words "in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," in the first sentence of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, must be presumed to have been understood and intended by the Congress which proposed the Amendment, and by the legislatures which adopted it, in the same sense in which the like words had been used by Chief Justice Marshall in the well known case of The Exchange; and as the equivalent of the words "within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States," and the converse of the words, "out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States," as habitually used in the naturalization acts. This presumption is confirmed by the use of the word "jurisdiction" in the last clause of the same section of the 14th Amendment, which forbids any state to "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It is impossible to construe the words "subject to the jurisdiction thereof," in the opening sentence, as less comprehensive than the words "within its jurisdiction," in the concluding sentence of the same section; or to hold that persons "within the jurisdiction" of one of the states of the Union are not "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States."

These considerations confirm the view, already expressed in this opinion, that the opening sentence of the 14th *Amendment is [688 throughout affirmative and declaratory, intended to allay doubts and to settle controversies which had arisen, and not to impose any new restrictions upon citizenship.

By the civil rights act of 1866, "all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed," were declared to be citizens of the United States. In the light of the law as previously established, and of the history of the times, it can hardly be doubted that the words of that act, "not subject to any foreign power," were not intended to exclude any children born in this country from the citizenship which would theretofore have been their birthright; or, for instance, for the first time in our history, to deny the right of citizenship to native-born children of foreign white parents not in the diplomatic service of their own country, nor in hostile occupation of part of our territory. But any possible doubt in this regard was removed when the negative words of the civil rights act, "not subject to any foreign power," gave way, in the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, to the affirmative words, "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States."

This sentence of the 14th Amendment is declaratory of existing rights, and affirmative of existing law, as to each of the qualifications therein expressed—"born in the United States," "naturalized in the United States," and "subject to the jurisdiction thereof"—in short, as to everything relating to the acquisition of citizenship by facts occurring within the limits of the United States. But it has not touched the acquisition of citizenship by being born abroad of American parents; and has left the subject to be regulated, as it had always been, by Congress, in the exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution to establish a uniform rule of naturalization.

The effect of the enactments conferring citizenship on foreign-born children of American parents has been defined, and the fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the dominion of the United States, notwithstanding alienage of parents, has been affirmed, in well considered opinions of the executive departments of the government, since the adoption of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution.

689] *In 1869 Attorney General Hoar gave to Mr. Fish, the Secretary of State, an opinion that children born and domiciled abroad, whose fathers were native born citizens of the United States and had at some time resided therein, were, under the statute of February 10, 1855 (10 Stat. at L. 604, chap. 71), citizens of the United States, and "entitled to all the privileges of citizenship which it is in the power of the United States government to confer. Within the sovereignty and jurisdiction of this nation, they are undoubtedly entitled to all the privileges of citizens. . . . But," the Attorney General added, "while the United States may, by law, fix or declare the conditions constituting citizens of the country within its own territorial jurisdiction, and may confer the rights of American citizens everywhere upon persons who are not rightfully subject to the authority of any foreign country or government, it is clear that the United Sates cannot, by undertaking to confer the rights of citizenship upon the subjects of a foreign nation who have not come within our territory, interfere with the just rights of such nation to the government and control of its own subjects. If, therefore, by the laws of the country of their birth, children of American citizens, born in that country, are subjects of its government, I do not think that it is competent to the United States, by any legislation, to interfere with that relation, or, by undertaking to extend to them the rights of citizens of this country, to interfere with the allegiance which they may owe to the country of their birth while they continue within its territory, or to change the relation to other foreign nations which, by reason of their place of birth, may at any time exist. The rule of the common law I understand to be, that a person 'born in a strange country, under the obedience of a strange prince or country, is an alien' (Co. Litt. 128*b*), and that every person owes allegiance to the country of his birth." Citizenship-Passports, 13 Ops. Atty. Gen. 89–91.

In 1871 Mr. Fish, writing to Mr. Marsh, the American minister to Italy, said: "The 14th Amendment to the Constitution declares that 'all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States.' This is simply an affirmance *of the common law of[690 England and of this country, so far as it asserts the status of citizenship to be fixed by the place of nativity, irrespective of parentage. The qualification, 'and subject to the jurisdiction thereof,' was probably intended to exclude the children of foreign ministers, and other persons who may be within our territory with rights of extraterritoriality." 2 Whart. Int. Dig. p. 394.

In August, 1873, President Grant, in the exercise of the authority expressly conferred upon the President by art. 2, § 2, of the Constitution, to "require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices," required the opinions of the members of his cabinet upon several questions of allegiance, naturalization, and expatriation. Mr. Fish, in his opinion, which is entitled to much weight, as well from the circumstances under which it was rendered, as from its masterly treatment of the subject, said:

"Every independent state has as one of the incidents of its sovereignty the right of municipal legislation and jurisdiction over all persons within its territory, and may therefore change their nationality by naturalization, and this, without regard to the municipal laws of the country whose subjects are so naturalized, as long as they remain or exercise the rights conferred by naturalization, within the territory and jurisdiction of the state which grants it.

"It may also endow with the rights and privileges of its citizenship persons residing in other countries, so as to entitle them to all rights of property and of succession within its limits, and also with political privileges and civil rights to be enjoyed or exercised within the territory and jurisdiction of the state thus conferring its citizenship.

"But no sovereignty can extend its jurisdiction beyond its own territorial limits so as to relieve those born under and subject to another jurisdiction from their obligations or duties thereto; nor can the municipal law of one state interfere with the duties or obligations which its citizens incur, while voluntarily resident in such foreign state and without the jurisdiction of their own country.

*"It is evident from the proviso in the[691 act of 10th February, 1855, viz., 'that the rights of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers never resided in the United States,' that the law-making power not only had in view this limit to the efficiency of its own municipal enactments in foreign jurisdiction, but that it has conferred only a qualified citizenship upon the children of American fathers born without the jurisdiction of the United States, and has denied to them, what pertains to other American citizens, the right of transmitting citizenship to their children, unless they shall have made themselves residents of the United States, or, in the language of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, have made themselves 'subject to the jurisdiction thereof.'

"The child born of alien parents in the United States is held to be a citizen thereof, and to be subject to duties with regard to this country which do not attach to the father.

"The same principle on which such children are held by us to be citizens of the United States, and to be subject to duties to this country, applies to the children of American fathers born without the jurisdiction of the United States, and entitles the country within whose jurisdiction they are born to claim them as citizens and to subject them to duties to it.

"Such children are born to a double character; the citizenship of the father is that of the child, so far as the laws of the country of which the father is a citizen are concerned, and within the jurisdiction of that country; but the child, from the circumstances of his birth, may acquire rights and owes another fealty besides that which attaches to the father." Opinions of the Executive Departments on Expatriation, Naturalization, and Allegiance (1873) 17, 18; U. S. Foreign Relations, 1873-74, pp. 1191, 1192.

In 1886, upon the application of a son born in France of an American citizen, and residing in France, for a passport, Mr. Bayard, the Secretary of State, as appears by letters from him to the Secretary of Legation in Paris, and from the latter to the applicant, quoted and adopted the conclusions of Attorney General Hoar in his opinion above cited. U. S. Foreign Relations, 1886, p. 303; 2 Calvo, Droit International, § 546.

692] *These opinions go to show that, since the adoption of the 14th Amendment, the executive branch of the government, the one charged with the duty of protecting American citizens abroad against unjust treatment by other nations, has taken the same view of the act of Congress of 1855, declaring children born abroad of American citizens to be themselves citizens, which, as mentioned in a former part of this opinion, the English foreign office has taken of similar acts of Parliament—holding that such statutes cannot, consistently with our own established rule of citizenship by birth in this country, operate extraterritorially so far as to relieve any person born and residing in a foreign country, and subject to its government, from his allegiance to that country.

In a very recent case, the supreme court of New Jersey held that a person, born in this country of Scotch parents who were domiciled but had not been naturalized here, was "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States," within the meaning of the 14th Amendment, and was "not subject to any foreign power," within the meaning of the civil rights act of 1866; and, in an opinion delivered by Justice Van Syckel, with the concurrence of Chief Justice Beasley, said: "The object of the 14th Amendment, as is well known, was to confer upon the colored race the right of citizenship. It, however, gave to the colored people no right superior to that granted to the white race. The ancestors of all the colored people then in the United States were of foreign birth and could not have been naturalized, or in any way have become entitled to the right of citizenship. The colored people were no more subject to the jurisdiction of the United States by reason of their birth here than were the white children born in this country of parents who were not citizens. The same rule must be applied to both races, and unless the general rule, that when the parents are domiciled here birth establishes the right to citizenship, is accepted, the 14th Amendment has failed to accomplish its purpose and the colored people are not citizens. The 14th Amendment, by the language, 'all persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof,' was intended *to bring all races, without[693 distinction of color, within the rule which prior to that time pertained to the white race." Benny v. O'Brien (1895) 58 N. J. L. 36, 39, 40.

The foregoing considerations and authorities irresistibly lead us to these conclusions: The 14th Amendment affirms the ancient and fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the territory, in the allegiance and under the protection of the country, including all children here born of resident aliens, with the exceptions or qualifications (as old as the rule itself) of children of foreign sovereigns or their ministers, or born on foreign public ships, or of enemies within and during a hostile occupation of part of our territory, and with the single additional exception of children of members of the Indian tribes owing direct allegiance to their several tribes. The Amendment, in clear words and in manifest intent, includes the children born within the territory of the United States, of all other persons, of whatever race or color, domiciled within the United States. Every citizen or subject of another country, while domiciled here, is within the allegiance and the protection, and consequently subject to the jurisdiction, of the United States. His allegiance to the United States is direct and immediate, and, although but local and temporary, continuing only so long as he remains within our territory, is yet, in the words of Lord Coke, in Calvin's Case, 7 Coke, 6*a*, "strong enough to make a natural subject, for if he hath issue here, that issue is a natural-born subject;" and his child, as said by Mr. Binney in his essay before quoted, "if born in the country, is as much a citizen as the natural born child of a citizen, and by operation of the same principle." It can hardly be denied that an alien is completely subject to the political jurisdiction of the country in which he resides—seeing that, as said by Mr. Webster, when Secretary of State, in his report to the President on Thrasher's Case, in 1851, and since repeated by this court, "independently of a residence with intention to continue such residence; independently of any domiciliation; independently of the taking of any oath of allegiance or of renouncing any former allegiance, it is well known that, by the public law, an alien, or a stranger *born, for so long a time as he continues [694 within the dominions of a foreign government, owes obedience to the laws of that government, and may be punished for treason, or other crimes, as a native-born subject might be, unless his case is varied by some treaty stipulations." Ex. Doc. H. R. No. 10, 1st sess. 32d Congress, p. 4; 6 Webster's Works, 526; Carlisle v. United States, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 147, 155 [21: 426, 430]; Calvin's Case, 7 Coke, 6*a*; Ellesmere on Postnati, 63; 1 Hale, P. C. 62; 4 Bl. Com. 74, 92.

To hold that the 14th Amendment of the Constitution excludes from citizenship the children, born in the United States, of citizens or subjects of other countries, would be to deny citizenship to thousands of persons of English, Scotch, Irish, German, or other European parentage, who have always been considered and treated as citizens of the United States.

VI. Whatever considerations, in the absence of a controlling provision of the Constitution, might influence the legislative or the executive branch of the government to decline to admit persons of the Chinese race to the status of citizens of the United States, there are none that can constrain or permit the judiciary to refuse to give full effect to the peremptory and explicit language of the 14th Amendment, which declares and ordains that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States."

Chinese persons, born out of the United States, remaining subjects of the Emperor of China, and not having become citizens of the United States, are entitled to the protection of and owe allegiance to the United States so long as they are permitted by the United States to reside here; and are "subject to the jurisdiction thereof," in the same sense as all other aliens residing in the United States. Yick Wo v. Hopkins (1886) 118 U. S. 356 [30: 220]; Lau Ow Bew v. United States (1892) 144 U. S. 47, 61, 62 [36: 340, 345, 346]; Fong Yue Ting v. United States (1893) 149 U. S. 698, 724 [37: 905, 917]; Lem Moon Sing v. United States (1895) 158 U. S. 538, 547 [39: 1082, 1085]; Wong Wing v. United States (1896) 163 U. S. 228, 238 [41: 140, 144].

In Yick Wo v. Hopkins the decision was that [695] an ordinance *of the city of San Francisco, regulating a certain business, and which, as executed by the board of supervisors, made an arbitrary discrimination between natives of China, still subjects of the Emperor of China, but domiciled in the United States, and all other persons, was contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution. Mr. Justice Matthews, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The right of the petitioners, as affected by the proceedings of which they complain, are not less because they are aliens and subjects of the Emperor of China." The 14th Amendment to the Constitution is not confined to the protection of citizens. It says, 'Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.' These provisions are universal in their application to all persons within the territorial jurisdiction, without regard to any differences of race, of color, or of nationality; and the equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws. It is accordingly enacted, by § 1977 of the Revised Statutes, that 'all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every state and territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other.' The questions we have to consider and decide in these cases, therefore, are to be treated as involving the rights of every citizen of the United States, equally with those of the strangers and aliens who now invoke the jurisdiction of the court." 118 U. S. 368, 369 [30: 226].

The manner in which reference was made, in the passage above quoted, to § 1977 of the Revised Statutes, shows that the change of phrase in that section, re-enacting § 16 of the statute of May 31, 1870, chap. 114 (16 Stat. at L. 144), as compared with § 1 of the civil rights act of 1866—by substituting, for the words in that act, "of every race and color," the words, "within the jurisdiction of the United States"—was not *considered as making the sec- [696] tion, as it now stands, less applicable to persons of every race and color and nationality, than it was in its original form; and is hardly consistent with attributing any narrower meaning to the words "subject to the jurisdiction thereof" in the first sentence of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, which may itself have been the cause of the change in the phraseology of that provision of the civil rights act.

The decision in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, indeed, did not directly pass upon the effect of these words in the 14th Amendment, but turned upon subsequent provisions of the same section. But, as already observed, it is impossible to attribute to the words, "subject to the jurisdiction thereof," that is to say, of the United States, at the beginning, a less comprehensive meaning than to the words "within its jurisdiction," that is, of the state, at the end of the same section; or to hold that persons, who are indisputably "within the jurisdiction" of the state, are not "subject to the jurisdiction" of the nation.

It necessarily follows that persons born in China, subjects of the Emperor of China, but domiciled in the United States, having been adjudged, in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, to be within the jurisdiction of the state, within the meaning of the concluding sentence, must be held to be subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, within the meaning of the first sentence of this section of the Constitution; and their children, "born in the United States," cannot be less "subject to the jurisdiction thereof."

Accordingly, in Quock Ting v. United States (1891) 140 U. S. 417 [35: 501], which, like the case at bar, was a writ of habeas corpus to test the lawfulness of the exclusion of a Chinese person who alleged that he was a citizen of the United States by birth, it was assumed on all hands that a person of the Chinese race, born in the United States, was a citizen of the United States. The decision turned upon the failure of the petitioner to prove that he was born in this country; and the question at issue was, as stated in the opinion of the majority of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Field, "whether the evidence was sufficient to show that the petitioner was a citizen of the *United [697] States," or, as stated by Mr. Justice Brewer in his dissenting opinion, "whether the petitioner was born in this country or not." 140 U. S. 419, 423 [35: 502, 503].

In State v. Ah Chew (1881) 16 Nev. 50, 58 [40 Am. Rep. 488], the supreme court of Nevada said: "The Amendments did not confer the right of citizenship upon the Mongolian race, except such as are born within the United States." In the courts of the United States in the ninth circuit, it has been uniformly held, in a series of opinions delivered by Mr. Justice Field, Judge Sawyer, Judge Deady, Judge Hanford, and Judge Morrow, that a child born in the United States of Chinese parents, subjects of the Emperor of China, is a native-born citizen of the United States. Re Look Tin Sing (1884) 10 Sawy. 353; Ex Parte Chin King (1888) 13 Sawy. 333; Re Yung Sing Hee (1888) 13 Sawy. 482; Re Wy Ching (1888) 13 Sawy. 530; Gee Fook Sing v. United States (1892) 7 U. S. App. 27; Re Wong Kim Ark (1896) 71 Fed. Rep. 382. And we are not aware of any judicial decision to the contrary.

During the debates in the Senate in January and February, 1866, upon the civil rights bill, Mr. Trumbull, the chairman of the committee which reported the bill, moved to amend the first sentence thereof so as to read, "All persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color." Mr. Cowan, of Pennsylvania, asked, "Whether it will not have the effect of naturalizing the children of Chinese and gypsies, born in this country?" Mr. Trumbull answered, "Undoubtedly;" and asked, "Is not the child born in this country of German parents a citizen?" Mr. Cowan replied, "The children of German parents are citizens; but Germans are not Chinese." Mr. Trumbull rejoined: "The law makes no such distinction and the child of an Asiatic is just as much a citizen as the child of a European." Mr. Reverdy Johnson suggested that the words "without distinction of color," should be omitted as unnecessary; and said: "The Amendment, as it stands, is that all persons born in the United States, and not subject to a foreign power, shall, by virtue of birth, be citizens. To that [698] I am willing to *consent; and that comprehends all persons, without any reference to race or color, who may be so born." And Mr. Trumbull agreed that striking out those words would make no difference in the meaning, but thought it better that they should be retained, to remove all possible doubt. Congressional Globe, 39th Cong. 1st sess. pt. 1, pp. 498, 573, 574.

The 14th Amendment of the Constitution, as originally framed by the House of Representatives, lacked the opening sentence. When it came before the Senate in May, 1866, Mr. Howard, of Michigan, moved to amend by prefixing the sentence in its present form (less the words "or naturalized"), and reading, "All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside." Mr. Cowan objected, upon the ground that the Mongolian race ought to be excluded; and said: "Is the child of the Chinese immigrant in California a citizen? . . . I do not know how my honorable friend from California looks upon Chinese, but I do know how some of his fellow citizens regard them. I have no doubt that now they are useful, and I have no doubt that within proper restraints, allowing that state and the other Pacific states to manage them as they may see fit, they may be useful; but I would not tie their hands by the Constitution of the United States so as to prevent them hereafter from dealing with them as in their wisdom they see fit." Mr. Conness, of California, replied: "The proposition before us relates simply, in that respect, to the children begotten of Chinese parents in California, and it is proposed to declare that they shall be citizens. We have declared that by law; now it is proposed to incorporate the same provision in the fundamental instrument of the nation. I am in favor of doing so. I voted for the proposition to declare that the children of all parentage whatever, born in California, should be regarded and treated as citizens of the United States, entitled to equal civil rights with other citizens of the United States." "We are entirely ready to accept the provision proposed in this constitutional Amendment, that the children born here of Mongolian parents shall be declared by the Constitution of *the United [699] States to be entitled to civil rights and to equal protection before the law with others." Congressional Globe, 39th Congress, 1st sess. pt. 4, pp. 2890–2892. It does not appear to have been suggested, in either house of Congress, that children born in the United States of Chinese parents would not come within the terms and effect of the leading sentence of the 14th Amendment.

Doubtless, the intention of the Congress which framed and of the states which adopted this Amendment of the Constitution must be sought in the words of the Amendment; and the debates in Congress are not admissible as evidence to control the meaning of those words. But the statements above quoted are valuable as contemporaneous opinions of jurists and statesmen upon the legal meaning of the words themselves; and are, at the least, interesting as showing that the application of the Amendment to the Chinese race was considered and not overlooked.

The acts of Congress, known as the Chinese exclusion acts, the earliest of which was passed some fourteen years after the adoption of the constitutional Amendment, cannot control its meaning, or impair its effect, but must be construed and executed in subordination to its provisions. And the right of the United States, as exercised by and under those acts, to exclude or to expel from the country persons of the Chinese race, born in China, and continuing to be subjects of the Emperor of China, though having acquired a commercial domicil in the United States, has been upheld by this court, for reasons applicable to all aliens alike, and inapplicable to citizens, of whatever race or color. Chae Chan Ping v. United States, 130 U. S. 581 [32: 1068]; Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, 142 U. S. 651 [35: 1146]; Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698 [37: 140]; Lem Moon Sing v. United States, 158 U. S. 538 [39: 1082]; Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U. S. 228 [41: 140].

In Fon Yue Ting v. United States the right of the United States to expel such Chinese persons was placed upon the grounds, that the right to exclude or to expel all aliens, or any class of aliens, absolutely or upon certain conditions, is an inherent and inalienable right of every sovereign and independent *nation, es- [700] sential to its safety, its independence, and its welfare; that the power to exclude or to expel aliens, being a power affecting international relations, is vested in the political departments of the government, and is to be regulated by treaty or by act of Congress, and to be executed by the executive authority according to the regulations so established, except so far as the judicial department has been authorized by treaty or by statute, or is required by the paramount law of the Constitution, to intervene; that the power to exclude and the power to expel aliens rest upon one foundation, are derived from one source, are supported by the same reasons, and are in truth but parts of one and the same power; and, therefore, that the power of Congress to expel, like the power to exclude, aliens, or any specified class of aliens, from the country, may be exercised entirely through executive officers; or Congress may call in the aid of the judiciary to ascertain any contested facts on which an alien's right to be in the country has been made by Congress to depend. 149 U. S. 711, 713, 714 [37: 912, 913].

In Lem Moon Sing v. United States the same principles were reaffirmed, and were applied to a Chinese person, born in China, and who had acquired a commercial domicil in the United States, and who, having voluntarily left the country on a temporary visit to China, and with the intention of returning to and continuing his residence in this country, claimed the right under a statute or treaty to re-enter it; and the distinction between the right of an alien to the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States for his person and property while within the jurisdiction thereof, and his claim of a right to re-enter the United States after a visit to his native land, was expressed by the court as follows: "He is none the less an alien because of his having a commercial domicil in this country. While he lawfully remains here he is entitled to the benefit of the guaranties of life, liberty, and property, secured by the Constitution to all persons, of whatever race, within the jurisdiction of the United States. His personal rights when he is in this country, and such of his property as is here during his absence, are as fully protected by the supreme law of the land as if he were a 701] native or *naturalized citizen of the United States. But when he has voluntarily gone from the country, and is beyond its jurisdiction, being an alien, he cannot re-enter the United States in violation of the will of the government as expressed in enactments of the lawmaking power." 158 U. S. 547, 548 [39: 1085, 1086].

It is true that Chinese persons born in China cannot be naturalized, like other aliens, by proceedings under the naturalization laws. But this is for want of any statute or treaty authorizing or permitting such naturalization, as will appear by tracing the history of the statutes, treaties, and decisions upon that subject—always bearing in mind that statutes enacted by Congress, as well as treaties made by the President and Senate, must yield to the paramount and supreme law of the Constitution.

The power granted to Congress by the Constitution, "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," was long ago adjudged by this court to be vested exclusively in Congress. Chirac v. Chirac (1817) 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 259 [4: 234]. For many years after the establishment of the original Constitution, and until two years after the adoption of the 14th Amendment, Congress never authorized the naturalization of anyone but "free white persons." Acts of March 26, 1790 (1 Stat. at L. 103, chap. 3); January 29, 1795 (1 Stat. at L. 414, chap. 20); April 14, 1802 (2 Stat. at L. 153, chap. 28); March 26, 1804 (2 Stat. at L. 292, chap. 47); March 22, 1816 (3 Stat. at L. 258, chap. 32); May 26, 1824 (4 Stat. at L. 69, chap. 186); May 24, 1828 (4 Stat. at L. 310, chap. 116). By the treaty between the United States and China, made July 28, 1868, and promulgated February 5, 1870, it was provided that "nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States." 16 Stat. at L. 740. By the act of July 14, 1870, chap. 254, § 7, for the first time, the naturalization laws were "extended to aliens of African nativity and to persons of African descent." 16 Stat. at L. 256. This extension, as embodied in the Revised Statutes, took the form of providing that those laws should "apply to aliens [being free white persons, and to aliens] of African nativity and to persons of African descent;" and it was amended by the act of *February 18, 1875, chap. 80, [702 by inserting the words above printed in brackets. Rev. Stat. 2d ed. § 2169; 18 Stat. at L. 318. Those statutes were held, by the circuit court of the United States in California, not to embrace Chinese aliens. Re Ah Yup (1878) 5 Sawy. 155. And by the act of May 6, 1882, chap. 126, § 14, it was expressly enacted that "hereafter no state court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship." 22 Stat. at L. 61.

In Fong Yue Ting v. United States (1893) above cited, this court said: "Chinese persons not born in this country have never been recognized as citizens of the United States, nor authorized to become such under the naturalization laws." 149 U. S. 716 [37: 914].

The Convention between the United States and China of 1894, provided that "Chinese laborers or Chinese of any other class, either permanently or temporarily residing in the United States, shall have for the protection of their persons and property all rights that are given by the laws of the United States to citizens of the most favored nation, excepting the right to become naturalized citizens." 28 Stat. at L. 1211. And it has since been decided, by the same judge who held this appellee to be a citizen of the United States by virtue of his birth therein, that a native of China of the Mongolian race could not be admitted to citizenship under the naturalization laws. Re Gee Hop (1895) 71 Fed. Rep. 274.

The 14th Amendment of the Constitution, in the declaration that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside," contemplates two sources of citizenship, and two only: birth and naturalization. Citizenship by naturalization can only be acquired by naturalization under the authority and in the forms of law. But citizenship by birth is established by the mere fact of birth under the circumstances defined in the Constitution. Every person born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, becomes at once a citizen of the United States, and needs no naturalization. A person born out of the jurisdiction of the United States can only become a citizen by being naturalized, either by 703] treaty, as in the case *of the annexation of foreign territory; or by authority of Congress, exercised either by declaring certain classes of persons to be citizens, as in the enactments conferring citizenship upon foreign-born children of citizens, or by enabling foreigners individually to become citizens by proceedings in the judicial tribunals, as in the ordinary provisions of the naturalization acts.

The power of naturalization, vested in Congress by the Constitution, is a power to confer citizenship, not a power to take it away. "A naturalized citizen," said Chief Justice Marshall, "becomes a member of the society, possessing all the rights of a native citizen, and standing, in the view of the Constitution, on the footing of a native. The Constitution does not authorize Congress to enlarge or abridge those rights. The simple power of the national legislature is to prescribe a uniform rule of naturalization, and the exercise of this power exhausts it, so far as respects the individual. The Constitution then takes him up, and, among other rights, extends to him the capacity of suing in the courts of the United States precisely under the same circumstances under which a native might sue." Osborn v. United States Bank, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 738, 827 [6: 204, 225]. Congress having no power to abridge the rights conferred by the Constitution upon those who have become naturalized citizens by virtue of acts of Congress, a fortiori no act or omission of Congress, as to providing for the naturalization of parents or children of a particular race, can affect citizenship acquired as a birthright, by virtue of the Constitution itself, without any aid of legislation. The 14th Amendment, while it leaves the power where it was before, in Congress, to regulate naturalization, has conferred no authority upon Congress to restrict the effect of birth, declared by the Constitution to constitute a sufficient and complete right to citizenship.

No one doubts that the Amendment, as soon as it was promulgated, applied to persons of African descent born in the United States, wherever the birthplace of their parents might have been; and yet, for two years afterwards, there was no statute authorizing persons of that race to be naturalized. If the omission or the refusal of Congress to permit certain classes 704] *of persons to be made citizens by naturalization could be allowed the effect of correspondingly restricting the classes of persons who should become citizens by birth, it would be in the power of Congress, at any time, by striking negroes out of the naturalization laws, and limiting those laws, as they were formerly limited, to white persons only, to defeat the main purpose of the constitutional amendment.

The fact, therefore, that acts of Congress or treaties have not permitted Chinese persons born out of this country to become citizens by naturalization, cannot exclude Chinese persons born in this country from the operation of the broad and clear words of the Constitution, "All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States."

VII. Upon the facts agreed in this case, the American citizenship which Wong Kim Ark acquired by birth within the United States has not been lost or taken away by anything happening since his birth. No doubt he might himself, after coming of age, renounce this citizenship, and become a citizen of the country of his parents, or of any other country; for by our law, as solemnly declared by Congress, "the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people," and "any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officer of the United States which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the Republic." U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1999, re-enacting act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. at L. 223, 224, chap. 249, § 1). Whether any act of himself, or of his parents, during his minority, could have the same effect, is at least doubtful. But it would be out of place to pursue that inquiry; inasmuch as it is expressly agreed that his residence has always been in the United States, and not elsewhere; that each of his temporary visits to China, the one for some months when he was about seventeen years old, and the other something like a year about the time of his coming of age, was made with the intention of returning, and was followed by his actual return, to the United States; and "that said Wong Kim Ark has not, either by himself or his parents acting *for him, ever renounced his al-[705 legiance to the United States, and that he has never done or committed any act or thing to exclude him therefrom."

The evident intention, and the necessary effect, of the submission of this case to the decision of the court upon the facts agreed by the parties, were to present for determination the single question, stated at the beginning of this opinion, namely, whether a child born in the United States, of parents of Chinese descent, who, at the time of his birth, are subjects of the Emperor of China, but have a permanent domicil and residence in the United States, and are there carrying on business, and are not employed in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China, becomes at the time of his birth a citizen of the United States. For the reasons above stated, this court is of opinion that the question must be answered in the affirmative. Order affirmed.

Mr. Justice McKenna, not having been a member of the court when this case was argued, took no part in the decision.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion and judgment of the court in this case.

The proposition is that a child born in this country of parents who were not citizens of the United States, and under the laws of their own country and of the United States could not become such—as was the fact from the beginning of the government in respect of the class of aliens to which the parents in this instance belonged—is, from the moment of his birth, a citizen of the United States, by virtue of the first clause of the 14th Amendment, any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

The argument is, that although the Constitution prior to that amendment nowhere attempted to define the words "citizens of the United States" and "natural-born citizen," as used therein, yet that it must be interpreted in the light of the English common law rule which made the place of birth the criterion of nationality; that that rule "was in force in all 706] *the English colonies upon this continent down to the time of the Declaration of Independence, and in the United States afterwards, and continued to prevail under the Constitution as originally established;" and "that before the enactment of the civil rights act of 1866 and the adoption of the constitutional amendment, all white persons, at least, born within the sovereignty of the United States, whether children of citizens or of foreigners, excepting only children of ambassadors or public ministers of a foreign government, were native-born citizens of the United States."

Thus the 14th Amendment is held to be merely declaratory except that it brings all persons, irrespective of color, within the scope of the alleged rule, and puts that rule beyond the control of the legislative power.

If the conclusion of the majority opinion is correct, then the children of citizens of the United States, who have been born abroad since July 28, 1868, when the Amendment was declared ratified, were, and are, aliens, unless they have, or shall, on attaining majority, become citizens by naturalization in the United States; and no statutory provision to the contrary is of any force or effect. And children who are aliens by descent, but born on our soil, are exempted from the exercise of the power to exclude or to expel aliens, or any class of aliens, so often maintained by this court, an exemption apparently disregarded by the acts in respect of the exclusion of persons of Chinese descent.

The English common-law rule, which it is insisted was in force after the Declaration of Independence, was that "every person born within the dominions of the Crown, no matter whether of English or of foreign parents, and, in the latter case, whether the parents were settled or merely temporarily sojourning in the country, was an English subject; save only the children of foreign ambassadors (who were excepted because their fathers carried their own nationality with them) or a child born to a foreigner during the hostile occupation of any part of the territories of England." Cockburn, Nationality, 7.

The tie which bound the child to the Crown 707] was indissoluble. *The nationality of his parents had no bearing on his nationality. Though born during a temporary stay of a few days, the child was irretrievably a British subject. Hall, Foreign Jurisdiction, etc., § 15.

The rule was the outcome of the connection in feudalism between the individual and the soil on which he lived, and the allegiance due was that of liegemen to their liege lord It was not local and temporary as was the obedience to the laws owed by aliens within the dominions of the Crown, but permanent and indissoluble, and not to be canceled by any change of time or place or circumstances.

And it is this rule, pure and simple, which it is asserted determined citizenship of the United States during the entire period prior to the passage of the act of April 9, 1866, and the ratification of the 14th Amendment, and governed the meaning of the words "citizens of the United States" and "natural-born citizen" used in the Constitution as originally framed and adopted I submit that no such rule obtained during the period referred to, and that those words bore no such construction; that the act of April 9, 1866, expressed the contrary rule; that the 14th Amendment prescribed the same rule as the act; and that if that Amendment bears the construction now put upon it, it imposed the English common-law rule on this country for the first time and made it "absolute and unbending," just as Great Britain was being relieved from its inconveniences.

Obviously where the Constitution deals with common-law rights and uses common-law phraseology, its language should be read in the light of the common law; but when the question arises as to what constitutes citizenship of the nation, involving as it does international relations, and political as contradistinguished from civil status, international principles must be considered, and, unless the municipal law of England appears to have been affirmatively accepted, it cannot be allowed to control in the matter of construction.

Nationality is essentially a political idea and belongs to the sphere of public law. Hence Mr. Justice Story, in Shanks v. Dupont, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 248 [7: 668], said that the incapacities of femes covert*, at common law, "do not [708 reach their political rights, nor prevent their acquiring or losing a national character. Those political rights do not stand upon the mere doctrines of municipal law, applicable to ordinary transactions, but stand upon the more general principles of the law of nations."

Twiss in his work on the Law of Nations, says that "natural allegiance, or the obligation of perpetual obedience to the government of a country wherein a man may happen to have been born, which he cannot forfeit, or cancel, or vary by any change of time, or place, or circumstance, is the creature of civil law, and finds no countenance in the law of nations, as it is in direct conflict with the incontestable rule of that law." Vol. 1, p. 231.

Before the Revolution, the views of the publicists had been thus put by Vattel: "The natives, or natural-born citizens, are those born in the country, of parents who are citizens. As the society cannot exist and perpetuate itself otherwise than by the children of the citizens, those children naturally follow the condition of their fathers, and succeed to all their rights. The society is supposed to desire this, in consequence of what it owes to its own preservation; and it is presumed, as matter of course, that each citizen, on entering into society, reserves to his children the right of becoming members of it. The country of the fathers is therefore that of the children; and these become true citizens merely by their tacit consent. We shall soon see whether, on their coming to the years of discretion, they may renounce their right, and what they owe to the society in which they were born. I say, that, in order to be of the country, it is necessary that a person be born of a father who is a citizen; for, if he is born there of a foreigner, it will be only the place of his birth, and not his country." Book 1, chap. 19, § 212. "The true bond which connects the child with the body politic is not the matter of an inanimate piece of land, but the moral relations of his parentage. . . . The place of birth produces no change in the rule that children follow the condition of their fathers, for it is not naturally the place of birth that gives rights, but extraction."

And to the same effect are the modern writ-
709]ers, as, for *instance, Bar, who says: "To what nation a person belongs is by the laws of all nations closely dependent on descent; it is almost an universal rule that the citizenship of the parents determines it—that of the father where children are lawful, and where they are bastards, that of their mother, without regard to the place of their birth; and that it must necessarily be recognized as the correct canon, since nationality is in its essence dependent on descent." International Law, § 31.

The framers of the Constitution were familiar with the distinction between the Roman law and the feudal law, between obligations based on territoriality and those based on the personal and invisible character of origin, and there is nothing to show that in the matter of nationality they intended to adhere to principles derived from regal government, which they had just assisted in overthrowing.

Manifestly, when the sovereignty of the Crown was thrown off and an independent government established, every rule of the common law and every statute of England obtaining in the colonies, in derogation of the principles on which the new government was founded, was abrogated.

The states, for all national purposes embraced in the Constitution, became one, united under the same sovereign authority, and governed by the same laws. but they retained their jurisdiction over all persons and things within their territorial limits, except where surrendered to the general government or restrained by the Constitution, and protection to life, liberty, and property rested primarily with them. So far as the jus commune, or folk-right, relating to the rights of persons, was concerned, the colonies regarded it as their birthright, and adopted such parts of it as they found applicable to their condition. Van Ness v. Packard, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 137 [7: 374].

They became sovereign and independent states, and when the Republic was created each of the thirteen states had its own local usages, customs, and common law, while in respect of the national government there necessarily was no general, independent, and separate common law of the United States, nor has there ever been. Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 591, 658 [8: 1055, 1079].

710] *As to the jura coronæ, including therein the obligation of allegiance, the extent to which these ever were applicable in this country depended on circumstances, and it would seem quite clear that the rule making locality of birth the criterion of citizenship because creating a permanent tie of allegiance, no more survived the American Revolution than the same rule survived the French Revolution.

Doubtless, before the latter event, in the progress of monarchial power, the rule which involved the principle of liege homage may have become the rule of Europe; but that idea never had any basis in the United States.

As Chief Justice Taney observed in Fleming v. Page, 50 U. S. 9 How. 618 [13: 282], though in a different connection: "It is true that most of the states have adopted the principles of English jurisprudence, so far as it concerns private and individual rights. And when such rights are in question, we habitually refer to the English decisions, not only with respect, but in many cases as authoritative. But in the distribution of political power between the great departments of government, there is such a wide difference between the power conferred on the President of the United States, and the authority and sovereignty which belong to the English Crown, that it would be altogether unsafe to reason from any supposed resemblance between them, either as regards conquest in war, or any other subject where the rights and powers of the executive arm of the government are brought into question. Our own Constitution and form of government must be our only guide."

And Mr. Lawrence, in his edition of Wheaton (Lawrence's Wheaton, p 920), makes this comment: "There is, it is believed, as great a difference between the territorial allegiance claimed by an hereditary sovereign on feudal principles, and the personal right of citizenship participated in by all the members of the political community, according to American institutions, as there is between the authority and sovereignty of the Queen of England, and the power of the American President; and the inapplicability of English precedents is as clear in the one case as in the other. The same view, with particular application to naturalization, was early taken by the *American [711 commentator on Blackstone. Tucker's Blackstone, vol. 1, pt. 2, appx. p. 96."

Blackstone distinguished allegiance into two sorts, the one natural and perpetual; the other local and temporary. Natural allegiance, so called, was allegiance resulting from birth in subjection to the Crown, and indelibility was an essential, vital, and necessary characteristic.

The royal commission to inquire into the laws of naturalization and allegiance was created May 1, 1868; and, in their report, the commissioners, among other things, say: "The allegiance of a natural-born British subject is regarded by the common law as indelible. We are of opinion that this doctrine of the common law is neither reasonable nor convenient. It is at variance with those principles on which the rights and duties of a subject should be deemed to rest; it conflicts with that freedom of action which is now recognized as most conducive to the general good, as well as to individual happiness and prosperity; and it is especially inconsistent with the practice of a state which allows to its subjects absolute freedom of emigration."

However, the commission by a majority declined to recommend the abandonment of the rule altogether though "clearly of opinion that it ought not to be, as it now is, absolute and unbending," but recommended certain modifications which were carried out in subsequent legislation.

But from the Declaration of Independence to this day the United States have rejected the doctrine of indissoluble allegiance and maintained the general right of expatriation, to be exercised in subordination to the public interests and subject to regulation.

As early as the act of January 29, 1795 (1 Stat. at L. 414, chap. 20) applicants for naturalization were required to take not simply an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, but of absolute renunciation and abjuration of all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince or state, and particularly to the prince or state of which they were before the citizens or subjects.

The statute 3 Jac. I. chap. 4, provided that [712] promising obedience *to any other prince, state, or potentate subjected the person so doing to be adjudged a traitor, and to suffer the penalty of high treason; and in respect of the act of 1795 Lord Grenville wrote to our minister, Rufus King: "No British subject can, by such a form of renunciation as that which is prescribed in the American law of naturalization, devest himself of his allegiance to his sovereign. Such a declaration or renunciation made by any of the King's subjects would, instead of operating as a protection to them, be considered an act highly criminal on their part." 2 Am. Stat. Papers, 149. And see Fitch v. Webber, 6 Hare, 51.

Nevertheless, Congress has persisted from 1795 in rejecting the English rule and in requiring the alien, who would become a citizen of the United States, in taking on himself the ties binding him to our government, to affirmatively sever the ties that bound him to any other.

The subject was examined at length in 1856, in an opinion given the Secretary of State by Attorney General Cushing ([Right of Expatriation] 8 Ops. Atty. Gen. 139) where the views of the writers on international law and those expressed in cases in the Federal and state courts are largely set forth, and the Attorney General says: "The doctrine of absolute and perpetual allegiance,—the root of the denial of the right of any emigration,—is inadmissible in the United States. It was a matter involved in, and settled for us by, the Revolution, which founded the American Union.

"Moreover, the right of expatriation, under fit circumstances of time and of manner, being expressly asserted in the legislation of several of the states, and conformed by decisions of their courts, must be considered as thus made a part of the fundamental public law of the United States."

Expatriation included not simply the leaving of one's native country, but the becoming naturalized in the country adopted as a future residence. The emigration which the United States encouraged was that of those who could become incorporate with its people; make its flag their own; and aid in the accomplishment of a common destiny; and it was obstruction to such emigration that made one of the charges against the Crown in the Declaration.

[713] *_Ainslie_ v. _Martin_, 9 Mass. 454, 460 (1813); _Murray_ v. _M'Carty_, 2 Munf. 393 (1811); _Alsberry_ v. _Hawkins_, 9 Dana, 177 [33 Am. Dec. 543] (1839), are among the cases cited. In _Ainslie_ v. _Martin_, the indelibility of allegiance according to the common law rule was maintained; while in _Murray_ v. _M'Carty_, and _Alsberry_ v. _Hawkins_, the right of expatriation was recognized as a practical and fundamental doctrine of America. There was no uniform rule so far as the states are severally concerned, and none such assumed in respect of the United States.

In 1859, Attorney General Black thus advised the President ([Rights of Expatriation], 9 Ops. Atty. Gen. 356): "The natural right of every free person, who owes no debts and is not guilty of any crime, to leave the country of his birth, in good faith and for an honest purpose, the privilege of throwing off his natural allegiance and substituting another allegiance in its place—the general right, in one word, of expatriation, is incontestable. I know that the common law of England denies it; that the judicial decisions of that country are opposed to it; and that some of our own courts, misled by British authority, have expressed, though not very decisively, the same opinion. But all this is very far from settling the question. The municipal code of England is not one of the sources from which we derive our knowledge of international law. We take it from natural reason and justice, from writers of known wisdom, and from the practice of civilized nations. All these are opposed to the doctrine of perpetual allegiance."

In the opinion of the Attorney General, the United States, in recognizing the right of expatriation, declined, from the beginning, to accept the view that rested the obligation of the citizen on feudal principles, and proceeded on the law of nations, which was in direct conflict therewith.

And the correctness of this conclusion was specifically affirmed not many years after, when the right, as the natural and inherent right of all people and fundamental in this country, was declared by Congress in the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. at L. 223, chap. 249), carried forward into §§ 1999 and 2000 of the Revised Statutes, in 1874.

*It is beyond dispute that the most vi-[714] tal constituent of the English common-law rule has always been rejected in respect of citizenship of the United States.

Whether it was also the rule at common law that the children of British subjects born abroad were themselves British subjects—nationality being attributed to parentage instead of locality—has been variously determined. If this were so, of course the statute of Edw. III. was declaratory, as was the subsequent legislation. But if not, then such children were aliens, and the statute of 7 Anne and subsequent statutes must be regarded as in some sort acts of naturalization. On the other hand, it seems to me that the rule _partus sequitur patrem_ has always applied to children of our citizens born abroad and that the acts of Congress on this subject are clearly declaratory, passed out of abundant caution to obviate misunderstandings which might arise from the prevalence of the contrary rule elsewhere.

Section 1993 of the Revised Statutes provides that children so born "are declared to be citizens of the United States; but the rights of citizenship shall not descend to children whose fathers never resided in the United States." Thus a limitation is prescribed on the passage of citizenship by descent beyond the second generation if then surrendered by permanent nonresidence, and this limitation was contained in all the acts from 1790 down. Section 2172 provides that such children shall "be considered as citizens thereof."

The language of the statute of 7 Anne is quite different in providing that "the children of all natural-born subjects born out of the ligeance of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be natural-born subjects of this kingdom, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever."

In my judgment, the children of our citizens born abroad were always natural born citizens from the standpoint of this government. If not, and if the correct view is that they were aliens but collectively naturalized under the acts of Congress which recognized them as natural born, then those born since the 14th
715] Amendment are not citizens at all, *unless they have become such by individual compliance with the general laws for the naturalization of aliens, because they are not naturalized "in the United States."

By the 5th clause of the 1st section of article 2 of the Constitution it is provided that: "No person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States."

In the convention it was, says Mr. Bancroft, "objected that no number of years could properly prepare a foreigner for that place; but as men of other lands had spilled their blood in the cause of the United States, and had assisted at every stage of the formation of their institutions, on the 7th of September it was unanimously settled that foreign-born residents of fourteen years who should be citizens at the time of the formation of the Constitution are eligible to the office of President." 2 Bancroft, Hist. U. S. Const. 192.

Considering the circumstances surrounding the framing of the Constitution, I submit that it is unreasonable to conclude that "natural-born citizens" applied to everybody born within the geographical tract known as the United States, irrespective of circumstances: and that the children of foreigners, happening to be born to them while passing through the country, whether of royal parentage or not, or whether of the Mongolian, Malay, or other race, were eligible to the Presidency, while children of our citizens, born abroad, were not.

By the 2d clause of the 2d section of article 1 it is provided that: "No person shall be a representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state in which he shall be chosen;" and by the 3d clause of § 3, that: "No person shall be a senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state for which he shall be chosen."

*At that time the theory largely ob-[716
tained, as stated by Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, "that every citizen of a state is ipso facto a citizen of the United States." § 1693.

Mr. Justice Curtis, in Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. 19 How. 577 [15: 772], expressed the opinion that under the Constitution of the United States "every free person born on the soil of a state, who is a citizen of that state by force of its Constitution or laws, is also a citizen of the United States." And he said: "Among the powers unquestionably possessed by the several states was that of determining what persons should, and what persons should not be citizens. It was practicable to confer on the government of the Union this entire power. It embraced what may, well enough for the purpose now in view, be divided into three parts. First: The power to remove the disabilities of alienage, either by special acts in reference to each individual case, or by establishing a rule of naturalization to be administered and applied by the courts. Second: Determining what persons should enjoy the privileges of citizenship, in respect to the internal affairs of the several states. Third: What native-born persons should be citizens of the United States.

"The first-named power, that of establishing a uniform rule of naturalization, was granted; and here the grant, according to its terms, stopped. Construing a Constitution containing only limited and defined powers of government, the argument derived from this definite and restricted power to establish a rule of naturalization must be admitted to be exceedingly strong. I do not say it is necessarily decisive. It might be controlled by other parts of the Constitution. But when this particular subject of citizenship was under consideration, and, in the clause specially intended to define the extent of power concerning it, we find a particular part of this entire power separated from the residue, and conferred on the general government, there arises a strong presumption that this is all which is granted, and that the residue is left to the states and to the people. And this presumption is, in my opinion, converted into a certainty, by an examination of all such other clauses of the Constitution as touch this subject."

*But in that case Mr. Chief Justice Ta-[717
ney said: "The words 'people of the United States' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the government through their representatives. They are what we familiarly call the 'sovereign people,' and every citizen is one of this people, and a constituent member of the sovereignty. . . . In discussing this question we must not confound the rights of citizenship which a state may confer within its own limits, and the rights of citizenship as a member of the Union.

It does not by any means follow, because he has all the rights and privileges of a citizen of a state, that he must be a citizen of the United States. He may have all of the rights and privileges of the citizen of a state, and yet not be entitled to the rights and privileges of a citizen in any other state. For, previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, every state had the undoubted right to confer on whomsoever it pleased the character of citizen, and to endow him with all its rights. But this character, of course, was confined to the boundaries of the state, and gave him no rights or privileges in other states beyond those secured to him by the laws of nations and the comity of states. Nor have the several states surrendered the power of conferring these rights and privileges by adopting the Constitution of the United States. Each state may still confer them upon an alien, or anyone it thinks proper, or upon any class or description of persons; yet he would not be a citizen in the sense in which that word is used in the Constitution of the United States, nor entitled to sue as such in one of its courts, nor to the privileges and immunities of a citizen in the other states. The rights which he would acquire would be restricted to the state which gave them. The Constitution has conferred on Congress the right to establish a uniform rule of naturalization and this right is evidently exclusive, and has always been held by this court to be so. Consequently, no state, since the adoption of the Constitution, can, by naturalizing an alien, invest him with the rights and privileges secured to a citizen of the state under the Federal gov-
718] ernment, *although, so far as the state alone was concerned, he would undoubtedly be entitled to the rights of a citizen, and clothed with all the rights and immunities which the Constitution and laws of the state attached to that character."

Plainly the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a state thus pointed out, involved then, as now, the complete rights of the citizen internationally as contradistinguished from those of persons not citizens of the United States.

The English common-law rule recognized no exception in the instance of birth during the mere temporary or accidental sojourn of the parents. As allegiance sprang from the place of birth, regardless of parentage and supervened at the moment of birth, the inquiry whether the parents were permanently or only temporarily within the realm was wholly immaterial. And it is settled in England that the question of domicil is entirely distinct from that of allegiance. The one relates to the civil, and the other to the political, status. Udny v. Udny, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 457.

But a different view as to the effect of permanent abode on nationality has been expressed in this country.

In his work on Conflict of Laws, § 48, Mr. Justice Story treating the subject as one of public law, said: "Persons who are born in a country are generally deemed to be citizens and subjects of that country. A reasonable qualification of the rule would seem to be that it should not apply to the children of parents who were in itinere in the country, or who were abiding there for temporary purposes, as for health or curiosity or occasional business. It would be difficult, however, to assert, that in the present state of public law such a qualification is universally established."

Undoubtedly all persons born in a country are presumptively citizens thereof, but the presumption is not irrebuttable.

In his lectures on Constitutional Law, p. 279, Mr. Justice Miller remarked: "If a stranger or traveler passing through, or temporarily residing in, this country, who has not himself been naturalized, and who claims to owe no allegiance to our government, has a child born here which goes out of the country *with its[719 father, such child is not a citizen of the United States, because it was not subject to its jurisdiction."

And to the same effect are the rulings of Mr. Secretary Frelinghuysen in the matter of Hausding and Mr. Secretary Bayard in the matter of Greisser.

Hausding was born in the United States, went to Europe, and, desiring to return, applied to the minister of the United States for a passport, which was refused on the ground that the applicant was born of Saxon subjects temporarily in the United States. Mr. Secretary Frelinghuysen wrote to Mr. Kasson, our minister: "You ask, 'Can one born a foreign subject, but within the United States, make the option after his majority, and while still living abroad, to adopt the citizenship of his birthplace? It seems not, and that he must change his allegiance by emigration and legal process of naturalization.' Sections 1992 and 1993 of the Revised Statutes clearly show the extent of existing legislation; that the fact of birth, under circumstances implying alien subjection, establishes of itself no right of citizenship; and that the citizenship of a person so born is to be acquired in some legitimate manner through the operation of statute. No statute contemplates the acquisition of the declared character of an American citizen by a person not at a time within the jurisdiction of the tribunal of record which confers that character."

Greisser was born in the state of Ohio in 1867, his father being a German subject and domiciled in Germany, to which country the child returned. After quoting the act of 1866 and the 14th Amendment, Mr. Secretary Bayard said: "Richard Greisser was no doubt born in the United States, but he was on his birth 'subject to a foreign power,' and 'not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.' He was not, therefore, under the statute and the Constitution, a citizen of the United States by birth; and it is not pretended that he has any other title to citizenship." 2 Whart. Int. Dig. 399.

The civil rights act became a law April 9, 1866 (14 Stat. at L. 27, chap. 31), and provided: "That all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians *not taxed, are hereby declared[720 to be citizens of the United States." And this was re enacted June 22, 1874, in the Revised Statutes, § 1992.

The words "not subject to any foreign power" do not in themselves refer to mere territorial jurisdiction, for the persons referred to are persons born in the United States. All such persons are undoubtedly subject to the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and yet the act concedes that nevertheless they may be subject to the political jurisdiction of a foreign government. In other words, by the terms of the act all persons born in the United States, and not owing allegiance to any foreign power, are citizens.

The allegiance of children so born is not the local allegiance arising from their parents merely being domiciled in the country, and it is single and not double allegiance. Indeed double allegiance in the sense of double nationality has no place in our law, and the existence of a man without a country is not recognized.

But it is argued that the words "and not subject to any foreign power" should be construed as excepting from the operation of the statute only the children of public ministers and of aliens born during hostile occupation.

Was there any necessity of excepting them? And if there were others described by the words, why should the language be construed to exclude them?

Whether the immunity of foreign ministers from local allegiance rests on the fiction of extraterritoriality or on the waiver of territorial jurisdiction by receiving them as representatives of other sovereignties, the result is the same.

They do not owe allegiance otherwise than to their own governments, and their children cannot be regarded as born within any other.

And this is true as to the children of aliens within territory in hostile occupation, who necessarily are not under the protection of, nor bound to render obedience to, the sovereign whose domains are invaded; but it is not pretended that the children of citizens of a government so situated would not become its citizens at their birth, as the permanent allegiance [721] *of their parents would not be severed by the mere fact of the enemy's possession.

If the act of 1866 had not contained the words "and not subject to any foreign power," the children neither of public ministers nor of aliens in territory in hostile occupation would have been included within its terms on any proper construction, for their birth would not have subjected them to ties of allegiance, whether local and temporary, or general and permanent.

There was no necessity as to them for the insertion of the words although they were embraced by them.

But there were others in respect of whom the exception was needed, namely, the children of aliens, whose parents owed local and temporary allegiance merely, remaining subject to a foreign power by virtue of the tie of permanent allegiance, which they had not severed by formal abjuration or equivalent conduct, and some of whom were not permitted to do so if they would.

And it was to prevent the acquisition of citizenship by the children of such aliens merely by birth within the geographical limits of the United States that the words were inserted.

Two months after the statute was enacted, on June 16, 1866, the 14th Amendment was proposed, and declared ratified July 28, 1868. The 1st clause of the 1st section reads: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside." The act was passed and the Amendment proposed by the same Congress, and it is not open to reasonable doubt that the words "subject to the jurisdiction thereof" in the Amendment were used as synonymous with the words "and not subject to any foreign power" of the act.

The jurists and statesmen referred to in the majority opinion, notably Senators Trumbull and Reverdy Johnson, concurred in that view, Senator Trumbull saying: "What do we mean by 'subject to the jurisdiction of the United States?' Not owing allegiance to anybody else; that is what it means." And Senator Johnson: "Now, all that this Amendment provides *is that all persons born within the [722] United States and not subject to some foreign power—for that no doubt is the meaning of the committee who have brought the matter before us—shall be considered as citizens of the United States." Cong. Globe, 1st sess. 39th Cong. 2893 et seq.

This was distinctly so ruled in Elk v. Wilkins, infra; and no reason is perceived why the words were used if they apply only to that obedience which all persons, not possessing immunity therefrom, must pay the laws of the country in which they happen to be.

Dr. Wharton says that the words "subject to the jurisdiction" must be construed in the sense which international law attributes to them, but that the children of our citizens born abroad, and of foreigners born in the United States have the right on arriving at full age to elect one allegiance and repudiate the other. Whart. Confl. Laws, §§ 10–12.

The Constitution and statutes do not contemplate double allegiance, and how can such election be determined? By § 1993 of the Revised Statutes, the citizenship of the children of our citizens born abroad may be terminated in that generation by their persistent abandonment of their country; while by §§ 2167 and 2168, special provision is made for the naturalization of alien minor residents on attaining majority by dispensing with the previous declaration of intention and allowing three years of minority on the five years' residence required; and also for the naturalization of children of aliens whose parents have died after making declaration of intention. By § 2172 children of naturalized citizens are to be considered citizens.

While, then, the naturalization of the father carries with it that of his minor children, and his declaration of intention relieves them from the preliminary steps for naturalization, and minors are allowed to count part of the residence of their minority on the whole term required and are relieved from the declaration of intention, the statutes make no provision for formal declaration of election by children born in this country of alien parents on attaining majority.

The point, however, before us, is whether permanent *allegiance is imposed at [723] birth without regard to circumstances—permanent until thrown off and another allegiance acquired by formal acts—not local and determined by a mere change of domicil.

The 14th Amendment came before the court in the Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 73 [21: 394, 408], at December term, 1872 (the cases having been brought up by writ of error in May, 1870, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 273 [19: 915]), and it was held that the first clause was intended to define citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a state, which definitions recognized the distinction between the one and the other; that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the states embrace generally those fundamental civil rights for the security of which organized society was instituted, and which remain, with certain exceptions mentioned in the Federal Constitution, under the care of the state governments; while the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States are those which arise out of the nature and essential character of the national government, the provisions of its Constitution, or its laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof; and that it is the latter which are placed under the protection of Congress by the second clause.

And Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, in analyzing the first clause, observed that "the phrase 'subject to its jurisdiction' was intended to exclude from its operation children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states born within the United States."

That eminent judge did not have in mind the distinction between persons charged with diplomatic functions and those who were not, but was well aware that consuls are usually the citizens or subjects of the foreign states from which they come, and that, indeed, the appointment of natives of the places where the consular service is required, though permissible, has been pronounced objectionable in principle.

His view was that the children of "citizens or subjects of foreign states" owing permanent allegiance elsewhere and only local obedience here, are not otherwise subject to the jurisdiction of the United States than are their parents.

724] *Mr. Justice Field dissented from the judgment of the court, and subsequently in the case of Look Tin Sing, 10 Sawy. 353, in the circuit court for the district of California, held children born of Chinese parents in the United States to be citizens, and the cases subsequently decided in the ninth circuit followed that ruling. Hence the conclusion in this case which the able opinion of the district judge shows might well have been otherwise.

I do not insist that, although what was said was deemed essential to the argument and a necessary part of it, the point was definitely disposed of in the Slaughter-House Cases, particularly as Chief Justice Waite in Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 167 [22: 628], remarked that there were doubts, which for the purposes of the case then in hand, it was not necessary to solve. But that solution is furnished in Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 101 [28: 646], where the subject received great consideration, and it was said:

By the 13th Amendment of the Constitution slavery was prohibited. The main object of the opening sentence of the 14th Amendment was to settle the question, upon which there had been a difference of opinion throughout the country and in this court, as to the citizenship of free negroes (Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. 19 How. 393 [15: 691]; and to put it beyond doubt that all persons, white or black, and whether formerly slaves or not, born or naturalized in the United States, and owing no allegiance to any alien power, should be citizens of the United States and of the state in which they reside. Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 73 [21: 394, 408]; Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 306 [25: 664, 665].

"This section contemplates two sources of citizenship, and two sources only: birth and naturalization. The persons declared to be citizens are 'all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof.' The evident meaning of these last words is, not merely subject in some respect or degree to the jurisdiction of the United States, but completely subject to their political jurisdiction, and owing them direct and immediate allegiance. And the words relate to the time of birth in the one case, as they do *to the time of [725 naturalization in the other. Persons not thus subject to the jurisdiction of the United States at the time of birth cannot become so afterwards, except by being naturalized, either individually, as by proceeding under the naturalization acts, or collectively, as by the force of a treaty by which foreign territory is acquired."

To be "completely subject" to the political jurisdiction of the United States is to be in no respect or degree subject to the political jurisdiction of any other government.

Now I take it that the children of aliens whose parents have not only not renounced their allegiance to their native country, but are forbidden by its system of government, as well as by its positive laws, from doing so, and are not permitted to acquire another citizenship by the laws of the country into which they come, must necessarily remain themselves subject to the same sovereignty as their parents, and cannot, in the nature of things, be, any more than their parents, completely subject to the jurisdiction of such country.

Generally, speaking, I understand the subjects of the Emperor of China—that ancient Empire, with its history of thousands of years, and its unbroken continuity in belief, traditions, and government, in spite of revolutions and changes of dynasty—to be bound to him by every conception of duty and by every principle of their religion, of which filial piety is the first and greatest commandment; and formerly, perhaps still, their penal laws denounced the severest penalties on those who renounced their country and allegiance, and their abettors; and, in effect, held the relatives at home of Chinese in foreign lands as hostage for their loyalty.† And *whatever concession [726

†The fundamental laws of China have remained practically unchanged since the second century before Christ. The statutes have from time to time undergone modifications, but there does not seem to be any English or French translation of the Chinese Penal Code later than that by Staunton, published in 1810. That Code provided: "All persons renouncing their country and allegiance, or devising the means thereof, shall be beheaded; and in the punishment of this offense, no distinction shall be made between principals and accesso-may have been made by treaty in the direction of admitting the rights of expatriation in some sense, they seem in the United States to have remained pilgrims and sojourners as all their fathers were. 149 U. S. 717 [37: 914]. At all events, they have never been allowed by our laws to acquire our nationality, and, exeept in sporadic instances, do not appear ever to have desired to do so.

The 14th Amendment was not designed to accord citizenship to persons so situated and to cut off the legislative power from dealing with the subject.

The right of a nation to expel or deport foreigners who have not been naturalized or taken any steps toward becoming citizens of a country is as absolute and unqualified as the right to prohibit and prevent their entrance into the country. 149 U. S. 707 [37: 911].

But can the persons expelled be subjected to "cruel and unjust punishments" in the process of expulsion, as would be the case if children born to them in this country were separated from them on their departure, because citizens of the United States? Was it intended by this amendment to tear up parental relations by the roots?

The 15th Amendment provides that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Was it intended thereby that children of aliens should, by virtue of being born in the United 727]*States, be entitled on attaining majority to vote irrespective of the treaties and laws of the United States in regard to such aliens?

In providing that persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens, the 14th Amendment undoubtedly had particular reference to securing citizenship to the members of the colored race, whose servile status had been obliterated by the 13th Amendment, and who had been born in the United States, but were not and never had been subject to any foreign power. They were not aliens (and even if they could be so regarded, this operated as a collective naturalization), and their political status could not be affected by any change of the laws for the naturalization of individuals.

Nobody can deny that the question of citizenship in a nation is of the most vital importance. It is a precious heritage, as well as an inestimable acquisition; and I cannot think that any safeguard surrounding it was intended to be thrown down by the Amendment.

In suggesting some of the privileges and immunities of national citizenship, in the Slaughter-House Cases, Mr. Justice Miller said: "Another privilege of a citizen of the United States is to demand the care and protection of the Federal government over his life, liberty, and property when on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of a foreign government. Of this there can be no doubt, nor that the right depends upon his character as a citizen of the United States."

Mr. Hall says in his work on Foreign Jurisdiction, etc., §§ 2, 5, the principle is that "the legal relations by which a person is encompassed in his country of birth and residence cannot be wholly put aside when he goes abroad for a time; many of the acts which he may do outside his native state have inevitable consequences within it. He may for many purposes be temporarily under the control of another sovereign than his own, and he may be bound to yield to a foreign government a large measure of obedience; but his own state possesses a right to his allegiance; he is still an integral part of the national community. A state, therefore, can enact laws *enjoin-[728 ing or forbidding acts, and defining legal relations, which apply to its subjects abroad in common with those within its dominions. It can declare under what conditions it will regard as valid acts done in foreign countries, which profess to have legal effect; it can visit others with penalties; it can estimate circumstances and facts as it chooses." On the other hand, the "duty of protection is correlative to the rights of a sovereign over his subjects; the maintenance of a bond between a state and its subjects while they are abroad implies that the former must watch over and protect them within the due limit of the rights of other states. . . . It enables governments to exact reparation for oppression from which their subjects have suffered, or for injuries done to them otherwise than by process of law; and it gives the means of guarding them against the effect of unreasonable laws, of laws totally out of harmony with the nature or degree of civilization by which a foreign power affects to be characterized, and finally of an administration of the laws bad beyond a certain point. When in these directions a state grossly fails in its duties; when it is either incapable of ruling, or rules with patent injustice, the right of protection emerges in the form of diplomatic remonstrance, and in extreme cases of ulterior measures. It provides a material sanction for rights; it does not offer a theoretic foundation. It does not act within a foreign territory with the consent of the sovereign; it acts against him contentiously from without."

The privileges or immunities which, by the 2d clause of the Amendment, the states are forbidden to abridge, are the privileges or immunities pertaining to citizenship of the United States, but that clause also places an inhibition on the states from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, and from denying "to any ries. The property of all such criminals shall be confiscated, and their wives and children distributed as slaves to the great officers of state. . . . The parents, grandparents, brothers and grandchildren of such criminals, whether habitually living with them under the same roof or not, shall be perpetually banished to the distance of 2,000 lee.

"All those who purposely conceal and connive at the perpetration of this crime shall be strangled. Those who inform against, and bring to justice, criminals of this description, shall be rewarded with the whole of their property.

"Those who are privy to the perpetration of this crime, and yet omit to give any notice or information thereof to the magistrate, shall be punished with 100 blows and banished perpetually to the distance of 3,000 lee.

"If the crime is contrived, but not executed, the principal shall be strangled, and all the accessories shall, each of them, be punished with 100 blows, and perpetual banishment to the distance of 3,000 lee. . . ." Staunton's Penal Code of China, 272, § 255.

person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," that is, of its own laws—the laws to which its own citizens are subjected.

The jurisdiction of the state is necessarily local, and the limitation relates to rights primarily secured by the states, and not by the United States. Jurisdiction as applied to the general government embraces international re-[729] lations; as *applied to the state, it refers simply to its power over persons and things within its particular limits.

These considerations lead to the conclusion that the rule in respect of citizenship of the United States prior to the 14th Amendment differed from the English common-law rule in vital particulars, and, among others, in that it did not recognize allegiance as indelible, and in that it did recognize an essential difference between birth during temporary, and birth during permanent, residence. If children born in the United States were deemed presumptively and generally citizens, this was not so when they were born of aliens whose residence was merely temporary, either in fact, or in point of law.

Did the 14th Amendment impose the original English common-law rule as a rigid rule on this country?

Did the Amendment operate to abridge the treaty-making power, or the power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization?

I insist that it cannot be maintained that this government is unable through the action of the President, concurred in by the Senate, to make a treaty with a foreign government providing that the subjects of that government, although allowed to enter the United States, shall not be made citizens thereof, and that their children shall not become such citizens by reason of being born therein.

A treaty couched in those precise terms would not be incompatible with the 14th Amendment, unless it be held that that Amendment has abridged the treaty-making power.

Nor would a naturalization law excepting persons of a certain race and their children be invalid, unless the Amendment has abridged the power of naturalization. This cannot apply to our colored fellow citizens, who never were aliens—were never beyond the jurisdiction of the United States.

"Born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," and "naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," mean born or naturalized under such circumstances as to be completely subject to that jurisdiction, that is, as completely as citi-[730] zens of the United States, *who are of course not subject to any foreign power, and can of right claim the exercise of the power of the United States on their behalf wherever they may be. When, then, children are born in the United States to the subjects of a foreign power, with which it is agreed by treaty that they shall not be naturalized thereby, and as to whom our own law forbids them to be naturalized, such children are not born so subject to the jurisdiction as to become citizens, and entitled on that ground to the interposition of our government, if they happen to be found in the country of their parents' origin and allegiance, or any other.

Turning to the treaty between the United States and China, concluded July 28, 1868, the ratifications of which were exchanged November 23, 1869, and the proclamation made February 5, 1870, we find that, by its 6th article, it was provided: "Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect of travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. And, reciprocally, Chinese subjects residing in the United States, shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization on the citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States."

It is true that in the 5th article, the inherent right of man to change his home or allegiance was recognized, as well as "the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other, for the purposes of curiosity, of traffic, or as permanent residents."

All this, however, had reference to an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes, and did not involve an admission of change of allegiance unless both countries assented, but the contrary according to the 6th article.

By the convention of March 17, 1894, it was agreed "that Chinese laborers or Chinese of any other class, either permanently *or tem-[731] porarily residing within the United States, shall have for the protection of their persons and property all rights that are given by the laws of the United States to citizens of the most favored nation, excepting the right to become naturalized citizens."

These treaties show that neither government desired such change nor assented thereto. Indeed, if the naturalization laws of the United States had provided for the naturalization of Chinese persons, China manifestly would not have been obliged to recognize that her subjects had changed their allegiance thereby. But our laws do not so provide, and, on the contrary, are in entire harmony with the treaties.

I think it follows that the children of Chinese born in this country do not, ipso facto, become citizens of the United States unless the 14th Amendment overrides both treaty and statute. Does it bear that construction; or, rather, is it not the proper construction that all persons born in the United States of parents permanently residing here and susceptible of becoming citizens, and not prevented therefrom by treaty or statute, are citizens, and not otherwise?

But the Chinese under their form of government, the treaties and statutes, cannot become citizens nor acquire a permanent home here, no matter what the length of their stay may be. Wharton, Confl. Laws, § 12.

In Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698, 717 [37: 905, 914], it was said in respect of the treaty of 1868: "After some years' experience under that treaty, the government of the United States was brought to the opinion that the presence within our territory of large numbers of Chinese laborers, of a distinct race and religion, remaining strangers in the land, residing apart by themselves, tenaciously adhering to the customs and usages of their own country, unfamiliar with our institutions, and apparently incapable of assimilating with our people, might endanger good order, and be injurious to the public interests; and therefore requested and obtained from China a modification of the treaty."

It is not to be admitted that the children of persons so situated become citizens by the acci-
*732] dent of birth. On the contrary, *I am of opinion that the President and Senate by treaty and the Congress by naturalization, have the power, notwithstanding the 14th Amendment, to prescribe that all persons of a particular race, or their children, cannot become citizens, and that it results that the consent to allow such persons to come into and reside within our geographical limits does not carry with it the imposition of citizenship upon children born to them while in this country under such consent, in spite of treaty and statute.

In other words, the 14th Amendment does not exclude from citizenship by birth children born in the United States of parents permanently located therein, and who might themselves become citizens; nor, on the other hand, does it arbitrarily make citizens of children born in the United States of parents who, according to the will of their native government and of this government, are and must remain aliens.

Tested by this rule, Wong Kim Ark never became and is not a citizen of the United States, and the order of the district court should be reversed.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Harlan concurs in this dissent.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1897.

[Authenticated copy of opinion record strictly followed, except as to such reference words and figures as are inclosed in brackets.]

1] NEW YORK INDIANS, Appts.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

Grant to Indian tribes—resolution of Senate—condition subsequent—how construed—repudiation of agreement — documents from the Departments — intention to abandon — when claim abandoned.

1. The grant to Indian tribes by the treaty of Buffalo creek, whereby the tribes ceded to the United States certain lands, and the United States agreed to set apart certain other lands as a permanent home for the Indians, to be held in fee simple by patent from the President, invested a present legal title in the Indians.

2. A resolution by the Senate changing the terms of the Indian treaty cannot be considered a part of it, when it was not published with the treaty or brought to the attention of the Indian tribes or approved by the President.

3. A treaty provision that tribes of Indians who do not agree to remove to land set apart for them within five years, or such other time as the President may appoint, shall forfeit all their interest, constitutes a condition subsequent on which a forfeiture may be declared, but which gives no power to the United States to re-enter by simple executive action for breach of the condition.

4. A condition relied upon to work a forfeiture of title is construed with great strictness.

5. The repudiation by Indian tribes of an agreement to remove to a reservation, after accepting a treaty which made such removal a condition subsequent, must be as formal, as broad, and as unequivocal as the acceptance, in order to justify a forfeiture.

6. Documents emanating from the executive and legislative departments of the government may be judicially noticed on appeal, though they were not incorporated in the findings of the court below.

7. A claim by Indians against the United States for land cannot be deemed abandoned when there has been no intention on the part of the Indians to abandon it or any indication on the part of Congress that it considers it abandoned.

8. To create an abandonment of a claim there must not only be an omission to prosecute, but an intent to forego.

Argued December 7, 8, 1896. Ordered for reargument January 11, 1897. Reargued March 2, 3, 1898. Decided April 11, 1898.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Claims dismissing a petition by the New York Indians who were parties to the treaty of Buffalo creek to enforce an alleged liability of the United States for the value of certain lands in Kansas set apart for such Indians and subsequently sold by the United States, and also for moneys agreed to be paid to the Indians upon their removal. Reversed, and case remanded, with instructions to enter a judgment for the net amount actually received by the United States for the Kansas lands, without interest, less certain deductions, and for other proceedings.

See same case below, 30 Ct. Cl. 413.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brown:

This was a petition by the Indians who were parties to the treaty of Buffalo creek, New York, on January 15, 1838 (7 Stat. at L. 550), to enforce an alleged liability of the United States for *the value of certain lands in Kansas, [2 set apart for these Indians, and subsequently sold by the United States, as well as for certain amounts of money agreed to be paid upon their removal.

These claims were referred, under the act of March 3, 1883 [22 Stat. at L. 485, chap. 116], known as the "Bowman Act," to the court of claims. That court reported its findings to the Senate, January 16, 1892, and thereupon, on January 28, 1893, Congress passed an act to authorize the court of claims to hear and determine these claims and to enter up judgment as if it had original jurisdiction of the case without regard to the statute of limitations. There was a further provision, that from any judgment rendered by that court, either party might appeal to the supreme court of the United States.

The petition, which was filed on February 10, 1893, set forth as the substance of the treaty that the claimants ceded and relinquished to the United States all their right, title, and interest in and to certain lands of the claimants at Green Bay, state of Wisconsin, and in consideration of such cession and relinquishment the United States, in and by said treaty, agreed and guaranteed as follows:

First. To set aside, as a permanent home for all of the claimants, a certain tract of country west of the Mississippi river, described by metes and bounds, and to include eighteen hundred and twenty-four thousand (1,824,000) acres of land, the same to be divided among the different tribes, nations, or bands of the claimants in severalty, according to the number of individuals in each tribe, as set forth in a certain schedule annexed to the said treaty, and designated as Schedule A, upon condition that such of the claimants as should not accept and agree to remove to the country set apart for them within five years, or such other time as the President might from time to time appoint, should forfeit to the United States all interest to the lands so set apart.

Secondly. The United States agreed to protect and defend the claimants in the peaceable possession and enjoyment of their new homes and to secure their right to establish their own government, subject to the legislation of Congress respecting trade and intercourse with the Indians.

3] *Thirdly The United States agreed that the lands secured to the claimants by the treaty should never be included in any state or territory of the Union.

Fourthly. The United States agreed to pay to the several tribes or nations of the claimants, hereinafter mentioned, on their removal west, the following sums respectively, namely: To the St. Regis tribe, five thousand dollars ($5,000); to the Seneca nation, the income annually of one hundred thousand ($100,000), (being part of the money due said nation for lands sold by them in New York, and which sum they authorized to be paid to the United States); to the Cayugas, twenty-five hundred dollars ($2,500) in cash, and the annual income of twenty-five hundred dollars ($2,500); to the Onondagas, two thousand dollars ($2,000) in cash, and the annual income of twenty-five hundred dollars ($2,500); to the Oneidas, six thousand dollars ($6,000) in cash, and to the Tuscaroras, three thousand dollars.

Fifthly. The United States agreed to appropriate the sum of four hundred thousand dollars ($400,000), to be applied from time to time by the President of the United States for the following purposes, namely: To aid the claimants in removing to their new homes and supporting themselves the first year after their removal; to encourage and assist them in being taught to cultivate their lands; to aid them in erecting mills and other necessary houses; to aid them in purchasing domestic animals and farming utensils, and in acquiring a knowledge of the mechanic arts.

By a supplemental article the St. Regis Indians were allowed to remove to the said country if they so desired, but were exempted from obligation so to do.

The treaty of Buffalo creek, having been duly assented to by all the parties thereto, was afterwards, on, to wit, the 4th day of April, A. D. 1840, duly proclaimed; and certain disputes thereunder having arisen, it was afterwards modified in some particulars not having reference to the matter of this claim, and as so modified was again proclaimed on, to wit, the 26th day of August, 1842.

The petition further alleged that at the time of the making *of the treaty of Buffalo creek [4 aforesaid, and for many years prior thereto, the claimants owned and occupied valuable tracts of land in the state of New York, and had improved and cultivated the same and resided thereon, and from the products thereof chiefly sustained themselves.

That the President of the United States never prescribed any time for the removal of the claimants, or any of them, to the lands, or any of them, set apart by the treaty of Buffalo creek, and no provision of any kind was ever made for the actual removal of more than about two hundred and sixty individuals of the claimant tribes, as contemplated by the said treaty; and of this number only thirty-two ever received patents or certificates of allotment of any of the lands mentioned in the first article of the said treaty, and the land allotted to those thirty-two was at the rate of 320 acres each, or 10,240 acres in all.

That after the conclusion of the said treaty of Buffalo creek the United States surveyed and made part of the public domain the lands of Green bay, ceded by the claimants, and sold or otherwise disposed of and conveyed the same and received the consideration therefor.

That the lands west of the Mississippi river, secured to the claimants of the said treaty of Buffalo creek, were set apart by the United States and designated upon the land maps thereof as the New York Indian reservation, and so remained until in or about the year A. D. 1860, at which time the United States surveyed and made part of the public domain the lands aforesaid, and the same were sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States, which received the entire consideration therefor; and the said lands thereafter were, and now are, included within the territorial limits of the state of Kansas. The said lands at the time the same were so appropriated by the United States were of great value, to wit, of the value of one dollar and twenty-five cents ($1.25) per acre and upwards.

That the action of the United States in appropriating the said lands as aforesaid was in pursuance of the proclamation of the President of dates December 3 and 17, 1860, and grew out *of an order of the Secretary of the Interior of [5 the 21st day of March, A. D. 1859; and between the said last-mentioned date and proclamation of the said lands aforesaid the claimants employed counsel to protect and prosecute their claims in the premises, and asserted that the United States had seized upon the said lands contrary to the obligations of the said treaty, and would not permit the said claimants to occupy the same or make any disposition thereof, and the claimants have steadily since asserted said claim in the premises.

That the sum of $400,000, agreed by the treaty of Buffalo creek to be appropriated by the United States for the purposes aforesaid, only the sum of $20,477 50, was ever so appropriated, except as hereinafter stated, and of this sum only $9,464.08 was actually expended.

The petition further alleged that the Tonawanda band had been paid $256,000 for their interest in the land; that settlement had also been had with the Senecas, and that a special act had been passed authorizing the court of claims to find the facts and enter up judgment, without interest, and that the statute of limitations should not be pleaded as a bar to any recovery.

The petition concluded with a demand for a judgment for the value of the lands and for the amounts that were to be paid in cash.

The court of claims found the facts stated in [6] the margin,† together *with others which are not deemed material to the consideration of the case, and also found as a conclusion of law from these facts that the petition should be dismissed, whereupon the claimants appealed to this court.

Messrs. Joseph H. Choate, Henry E. Davis, George Barker, James B. Jenkins, Jonas H. McGowan, and Guion Miller for appellants, on first argument.

Messrs. Charles C. Binney and Holmes Conrad, Solicitor General, for appellee, on first argument.

Messrs. Joseph H. Choate, George Barker, James B. Jenkins, Jonas H. McGowan, Henry E. Davis, and Guion Miller for appellants, on reargument.

Messrs. Charles C. Binney and L. A. Pradt, Assistant Attorney General, for appellee, on reargument.

*Mr. Justice Brown delivered the opinion of the court: [8

*The facts in this case are somewhat complicated, but the real question involved is whether the cessions of the Kansas lands to these Indians ever took complete effect, or whether the failure, or rather the refusal, of the Indians to remove to the *lands set apart [9 [10

†Findings of Fact.

1. In 1780 the Six Nations of "New York Indians" consisted of the following nations or tribes: Senecas Cayugas, Onondagas, Oneidas, Tuscaroras, and Mohawks. The Mohawks soon after withdrew to Canada, relinquishing to New York all claim to lands in that state.

The court decides that the Indians described in the jurisdictional act sending this case to this court as, "the New York Indians, being those Indians who were parties to the treaty of Buffalo creek, New York, on the 15th of January, 1838," were the following: Senecas, Onondagas, Onondagas residing on the Seneca reservation, Onondagas at Onondaga, Cayugas, Cayugas residing on the Seneca reservation, Cayuga Indians residing in the state of New York, Tuscaroras, Tuscaroras residing in the state of New York, Oneidas residing in New York, at Green Bay (Wisconsin), and in the Seneca reservation, Oneidas, St. Regis, St. Regis in New York, the American party of the St. Regis residing in the state of New York, Stockbridges, Munsees, Brothertowns.

2. Some of the New York Indians between 1810 and 1816 petitioned the President of the United States for leave to purchase reservations of their western l threm with the privilege of removing to and occupying the same without changing their existing relations and treaties with the government or their right to the annuities promised in those treaties. (February 12, 1816, the Secretary of War, by authority of the President, gave his permission.) In 1820 and 1821 defendant aided some ten Indians, representing plaintiffs, in exploring certain parts of Wisconsin with a view of making arrangements with the Indians residing there for a portion of their country to be inhabited by such of the Six Nations as might choose to emigrate thither. Among the petitioners for leave to purchase reservations were the Onondagas, Senecas, Cayugas, and Oneida nations of New York Indians.

August 18, 1821, the Menominees and Winnebago nations, in consideration of $2,000, chiefly in goods, ceded, released, and quitclaimed all their right, title, and claim in certain lands near Green bay, Wisconsin, amounting to about 500,000 acres, to the Six Nations and the St. Regis, Stockbridge, and Munsee tribes, reserving the right of fishing and the right to occupy "a necessary proportion of the lands for the purposes of hunting, provided that in such use and occupation no waste or depredation should be committed on lands under improvement."

The President's approval of the arrangement found in the treaty of August 18, 1821, was signified February 19, 1822, as follows:

"The within arrangement, entered into between the Six Nations, the St. Regis, Stockbridge, and Munsee nations, of the one part, and the Menominees and Winnebagoes of the other, is approved with the express understanding that the lands thereby conveyed to the Six Nations, the St. Regis, Stockbridge, and Munsee nations are to be held by them in the same manner as they were previously held by the Menominees and Winnebagoes.

"February 19, 1822. James Monroe."

The $2,000 above mentioned was thus paid: In goods, $900 from the Stockbridges, $400 from the Oncidas, $200 from the Tuscaroras, in cash, $500. The Senecas subsequently denied that they had any title to any lands in Wisconsin. It does not appear that the Cayugas or Onondagas claimed any interest in the lands prior to 1860.

3. Permission to secure an extension of the cession in the preceding finding recited was given by the Secretary of War, and thereafter on September 23, 1822, the Menominees, in consideration of $3,000 in goods, made a similar cession of another tract containing at least 5,000,000 acres, rather undefined (adjoining the above), to the Stockbridge, Oneida, Tuscarora, St. Regis, and Munsee nations, the releases promising, however, that the releasors should "have the free permission and privilege of occupying and residing upon the lands" in common with the former.

The President's approval was given March 13, 1823, as follows:

"The foregoing instrument is approved, so far as it conveys to the Stockbridge, Oneida, Tuscarora, St. Regis, and Munsee tribes or nations of Indians that portion of the country therein described which lies between Sturgeon bay, Green bay, Fox river; that part of the former purchase made by said tribes or nations of Indians of the Menominee and Winnebago Indians on the 8th of August, 1821, which lies south of Fox river and a line drawn from the southwestern extremity of said purchase to the head of Sturgeon bay, and no farther, that quantity being deemed sufficient for the use of the first before-mentioned tribes and nations of Indians. It is to be understood, however, that the lands, to the cession of which to the tribes or nations aforesaid the government has assented, are to be held by them in the same manner as they were held by the Menominees previous to concluding and signing the aforegoing instrument, and that the title which they have acquired is not to interfere in any manner whatever with the lands previously acquired or occupied by the government of the United States or its citizens."

October 27, 1823, the Secretary of War officially notified the releasees that the President distinctly wished them to understand that by this partial sanction he did not mean to interfere with, nor for them within five years, worked ipso facto, under the third article of the treaty, a forfeiture of their interest.

1. So far as concerns the legal aspects of the 11]case, it is *unnecessary to inquire whether the government received from the Indians an adequate consideration for its reservation to them of the lands in Kansas. The findings upon this point are in substance that some of the New 12] York Indians, between 1810 *and 1816, with the permission of the President and with some actual aid from the government in making explorations, bought of the Menominee and Winnebago nations all their right, title, and claim to about 500,000 acres of land in Wiscon- 13] sin *in consideration of $2,000, chiefly in goods. This purchase was made for the benefit of the Six Nations and the St. Regis, Stockbridge, and Munsee tribes.

Under a similar permission given by the Secretary of War, *and on September 23, 1822,[14 the Menominees, in consideration of $3,000 in goods, made a similar cession of another tract, containing about 5,000,000 acres, to the Stockbridge, Oneida, Tuscarora, St. Regis, and Munsee nations. Both of these cessions were approved by the President. Thereafter, some of the New York Indians removed to and took possession of the lands in Wisconsin.

It seems, however, that the Menominees were dissatisfied with and repudiated the arrangement, and thereupon entered into two treaties with the United States, by the first of which (August 11, 1827, 7 Stat. at L. 303), they agreed to refer the matter to the President, and by the second of which (February 8, 1831, 7 Stat. at L. 342), protesting that they were under no obligations to recognize any in any manner invalidate, their title to all the lands which they had thereby acquired, including those not confirmed by the government, but, on the contrary, he considered their title to every part of the country conveyed to them by the releasors as equally valid as against them; and that what they had done was with the full assent of the government.

Of the consideration above mentioned, $1,000 were paid by the Stockbridges and Munsees, while $1,000 were to be paid by the Oneidas, Tuscaroras, and St. Regis in one year from September 23, 1822, and $1,000 in two years from that date. Of the two latter amounts $1,000 appears to have been paid by the United States out of the funds of the St. Regis about 1825, while $950 were paid by the Brothertown tribe September 18, 1824. In consideration of which the releasees, by an agreement with the Brothertowns, under date of January 8, 1825, ceded to them a small separate tract by metes and bounds, and, after reserving to themselves, for each tribe of the releasees, a similar tract from out the country purchased from the releasors, granted to the Brothertowns an equal, undivided part of all the remaining portion of said purchase. It does not appear whether the Oneidas and Tuscaroras paid any part of the above consideration.

4. The grants set forth in findings 2 and 3 include the lands subsequently ceded by the Menominees to the United States by the treaties of August 11, 1827, and February 8, 1831.

5. Thereafter some New York Indians, belonging to the Onelda, St. Regis, Stockbridge, Munsee, and Brothertown tribes, removed to and took possession of the lands in Wisconsin.

Later, and after 1832, another small portion of the New York Indians removed to the Wisconsin or Green bay lands.

March 14, 1840, the Senecas denied ownership of Wisconsin lands, stating that they determined to have no other home than that of their fathers where they then resided, and, in May and September following, in petitions to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, their council denied that they were parties to the treaty.

6. It does not appear that application was made by the tribes or bands, or any of them, to the government, for removal to the Kansas lands provided for in the Buffalo creek treaty, except as hereafter appears in these findings.

It does not appear that any substantial number of Indians wished to go to Kansas other than those who made up the Hogeboom party (infra).

7. In the year 1838, at the time of the negotiation of the treaty of Buffalo creek, the Senecas, the Onondagas, the Oneidas, the Cayugas, the Tuscaroras, and the St. Regis each possessed a reservation of land in the state of New York on which members of the tribes resided, and the right of occupancy of which was secured to them by treaty stipulations. The Cayuga Indians had no separate reservation of their own in the state of New York, but made their home with and resided upon the reservation and lands possessed by the Seneca nation; this they did with the consent of the Senecas, and a portion of the Onondagas did the same.

(The eighth finding is immaterial.)

9. For many years prior to the treaty of Buffalo creek (of 1838) these nations or tribes of Indians had improved and cultivated their lands, on which they resided and from the products of which they chiefly sustained themselves.

The treaty of Buffalo creek, as printed in the seventh volume of the Statutes at Large, contains a misprint on the third line of page 556. The word "Oneidas" is in the origiual treaty "Onondagas," the whole line reading, "Onondagas residing on the Seneca reservation."

10. Extract from Executive Journal of June 11, 1838.

The Senate resumed as in committee of the whole the consideration of the treaty with the New York Indians, and the articles supplemental thereto.

On motion of Mr. Wright, and by unanimous consent, the question was taken on agreeing to the amendments reported from the committee on Indian affairs, and determined in the affirmative, yeas 33.

. . . . . .

No further amendments having been made, the treaty was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were unanimously concurred in.

Mr. White then submitted the following resolution of ratification, embracing the amendments as reported from the committee and adopted by the Senate:

Resolved (two thirds of the senators present concurring), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty made and concluded at Buffalo creek, in the state of New York, the 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1838, by Ransom H. Gillet, a commissioner on the part of the United States, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the several tribes of the New York Indians, assembled in council, with the following amendments.

(Here follows a series of amendments striking out original articles 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, and 19, striking out particular words and clauses from other articles, inserting new article 15, and concluding as follows):

Resolved, further (two thirds of the senators present concurring), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the supplemental article to the treaty concluded at Buffalo creek, in the state of New York, January 15, 1838, which was made at the council house of St. Regis on the 13th day of February, 1838: Provided, The chiefs and headmen of St. Regis Indians, residing in New York, will in general council accept of and adopt the aforesaid treaty, as modified by the preceding resolution of ratification.

Provided always, and be it further resolved (two thirds of the Senate present concurring), That the treaty shall have no force or effect whatever, as it relates to any of said tribes, nations, or bands of New York Indians, nor shall it be understood that the Senate have assented to any of the contracts connected with it until the same, with the amendments herein proposed, is submitted and fully and fairly explained by a commissioner of the United States to each of said tribes or bands, separately assembled in council, and they have given their free and voluntary assent thereto; and if one or more of said tribes or bands, when consulted as aforesaid, shall freely assent to said treaty as amended, and to their contract connected therewith, it shall be claim of the New York Indians to any portion of their country. They agreed to set apart as a home for the several tribes of the New York Indians about 500,000 acres of land, for which the United States agreed to pay them $20,000, to be applied to their use. By these treaties a large quantity of other lands was also ceded by the Menominees directly to the United States, three townships of which were set aside for the Stockbridges, Munsees, and Brothertowns.

It sufficiently appears from this statement that the Indians were possessed of some sort of title or interest in a large quantity of lands in Wisconsin, which the government was desirous of acquiring, and for which it was willing to make a large cession in the then unnamed, almost unknown, and wholly unsettled territory, which was subsequently admitted to the Union as the state of Kansas. The consideration was evidently treated as a valuable one, and whether adequate or not would have been sufficient to support a deed between private *parties. Probably, however, the [15 main inducement to the cession was the agreement of the Indians to remove beyond the Mississippi, and whether the agreement of the government to set apart for them a permanent home in this territory was supported by any other consideration which would be deemed a valuable one between private parties, is wholly immaterial so far as the treaty obligations of the government are concerned.

2. The first and one of the most important questions in the case turns upon the nature of the title acquired by the Indians under the treaty. Was it a grant in præsenti, or merely an agreement to set apart for the Indians at some future time the lands in question, pro-binding and obligatory upon those so assenting, although other or others of said bands or tribes may not give their assent, and thereby cease to be parties thereto: Provided, further, That if any portion or part of said Indians do not emigrate the President shall retain a proper portion of said sum of four hundred thousand dollars, and shall also deduct from the quantity of land allowed west of the Mississippi such number of acres as will leave to each emigrant three hundred and twenty acres only.

The Senate proceeded by unanimous consent to the consideration of said resolution.

Proclamation of the Treaty of Buffalo Creek.

Martin Van Buren, President of the United States of America, to all and singular to whom these presents shall come, Greeting:

Whereas a treaty was made and concluded at Buffalo, in the state of New York, on the fifteenth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, by Ransom H. Gillet, a commissioner on the part of the United States, and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the several tribes of the New York Indians, assembled in council;

And whereas the Senate did, by a resolution of the eleventh of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, advise and consent to the ratification of said treaty with certain amendments, which treaty so amended is word for word as follows, to wit. . . .

And whereas the Senate did, on the 25th of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty, resolve "that in the opinion of the Senate the treaty between the United States and the Six Nations of New York Indians, together with the amendments proposed by the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838, have been satisfactorily acceded to and approved of by said tribes, the Seneca tribe included, and that in the opinion of the Senate the President is authorized to proclaim the treaty as in full force and operation:"

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Martin Van Buren, President of the United States of America, do, in pursuance of the resolutions of the Senate of the eleventh of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, and twenty-fifth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty, accept, ratify, and confirm said treaty, and every article and clause thereof.

In testimony whereof I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, having signed the same with my hand.

Done at this city of Washington this fourth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and forty, and of the Independence of the United States the sixty-third.

M. Van Buren.

By the President:
[Seal.] John Forsyth,
Secretary of State.

11. The President of the United States never prescribed any time for the removal of the claimants or any of them to the lands or any of them set apart by the treaty of Buffalo creek further than is shown in these findings.

Many of the Indians have protested against any removal. The Onondagas have officially declared that they would not remove, and treaties subsequent to that of 1838 appear in the statutes in relation to this subject-matter. The Tuscaroras still occupy their reservation in New York.

After the amended treaty had been assented to, the Senecas, the Cayugas, and the Onondagas residing with them, and the Tuscaroras continued to protest against the treaty, the Senecas asserting that their declaration of assent was invalid, and that they would never emigrate but on compulsion and requesting (as did also some Onondaga chiefs) that no appropriation be made to carry the treaty into effect. These protests were continued even after the treaty was ratified and until the treaty of May 20, 1842, was made. More than five years from the ratification of the treaty of Buffalo creek the Tuscarora chiefs declared that the tribe would not part with its reservation nor remove from it, whatever a few individuals might do. The Indian protests against the treaty were based upon the following allegations: (a) That the treaty had been brought about by corrupt means operating upon the Indians of influence in their tribes, and put in motion by an agent of the preemption owners; (b) that a considerable majority of the Indians wished to remain in New York.

After the treaty of May 20, 1842, was ratified, the lands and improvements on the Buffalo creek reservation in New York were appraised, and the Indians thereon gradually withdrew to the Cattaraugus and Alleghany reservations in New York.

12. Prior to November 24, 1845, some of the New York Indians had applied to the Indian office for the proper steps to be taken for their emigration. It was not deemed expedient to enter into any arrangements for this purpose until the department believed that a sufficient number to justify the expenditure incident to the appointment of an agent was prepared to remove.

No provision was made for the actual removal of more than about 260 individuals of the claimant tribes as contemplated by the treaty of Buffalo creek and as shown below. Of this number only 32 ever received patents or certificates of allotment of the lands mentioned in the first article of the treaty and the amount allotted to those 32 was at the rate of 320 acres each, or 10,240 acres in all.

In 1845 Abram Hogeboom represented to the government of the United States that a number of the New York Indians, parties to the treaty of 1838, desired to remove to the Kansas lands and upon such representation, and in conformity with such desire, said Hogeboom was appointed special agent of the government to remove the said Indians to Kansas.

The sum of $9,464.08 of an amount appropriated by Congress was expended in the removal of a party of New York Indians under Hogeboom's direction in 1846.

From Hogeboom's muster-roll, in the Indian office, it appears that 271 were mustered for emigration. The roll shows that of this number 73 did not leave New York with the party; 191 only arrived in Kansas, June 15, 1846; 17 other Indians vided that they would remove thither within the five years fixed by the third article of the treaty?

By the first article "the several tribes of New York Indians . . . hereby cede and relinquish to the United States all their right, title, and interest to the lands secured to them at Green bay;" and by the second article "in consideration of the above cession and relinquishment, . . . the United States agree to set apart" a tract of country, containing 1,824,000 acres of land, described by metes and bounds, "as a permanent home for all the New York Indians, . . . to have and to hold the same in fee simple to the said tribes or nations of Indians, by patent from the President of the United States, issued in conformity with the provisions of the third section" of the act of May 28, 1830, "with full power and authority in the said Indians to divide said lands among the different tribes, nations, or bands in severalty, with the right to sell and convey to and from each other." By the third article "such of the tribes of the New York Indians as do not accept and agree to remove to the country set apart for their new homes within five years . . . shall forfeit all interest in the lands so set apart to the United States."

The proper construction to be placed upon similar clauses was the subject of consideration by this court in several cases before the rail road land grant cases, and the conclusion reached that, if from all the language of the statute or treaty, *it was apparent that [16 Congress intended to convey an immediate interest, it will be construed as a grant in præsenti.

In the case of Rutherford v. Greene's Heirs, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 196 [4: 218] the state of North Carolina passed an act in 1782 "for the relief of the officers and soldiers in the continental line," and in the 5th section enacted that 25,000 acres of land "shall be allotted for, and given to, Major General Nathaniel Greene, his heirs or assigns, within the bounds of the lands reserved for the use of the army, to be laid off by the aforesaid commissioners," and a further section (7th) provided that the commissioners should "grant certificates to such persons as shall appear to them to have a right to the same." It was contended on the part of the appellant that these words gave nothing; that they were in the future, and not in the present tense, and indicated an intention to give in future, but created no present obligation on the state nor present interest in General Greene. But it was held that, as the act was to be performed in future, the words directing it were necessarily in the future tense, and that, although the land was undefined, the survey afterwards made in pursuance of the act gave arrived subsequently; 82 died and 94 returned to New York.

It does not appear that any of the thirty-two Indians to whom allotments were made settled permanently in Kansas.

13. A council of the Senecas, the Cayugas and Onondagas living with them, and the Tuscaroras was called by the Indian commissioner, to be held at Cattaraugus, June 2, 1846, to learn the final wishes of the Indians as to emigration. The commissioner who was sent on the part of the United States reported that the meeting was well attended, but that the chiefs were unanimous in the opinion that scarcely any Indians who wished to emigrate remained. The commissioner also reported that he held an enrolment for two full days, but that only seven persons requested to be enrolled for emigration, and these vouched for five more as wishing to go.

14. The United States, after the conclusion of the treaty of Buffalo creek, surveyed and made part of the public domain the lands of Green bay ceded by the claimants, and sold or otherwise disposed of and conveyed the same and received the consideration therefor except as in these findings shown to the contrary. The reservation to "the first Christian and Orchard parties of Oneida Indians," which was set aside for them by defendants at Green bay, Wisconsin, contained 65,540 acres, all of which has been allotted in severalty and reserved for school purposes except 84.08 acres.

The Stockbridge Indians acquired a reservation in Wisconsin of 11,803 acres, some of which has been allotted in severalty. 9 Stat. at L. 955; 11 Stat. at L. 663, 679; 16 Stat. at L. 404. The United States never acquired any lands in the state of New York from the Indians of that state. The lands ceded in that state by the Indians thereof were ceded for consideration to the state or to the Ogden Land Company, so called. There may have been some small cessions to individuals, but there were none to the United States.

15. Upon the ratification of the Oneida treaty of February 3, 1838, the present Oneida reservation in Wisconsin was surveyed, containing about 65,000 acres. After the ratification of the treaty of Buffalo creek the United States surveyed, made part of the public domain, and sold or otherwise disposed of, the tract at Green bay, the Indian title to which had been ceded by that treaty, except the said Oneida reservation. This was treated as if it had been the reservation excepted from the cession in article 1 of that treaty, which latter reservation was never surveyed, and the bounds of which as given in the said article are not the same as those of the former reservation, although the two reservations cover for the most part the same ground and are of about the same area.

The lands west of the Mississippi secured to the claimants by the treaty of Buffalo creek have been since that treaty surveyed and made a part of the public domain and sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States, which received the consideration therefor; and the said lands were thereafter and now are included within the territorial limits of the state of Kansas. The price realized by the United States for such of said lands as were sold was at the rate of $1.34 per acre, while the cost of surveying, etc., the same was at the rate of about 12 cents per acre, making the net price realized by the United States about $1.22 per acre.

16. By treaty with the Tonawanda band of the Senecas, numbering 650 individuals, the United States, November 5, 1857, in consideration of certain releases of claims under the treaties of 1838 and 1842, agreed to pay and invest, and did pay and invest, for said band the sum of $256,000.

The sum of $256,000 was equivalent to $1 per acre for the lands in Kansas to which the Tonawandas would have been entitled had they all emigrated under the treaty of Buffalo creek, and also to a part of the sum of $400,000 proportioned to their numbers as compared with the whole number of New York Indians, according to the schedule in the treaty. A portion of the fund, all of which was paid and invested as agreed, was applied to the purchase in fee of 7,549.73 acres of the Tonawanda reservation in New York for the tribe's benefit, and the Tonawandas still reside thereon.

17. After March 21, 1859, an order of the Secretary of the Interior was made which directed that the tract of land in Kansas territory known as the New York Indian reserve be surveyed, with a view of allotting a half section each to such of the New York Indians as had removed there under treaty provisions, after which the residue was to become public domain. Thirty-two New York Indians were found to be resident on the land, and allotments were made to them. After this and before the proclamation of the President of said lands as part of the public domain (December 3 and 17, 1860), some of the New York Indians employed counsel to protect and prosecute their claims in the premises, asserting, in the powers of attorney, that the United States had seized upon the said lands, contrary to the obligations of said treaty, and would not permit the said Indians to occupy the same or make any disposition thereof. The said Indians have since asserted their said claims.

(The remaining findings are deemed to be immaterial.)

precision to the title and attached it to the land surveyed.

In reply to the argument that to make this an operative gift the words "are hereby given" should have been used, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall observed: "Were it even true that these words would make the gift more explicit, which is not admitted, it surely cannot be necessary now to say that the validity of a legislative act depends, in no degree, on its containing the technical terms usual in a conveyance. Nothing can be more apparent than the intention of the legislature to order their commissioners to make the allotment, and to give the land, when allotted, to General Greene."

This case was followed in United States v. Brooks, 51 U. S. 10 How. 442 [13: 489], in which a treaty with the Caddo Indians provided that certain persons "shall have their right to the said four leagues of land reserved for them, and their heirs and assigns, forever. The said lands to be taken out of the lands ceded to the United States by the said Caddo nation of Indians, as expressed in the treaty to which these articles [17] are supplementary. *And the said four leagues of land shall be laid off," etc. It was held that these words gave to the reservees a fee simple to all rights which the Caddos had in those lands, as fully as any patent from the government could make one.

Fremont v. United States, 58 U. S. 17 How. 542 [15: 241], was a case of a Mexican grant of a tract of land known as "Las Mariposas," within certain undefined boundaries. The grant was of 10 square leagues, subject to certain conditions, and was to be made definite by a future survey. The grant purported to convey a present and immediate interest, in consideration of previous public services, and it was decided to be in præsenti upon the authority of Rutherford v. Greene's Heirs, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 196 [4: 218],—that the conditions were conditions subsequent, but that noncompliance with them did not amount to a forfeiture of the grant. Two members of the court dissented, being of opinion that the case was controlled by those of United States v. Boisdoré, 52 U. S 11 How. 63. 96 [13: 605, 619]; Glenn v. United States, 54 U. S. 13 How. 250, 259 [14: 133, 136], and Vilemont v. United States, 54 U. S. 13 How. 261 [14: 138].

In the cases arising under the railroad land grants, of which Schulenberg v. Harriman, 88 U. S. 21 Wall 44 [22: 551], is a leading one, the language of the granting clause was in the present tense, "there be, and hereby is, granted," etc.; and it has always been held that these were grants in præsenti, although the lands could not be identified until the map of the definite location of the road was filed, when the title, which was previously imperfect, acquired precision and became attached to the land. The doctrine of this case has been affirmed so many times that the question is no longer open to argument here. Lessieur v. Price, 53 U. S. 12 How. 59 [13: 893]; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 733 [23: 634]; Missouri, Kansas, & Texas R. R. Co. v. Kansas Pacific R. R. Co. 97 U. S. 491 [24: 1095]; Denver & R. G. Railway Company v. Alling, 99 U. S. 463, 475 [25: 438, 444]; St. Paul & Pacific Railroad v. Northern Pacific Railroad, 139 U. S. 1 [35: 77]; Deseret Salt Company v. Tarpey, 142 U. S. 241 [35: 999].

The same doctrine has also been applied to grants of swamp and overflowed lands by the acts of September 28, 1850, and June 10, 1852. Hannibal & St. J. Railroad Company v. Smith, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 95 [19: 599]; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488 [30: 1039].

*One or two cases, which apparently [18 hold a contrary doctrine, are readily reconcilable. That of Heydenfelt v. Daney Gold & Silver Mining Co. 93 U. S. 634 [23: 995], arose under the school land grant contained in the act of March 21, 1864, enabling the people of Nevada to form a state government. 13 Stat. at L. 30, chap. 36. The 7th section of the act provided "that sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township . . . shall be, and are hereby, granted, to said state." These words were held, under the peculiar language of the act, not to constitute a grant in præsenti, but an inchoate and incomplete grant until the premises were surveyed by the United States, and the survey properly approved. "We do no seek," said the court, "to depart from this sound rule [in Schulenberg v. Harriman]; but in this instance, words of qualification restrict the operation of those of present grant. . . . A grant, operating at once, and attaching prior to the surveys by the United States, would deprive Congress of the power of disposing of any part of the lands in Nevada, until they were segregated from those granted. . . . Until the status of the lands was fixed by a survey, and they were capable of identification, Congress reserved absolute power over them."

In Hall v. Russell, 101 U. S. 503 [25: 829], the language of the grant was "that there shall be, and hereby is, granted to every white settler or occupant of the public lands," and it was held that, as the land was not identified and the grantee was not named, there could not be a present grant. "There cannot be a grant unless there is a grantee, and consequently there cannot be a present grant unless there is a present grantee. If, then, the law making the grant indicates a future grantee, and not a present one, the grant will take effect in the future, and not presently. In all the cases in which we have given these words the effect of an immediate and present transfer, it will be found that the law has designated a grantee qualified to take, according to the terms of the law, and actually in existence at the time."

In the case of Rice v. Minnesota & N. W. Railroad Co. 66 U. S. 1 Black, 358 [17: 147], the granting clause of the act was in the present tense, but there was a further clause expressly declaring that no title should vest nor *any patent issue till certain portions of the [19 road had been completed.

From this summary of cases it is evident that the language of the granting clause is not conclusive, but the intent of Congress must be gathered from the whole scope of the instrument, and the facts to which it was intended to apply. Applying the principle of the cases above cited to the one under consideration, we are of the opinion that the grant in question was intended to invest a present legal title in the Indians for the following reasons:

First. There is no doubt that the cession by the Indians of their interest in the Wisconsin lands, in the first article of the treaty, was an absolute, unconditional, and immediate grant, and it is improbable that the Indians would have consented, or that the United States would desire, that they should accept from the government a mere promise to set apart for them in the future the tract in Kansas. If we are to adopt such a construction it would follow that the title of the Indians, not only to the tract in Kansas, but to the lands in Wisconsin, was made dependent upon their removal to their new home. While it might be reasonably contended that their failure to remove should result in a cancelation of the treaty and a restoration to them of their rights in the Wisconsin lands, that construction is precluded by the language of the first article, which contains a present and irrevocable grant of the Wisconsin lands and puts it beyond their power to revoke the bargain. The object of the treaty was evidently to effect an exchange of lands in pursuanee of the act of May 28, 1830 (4 Stat. at L. 411, chap. 148) the 3d section of which provides "that in the making of any such exchange or exchanges, it shall and may be lawful for the President solemnly to assure the tribe or nation with which the exchange is made that the United States will forever secure and guarantee to them, and their heirs and successors, the country so exchanged with them; and, if they prefer it, that the United States will cause a patent or grant to be made and executed to them for the same; Provided always, That such lands shall revert to the United States, if the Indians become extinct or abandon the same."

20] *Second. The lands covered by the treaty were identified, described by metes and bounds, and an appropriation was made to aid in the immediate removal of the Indians to their new home. There was no uncertainty as to the lands granted, or as to the identity of the grantees, which, in the case of Heydenfelt v. Daney Gold & S. Min. Co. 93 U. S. 634 [23: 995], was held to turn it into a grant in futuro.

Third. While the granting clause is in the future tense, an agreement to set apart, the habendum clause is in the present tense: "To have and to hold the same in fee simple to the said tribes or nations of Indians, by patent from the President of the United States, issued in conformity with the provisions of the third section of the act entitled 'An Act to Provide for an Exchange of Lands with the Indians Residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their Removal West of the Mississippi,' approved on the 28th day of May, 1830, with full power and authority in the said Indians to divide said land among the different tribes, nations, or bands in severalty, with the right to sell and convey to and from each other." The object of the habendum clause is said to be "to set down again the name of the grantee, the estate that is to be made and limited, or the time that the grantee shall have in the thing granted or demised, and to what use." Sheppard's Touchstone, 75. It may explain, enlarge, or qualify, but cannot contradict or defeat, the estate granted by the premises, and where the grant is uncertain or indefinite concerning the estate intended to be vested in the grantee, the habendum performs the office of defining, qualifying, or controling it. Jones, Real Prop. § 563; Devlin, Deeds, § 215.

In this case if the habendum clause were alone considered, there could be no doubt whatever that the Indians would take a present title to a fee simple. There is certainly no conflict between the granting and habendum clauses. Admitting that the former, if standing alone, would engender a doubt as to when the grant should take effect, the habendum clause removes that doubt, and imports a present surrender of a defined tract. The addition of the words "by a patent from the President of the United States" is immaterial, since it refers to *and is intended to be construed[21 in connection with the 3d section of the act of May 28, 1830, in which the issue of a patent is merely spoken of as an optional or preferential method of acquiring full title to the land.

Fourth. By article 10 a special provision was made for the Senecas by which the easterly part of the tract was set apart for them, and a deed made by them of their New York lands to Ogden and Fellows was recognized and approved of by the government, and the consideration invested for their use. And by article 14 another special tract of the lands granted was set off for the Tuscaroras, who conveyed to the United States 5,000 acres of land in New York to be held in trust for them, and another deed to Ogden and Fellows of lands in New York was assented to and sanctioned by the government.

These proceedings, by which these tribes devested themselves of their title to lands in New York, indicate an intention on the part, both of the government and the Indians, that they should take immediate possession of the tracts set apart for them in Kansas.

3. There is, however, another consideration which must not be overlooked in this connection, and which raises the only difficult point in the interpretation of the treaty. It is found by the court below (finding 10) that, when the treaty was laid before the Senate for ratification, June 11, 1838, the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, ninth, and nineteenth of the original articles were stricken out, several others were amended by eliminating particular clauses, a new article was added as article 15, and the ratification made subject to the following condition:

"Provided always, and be it further resolved (two thirds of the Senate present concurring), That the treaty shall have no force or effect whatever, as it relates to any of said tribes, nations, or bands of New York Indians, nor shall it be understood that the Senate have assented to any of the contracts connected with it until the same, with the amendments herein proposed, is submitted and fully and fairly explained by a commissioner of the United States to each of said tribes or bands, separately assembled in council, and they have given *their[22 free and voluntary assent thereto; and if one or more of said tribes or bands, when consulted as aforesaid, shall freely assent to said treaty as amended, and to their contract connected therewith, it shall be binding and obligatory upon those so assenting, although other or others of said bands or tribes may not give their assent and thereby cease to be parties thereto: Provided, further, That if any portion or part of said Indians do not emigrate the President shall retain a proper proportion of said sum of four hundred thousand dollars, and shall also deduct from the quantity of land allowed west of the Mississippi such number of acres as will leave to each emigrant three hundred and twenty acres only."

Now, if the above proviso (that if any portion or part of said Indians do not emigrate, the President shall . . . deduct from the quantity of land allowed west of the Mississippi such numbers of acres as will leave to each emigrant 320 acres only) be considered a part of the treaty and, to be respected as such, it would be difficult to avoid the conclusion that the grant of Kansas lands was not intended to take immediate effect, since the power to deduct (differing in that respect from the power to forfeit contained in the third article) would show an intention that the grant as a whole should not take immediate effect, and would imply that it was extended only to 320 acres to each emigrant. If the allotment is to be treated as one of 320 acres for each emigrant and not of the entire tract as specified in article two, the residue, of course, belongs to the government.

But did this resolution ever become operative? It is not found in the original nor in the published copy of the treaty, nor in the proclamation of the President, which recites that the Senate did, by a resolution of the 11th of June, 1838, "advise and consent to the ratification of said treaty with certain amendments; which treaty, as so amended, is word for word as follows, to wit:" (Here follows a copy of the treaty as published in 7 Stat. at L. 550.) But no allusion is here made to the final resolution or its proviso. This is the more remarkable, as every other amendment made by the Senate appears in the treaty as published, while no refer-[23]ence whatever *is made to this—the reason probably being that the resolution was mainly directory in its character, requiring that the treaty be fully and fairly explained by the commissioner to each of the tribes separately assembled in council, and that they should give their free and voluntary assent thereto. The proviso may also have been well considered as merely directory to the President, but in any event it is difficult to see how it can be regarded as part of the treaty or as limiting at all the terms of the grant.

The power to make treaties is vested by the Constitution in the President and Senate, and, while this proviso was adopted by the Senate, there is no evidence that it ever received the sanction or approval of the President. It cannot be considered as a legislative act, since the power to legislate is vested in the President, Senate, and House of Representatives. There is something, too, which shocks the conscience in the idea that a treaty can be put forth as embodying the terms of an arrangement with a foreign power or an Indian tribe, a material provision of which is unknown to one of the contracting parties, and is kept in the background to be used by the other only when the exigencies of a particular case may demand it. The proviso never appears to have been called to the attention of the tribes, who would naturally assume that the treaty, embodied in the Presidential proclamation, contained all the terms of the arrangement. It is true that the proclamation recites that the Senate did, on March 25, 1840, resolve that the treaty, "together with the amendments proposed by the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838, have been satisfactorily acceded to and approved of by said tribes," but, as the proclamation purported to set forth the treaty "word for word" as so amended, of course the amendments referred to were those embodied in the treaty as published in the proclamation.

The case of Doe [Clark] v. Braden, 57 U. S. 16 How. 635 [14: 1090], relied upon by the government in this connection, is not in point. In this case, in the ratification by the King of Spain of the treaty by which Florida was ceded to the United States it was admitted that certain grants of land in Florida were annulled and *declared to be void, and it was held that [24] a written declaration, annexed to a treaty at the time of its ratification, was as obligatory as if the provision had been inserted in the body of the treaty itself. The question in the case was whether the King had power to annul the grant, which was considered a political, and not a judicial question; but, as the annulling clause was inserted in the ratification and published in both countries as part of the treaty, there was no question whatever of concealment.

4. Assuming that the Indians took an immediate title to the lands reserved for them in Kansas, we are next to inquire whether such title has been legally forfeited. By the third article of the treaty it was further agreed "that such of the tribes of the New York Indians as do not accept and agree to remove to the country set apart for their new homes within five years, or such other time as the President may, from time to time, appoint, shall forfeit all interest in the lands so set apart, to the United States."

Acting in pursuance of the treaty and of the assumed right of forfeiture, the government surveyed, and made part of the public domain, the lands at Green bay, ceded by the claimants and sold or otherwise disposed of, and conveyed the same and received the consideration therefor, except a reservation of about 65,000 acres to the Oneidas. The lands west of the Mississippi (the Kansas lands) were, after the treaty of Buffalo creek, surveyed and made a part of the public domain, and sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States, which received the consideration therefor, and these lands were thereafter and now are included within the territorial limits of the state of Kansas.

In the view we have taken of the granting clauses of this treaty, the provisions of the third article created a condition subsequent, upon a breach of which the government might declare a forfeiture, but had no power by simple executive action to re-enter, take possession of the lands, and sell them. A distinction is drawn by the authorities between the case of a private grantor, who may re-enter in the case of the breach of a condition subsequent, and the government, which can only *repossess it-[25] self of lands by legislative or judicial action. The distinction was first clearly drawn by this court in the case of United States v. Repentigny, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 211, 267 [18: 627, 646], in which the court said: "We agree that before a forfeiture or reunion with the public domain could take place, a judicial inquiry should be instituted, or, in the technical language of the common law, office found, or its legal equivalent. A legislative act, directing the possession and appropriation of the land, is equivalent to office found. The mode of asserting or of assuming the forfeited grant is subject to the legislative authority of the government. It may be after judicial investigation, or by taking possession directly, under the authority of the government, without these preliminary proceedings." Practically the same language was used with reference to a grant of lands in aid of a railroad in Schulenberg v. Harriman, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 44, 63 [22: 551, 555]; in Farnsworth v. Minnesota & P. R. R. Co. 92 U. S. 49 [23: 530], and in Van Wyck v. Knevals, 106 U. S. 360 [27: 201]. In St. Louis, I. M. & S. Rwy. Co. v. McGee, 115 U. S. 469 [29: 446], it was said: "That legislation to be sufficient [for that purpose] must manifest an intention by Congress to reassert title and resume possession. As it is to take the place of a suit by the United States to enforce a forfeiture, and a judgment therein establishing the right, it should be direct, positive, and free from all doubt or ambiguity." See also New Orleans Pacific Railway Co. v. United States, 124 U. S. 124 [31: 383]. As there is no pretense that any such action as is contemplated by these cases was ever taken, it necessarily follows that, if an estate in fee simple vested in the Indians, the proceedings subsequently taken would not revest the title in the government.

5. But even if it were conceded that the rights of the Indians were subject to forfeiture by executive action, it is by no means certain that the contingency ever happened which authorized such forfeiture; or, if a forfeiture did result, it was not waived by the subsequent action of Congress. A condition, when relied upon to work a forfeiture, is construed with great strictness. The grantor must stand on his legal rights, and any ambiguity in his deed 26]or defect in the evidence *offered to show a breach will be taken most strongly against him, and in favor of the grantee. A condition will not be extended beyond its express terms by construction. The grantor must bring himself within these terms to entitle him to a forfeiture. Jones, Real Prop. §§ 678, 679.

It will be observed that the forfeiture is conditioned, not upon the actual removal of the Indians to the Kansas reservation, but upon their accepting and agreeing to removal within five years, or such other time as the President might from time to time appoint. The tribes for whom the Kansas lands were intended as a future home were the Senecas, Onondagas, Cayugas, Tuscaroras, Oneidas, St. Regis, Stockbridges, Munsees, and Brothertowns, residing in the state of New York.

Of these the Senecas and certain of the Cayugas and Onondagas residing among them expressly agreed in article 10 "to remove from the state of New York to their new homes within five years, and to continue to reside there."

By article 13 the Oneidas also agreed to remove as soon as they could make satisfactory arrangements for the purchase of their lands at Oneida.

By article 14 the Tuscaroras also agreed to accept the country set apart for them, and to remove there within five years, and to continue to reside there.

In a supplemental treaty made with the St. Regis Indians on February 13, 1838, it was agreed that any of them who wished to do so should be at liberty to remove to Kansas at any time thereafter within the time specified in the treaty, but the government should not compel them to remove.

It thus appears that, as to three of these tribes, there has been a technical performance so far as a forcible removal was concerned.

It further appears from the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth findings that the President never fixed any time for their removal, as was contemplated in the third article; that many of the Indians protested against any removal; that the Onondagas officially declared they would not remove; that—

"After the amended treaty had been assented to, the Senecas, the Cayugas and the Onondagas residing with *them, and the Tuscaroras[27 continued to protest against the treaty, the Senecas asserting that their declaration of assent was invalid, and that they would never emigrate but on compulsion, and requesting (as did also some Onondaga chiefs) that no appropriation be made to carry the treaty into effect. These protests were continued even after the treaty was ratified and until the treaty of May 20, 1842, was made. More than five years from the ratification of the treaty of Buffalo creek the Tuscarora chiefs declared that the tribe would not part with its reservation nor remove from it, whatever a few individuals might do."

It further appeared that—

"No provision was made for the actual removal of more than about 260 individuals of the claimant tribes. Of this number only 32 ever received patents or certificates of allotment of the lands mentioned in the first article of the treaty, and the amount allotted to those 32 was at the rate of 320 acres each, or 10,240 acres in all.

"In 1845 Abram Hogeboom represented to the government of the United States that a number of the New York Indians, parties to the treaty of 1838, desired to remove to the Kansas lands, and upon such representation, and in conformity with such desire, said Hogeboom was appointed special agent of the government to remove the said Indians to Kansas.

"The sum of $9,464.08 of an amount appropriated by Congress was expended in the removal of a party of New York Indians under Hogeboom's direction in 1846.

"From Hogeboom's muster-roll, in the Indian Office, it appears that 271 were mustered for emigration. The roll shows that of this number 73 did not leave New York with the party; 191 only arrived in Kansas, June 15, 1846; 17 other Indians arrived subsequently; 82 died and 94 returned to New York.

"It does not appear that any of the 32 Indians to whom allotments were made settled permanently in Kansas."

It is further found that—

"A council of the Senecas, the Cayugas and Onondagas living with them, and the Tusca-28] roras was called by the *Indian commissioner, to be held at Cattaragus, June 2, 1846, to learn the final wishes of the Indians as to emigration. The commissioner who was sent on the part of the United States reported that the meeting was well attended, but that the chiefs were unanimous in the opinion that scarcely any Indians who wished to emigrate remained."

In these findings lie the main strength of the defense.

It thus appears that a part had accepted and agreed to remove; that a few had actually removed; that others had stipulated that they should not be compelled to remove, and still others protested against the treaty and refused to remove. If the acceptance and signing of the treaty is not to be considered in itself as an acceptance and agreement to remove, as to which we express no opinion, there was a technical compliance with the conditions of article 3 by a part of the Indians, and a flat refusal upon the part of others. But, after all, a mere agreement to accept and remove, though probably sufficient to prevent a legal forfeiture, was of no practical value, and would have availed the government nothing, except as it might have justified a forcible removal had the government elected to take that course. No provison was made as to the manner in which the removal was to be effected, but from the dependent character of the Indians, and from the appropriation of $400,000, made for that purpose, it is evident that it was contemplated that the removal should be made by the government itself. It was so held by this court in Fellows v. Blacksmith, 60 U. S. 19 How. 366 [15: 684], and we see no reason to question the propriety of that ruling. Whether the government could have removed them forcibly was not decided in that case, and is not in this.

The difficult point in the case, in its equitable aspect, is whether the protests of the Indians and their final refusal to remove in 1846 do not estop them from claiming the benefit of the reservation made for them. This is the main defense in the case. Upon the other hand, no time was fixed by the President for their removal; no formal notice was ever given them to remove; but at various times, and particularly at the council held at Cattaraugus, June 2, 1846, called by the 29] commissioners *to learn the final wishes of the Indians as to the emigration, the chiefs of the four tribes present were unanimous in the opinion that scarcely any Indians who wished to emigrate remained. This action constitutes practically the only claim of forfeiture. There is no finding that the other five tribes did refuse. The practical application which counsel seek to make of this partial refusal is to justify the government, not only in appropriating the Kansas lands, but, inferentially, in failing to make any other compensation to the Indians for the seizure and sale of the Wisconsin lands. In view of this, it seems to us that, to justify a forfeiture, it should appear that the repudiation was as formal, as broad, and as unequivocal as the acceptance; that the President should have fixed a time for the removal, and should at last have made a formal tender of performance. If it be said that, considering the number of the tribes and the character of the individuals he was dealing with, this was impracticable, it may also be said that the government had undertaken to negotiate a treaty with them severally and collectively, and if it sought to enforce a forfeiture of rights originating in such treaty, it should have given formal notice to that effect, that the Indians might understand that they were risking the loss of all compensation for their Wisconsin lands by refusing to emigrate.

But, however this may be, we think the fact that the government never insisted upon this as an estoppel, and never treated the Indians as having lost their rights in the Kansas lands, is a sufficient answer to the claim of abandonment. After their refusal at the council in 1846, nothing appears to have been done until 1854, when Kansas had begun to feel the impress of a sudden and large immigration from the east, and an act known as the Kansas-Nebraska act was passed, creating the territory of Kansas, in which Congress defined the limits of the new territory (10 Stat. at L. 284, chap. 59) and, after giving the boundary lines, which included the New York Indian lands,

"Provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property *now per- [30 taining to the Indians in said territory, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which by treaty with any Indian tribe, is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the territory of Kansas, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included within the said territory of Kansas."

The 37th section of the same act (p. 200) provides:

"That all treaties, laws, and other engagements made by the government of the United States with the Indian tribes inhabiting the territories embraced within this act shall be faithfully and rigidly observed, notwithstanding anything contained in this act."

Even if the first clause of this proviso be limited to the Indians then "in said territory," of whom only thirty-two were New York Indians, the second clause is subject to no such limitation, and applies to treaties "with any Indian tribe." The reference here is evidently to the treaty of Buffalo creek, and is a distinct recognition of the subsisting validity of such treaty, and a promise on the part of Congress that it shall be faithfully and rigidly observed, "notwithstanding anything contained in this act," and, we may add, notwithstanding the refusal of the Indians to emigrate and the now claimed forfeiture of their rights.

Some steps were taken to effect a settlement with the Indians, and on November 5, 1857, a treaty was entered into with the Tonawandas in which, after reciting the treaty of 1838, the surrender of 500,000 acres of lands in Wisconsin, the agreement to set apart the lands in Kansas, the Tonawandas relinquished their interest in the Kansas lands, the United States agreeing to pay them therefor the sum of $256,000. 11 Stat. at L. 735. But the Tonawandas were but one of the nine tribes which participated in the treaty, and there seems to have been no reason why their claim 31]should have been recognized *in preference to others who stood upon the same footing. Upon the theory of the government, there was no reason why this treaty should have been entered into at all. It was clearly a recognition of the fact that the Tonawandas had rights which, in the nineteen years which had elapsed since the treaty was made, they had not forfeited.

But this is not all: In the 11th section of the sundry civil appropriation act of March 3, 1859 (11 Stat. at L. 425, chap 82), a provision was made for the issue of patents to Indians who were entitled to separate selection of lands in Kansas, with a proviso that "nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to the New York Indians, or to affect their rights under the treaty made by them in 1838 at Buffalo creek." If this was not a recognition of the fact that the Indians still had rights, it certainly shows that their alleged rights had been made the subject of consideration, and were not repudiated or denied.

But it seems that the matter did not rest here, for in the same month in which the last above act was passed, namely, March 21, 1859, the Secretary of the Interior directed the New York Indian reservation in Kansas to be surveyed, with a view of allotting a half section each to such of the New York Indians as had removed there under the treaty, after which the residue was to become public domain, and in December, 1860, the President proclaimed the reservation to be a part of the public domain.

Notwithstanding this, however, in the act of January 29, 1861 (12 Stat. at L. 126, chap. 20), admitting Kansas to the Union as a state, it was provided that nothing should be so construed as to impair the rights of person or property pertaining to the Indians in said territory so long as such rights should remain unextinguished by treaty. It may be said that the provisos in this act applied only to the Indians in said territory, but even if it be so limited, the provision in the act of March 3, 1859, clearly applies only to the New York Indians, whose rights under the treaty were recognized. Up to the time these acts were passed certainly there had been no denial of the right of the Indians to these lands, and no action on the part 32] *of the government indicating an intent to insist upon the forfeiture of such right. Every legislative expression tended toward an acknowledgment of the fact that their claim was unimpaired.

Our attention has also been called to certain documents emanating from the executive and legislative departments of the government, some of which tend to strengthen the idea that these departments never intended to treat the action of the Indians as a forfeiture of their grant, and acquiesced in the justice of the claims the Indians now make, and have already made under the treaty of Buffalo creek. It is insisted by the Attorney General that, as these documents are not referred to in the findings of fact by the court below, this court cannot consider them; but as they are documents of which we may take judicial notice, we think the fact that they are not incorporated in the findings of the court will not preclude us from examining them, with a view of inquiring whether they have the bearing claimed. Jones v. United States, 137 U. S. 202, 214 [34: 691, 696].

While it is ordinarily true that this court takes notice of only such facts as are found by the court below, it may take notice of matters of common observation, of statutes, records, or public documents, which were not called to its attention, or other similar matters of judicial cognizance.

As indicating the views of the executive in regard to the justice of the Indians' claims a treaty was concluded September 2, 1863, with the New York Indians who had moved to Kansas under the treaty of 1838, for the purpose of extinguishing their title to lands in that state. This treaty was based on the treaty of November 5, 1857, with the Tonawandas, and was sent to the Senate for ratification, but action was suspended upon it "until a treaty could be concluded with all the New York Indians to arrange all matters between them and the United States which required adjustment." Ex. Doc. Y, p. 2, 40th Cong. 3d sess.

In pursuance of this policy, the President, in May, 1864, directed a commissioner to proceed to the state of New York for the purpose of negotiating a treaty with the New York Indians. *These Indians had been previously [33 notified on April 26, 1864, by the Secretary of the Interior, that he deemed it proper to advise them, through their agent, 'that it is the desire of the government to extinguish their title to a tract of land in Kansas, ceded to them by the treaty of January 15, 1838;" and that a treaty had already been made for that purpose with the fragments of bands of these Indians residing in Kansas. Ex. Doc. No. 1, 38th Cong. 2d sess. p. 188.

The treaty with the Indians living in New York was not concluded, but in his annual report to Congress the Secretary of the Interior on December 6, 1864, spoke of the efforts to extinguish the title of these Indians to the Kansas lands, and considered their claims as "being undeniable and just." Ibid.

This opinion was reiterated by the commissioner of Indian affairs on December 5, 1866, in his annual report. (p. 61.)

In November, 1868, the President again attempted to negotiate a treaty or treaties with the Senecas and other New York Indians with reference to "their claims arising under the treaties of 1838 and 1842." Ex. Doc. Y p. 10, 40th Cong. 3d sess. And thereafter a treaty was concluded December 4, 1868, according to the commissioner appointed to negotiate it, by which the United States agreed to pay the sum of $350 to each Indian, including half breeds, of the Six Nations in New York and Wisconsin. Ibid. p 1.

The commissioner appointed to negotiate this treaty reported to the Indians in council that "the reason why the New York Indians had not been removed to their Kansas reservation was because squatters had obtained possession of their lands, and the United States was unable to drive them off, and keep them off." Ibid. p. 10.

This treaty, however, was not ratified by Congress, owing presumably to the passage of a general law which denied the right of any Indian tribe or nation to be recognized as an independent nation for treaty-making purposes. 16 Stat. at L. 566.

In a communication dated January 29, 1884, 34]addressed to *the Secretary of the Interior for transmission to the Senate, the commissioner of Indian affairs reviewed the claims of the New York Indians under the treaty of 1838, and adhered to the opinions of his predecessors, in that there was a failure on the part of the government to provide homes for those who went to Kansas, and that no consideration had been given the New York Indians for the cession of the 500,000 acres of Wisconsin lands. He referred to the settlement with the Tonawandas, and stated that he saw "no reason why the other tribes should not receive the same relief."

While none of these documents are of great importance in themselves, they serve to indicate very clearly that in the mind of the executive and departmental officers the rights of the Indians, under the treaty of Buffalo creek, were continuously recognized as just claims against the government.

We are at loss to understand upon what theory this can be considered an abandoned claim. If the evidence pointed in that direction the argument would come with better grace if the government had not itself received the full consideration stipulated by the treaty (so far as such consideration was a valuable one) for the Kansas lands, and had neglected to render any account of the same. Of course, if the legal title passed to these Indians, something else than a failure to assert such title is necessary to devest it. But, however this may be, the court finds (finding 17) that after the order of the Secretary of the Interior of 1859, and before the proclamation of the President of said lands as a part of the public domain in December, 1860, "some of the New York Indians employed counsel to protect and prosecute their claims in the premises, asserting, in the powers of attorney, that the United States had seized upon the said lands contrary to the obligations of said treaty, and would not permit the said Indians to occupy the same or make any disposition thereof. The said Indians have since asserted their said claims." How long, or how frequently, or in what manner, the Indians continued to assert their claims, does not appear; but it seems that on June 21, 1884, their claims, together with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents appertaining 35] thereto, were referred to the *court of claims for an investigation and finding of facts. To create an abandonment there must not only be an omission to prosecute, but an intent to forego, of which there is no evidence in this case. Indeed, it is not altogether clear that the government did not waive this point in the act of 1893, conferring jurisdiction upon the court of claims to enter judgment, when it declared that the statute of limitations should not be pleaded as a bar to recovery.

The appropriation of these lands by the government is probably explicable by the fact that an enormous emigration to Kansas was at that time in progress for the avowed purpose of preventing the establishment of slavery in the territory; that the pressure of population for land was very great; that the territory was almost in the throes of civil war; that the negotiation of a new treaty with nine different tribes would be attended with considerable delay; that but few of the Indians had actually removed and resided in Kansas, and that the Secretary of the Interior assumed, what undoubtedly the facts had some tendency to show, that the grant had lapsed by the failure of the Indians to emigrate, and therefore considered himself fully justified in taking possession of the lands, and settling with the Indians in a future treaty. The claim of the Tonawandas was actually settled. Congress, in the act of 1861 admitting Kansas, provided for the subsequent extinguishment of Indian titles; but a great civil war then intervened, and for several years absorbed the attention of Congress, and the matter does not seem to have been resuscitated until after the lapse of about twenty years, when Congress referred the case to the court of claims, with an express waiver of the statute of limitations. We do not perceive in all this an intention on the part of the Indians to abandon their claims, or any indication on the part of Congress that it considered it abandoned.

6. But little need be said considering the cash payments to be made under the ninth, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth articles of this treaty. Most, if not all, of these payments were to be made upon the actual removal of these Indians to the west, and as this contingency never happened, the*amounts[36 never became due. The same ruling applies to the appropriation of $400,000 in the fifteenth article, which was made to aid in removing the Indians to their new homes, supporting them the first year after their removal, and for other incidental purposes contingent upon their removal.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is therefore reversed, and the case remanded with instructions to enter a new judgment for the net amount actually received by the government for the Kansas lands, without interest, less the amount of lands upon the basis of which settlement was made with the Tonawandas, and other just deductions, and for such other proceedings as may be necessary, and in conformity with this opinion.

Submitted March 14, 1898. Decided April 11, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Montana to review a decree of that court affirming the decree of the District Court of the State of Montana for the County of Silver Bow in favor of the defendant, Andrew J. Davis, in an action brought by John H. Leyson, administrator, etc., against said Davis et al. to recover shares of capital stock of the First National Bank of Butte. On motion to dismiss or affirm. Dismissed.

37 *Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

This was an action commenced by the special administrator of the estate of Andrew J. Davis, deceased, and continued in the name of his successor, Leyson, administrator with the will annexed, against Andrew J. Davis, Jr., and the First National Bank of Butte, in the district court of the state of Montana for the county of Silver Bow, to recover nine hundred and fifty shares of the capital stock of the defendant bank, alleged by the administrator to belong to the estate of the deceased, and claimed by the defendant Davis, Jr., under a donatio causa mortis. The prayer of the complaint was that the claim of defendant Davis, Jr., to the stock be declared void; that he be compelled to deliver up the certificates; and that the bank be required to transfer the same on its books and issue new certificates to plaintiff as administrator.

The answer of Davis, Jr., in addition to his defense, set up affirmative matter, and prayed that he be adjudged the owner of the stock; that plaintiff as administrator and the estate be decreed to have no right or interest therein; and that the bank be required to make the proper transfers upon its books to him. The bank answered that it was ready and willing to transfer the shares of stock to the party determined by the court entitled to the same.

The trial court found as facts, in substance, that in the latter part of December, 1889, Andrew J. Davis was, and had been for some months, seriously and dangerously ill, suffering from an ailment of which he died in the month of March following; that being so ill, and in view and expectation of death, but being of sound and disposing mind, he gave to defendant Andrew J. Davis, as a gift, the shares of stock and certificates thereof described in the complaint, and at the same time delivered the certificates to said Andrew J., who then and there received and accepted the same, and who has ever since said gift and delivery retained and held the shares of stock and certificates in his possession, and claimed them as his own; that the deceased had great affection for and confidence in defendant Andrew J., and at the time of the gift of the stock and certificates, and for several years prior thereto, it was and had been the intention of the deceased to give the stock and *certificates to said[38 Andrew J.; that there was no written assignment of the stock or certificates, or power of attorney executed by deceased in connection with the gift, nor any written authority empowering Andrew J., or any other person for him, to transfer the stock and certificates on the books of the bank during the lifetime of the donor, and that there was no transfer made on the books of the bank to Andrew J.; that no other gift than the gift of the stock was made, or attempted to be made, by the deceased to Andrew J.; that the gift of the stock was an absolute gift, and was a valid gift mortis causa; and that defendant Andrew J. had ever since held possession and exercised control and dominion over the stock, with the knowledge of the donor to the time of his death, arising and resulting only from the fact of the gift and the donee's possession. It was therefore concluded that the defendant Andrew J. Davis was the owner of the stock and certificates described in the complaint, and entitled to have the shares transferred to him on the books of the bank, and to have new certificates issued to him therefor; that the donor was devested of his possession, dominion, and control of said shares of stock by the gift; that the plaintiff, as administrator, had not, nor had the estate of the deceased, any right, title, or claim in or to the shares of stock or certificates, and that defendant Andrew J. was entitled to a decree in accordance with the prayer of his answer.

The decree was accordingly so entered. On appeal the supreme court of Montana reviewed the facts and the law at length, and elaborately discussed the authorities both in England and in this country, sustained the claim of defendant Davis to the stock and affirmed the decree. 17 Mont. 220 [31 L. R. A. 429].

A writ of error from this court was thereafter allowed and motions made to dismiss or affirm.

Messrs. A. T. Britton, W. W. Dixon, A. B. Browne, James W. Forbis, and B. Platt Carpenter, for defendant in error, in support of motion to dismiss or affirm.

Messrs. Robert G. Ingersoll, Walter S. Logan, Charles M. Demond, Edwin W. Toole, and Henry A. Root for plaintiff in error, in opposition to motion.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

*The supreme court of Montana held [39 that as between donor and donee a valid gift of the stock was made by the delivery thereof, without a transfer of the shares on the books of the bank or indorsement on the back of the certificates themselves, which carried the equitable title and entitled the donee to call for the legal title as against the representative of the donor's estate. This conclusion was arrived at solely on principles of general law, and in itself involved the disposition of no Federal question.

As to jurisdiction of United States Supreme Court to declare state law void as in conflict with state Constitution; to revise decrees of state courts as to construction of state laws,—see notes to Jackson, Hart, v. Lamphire, 7: 679; and Commercial Bank v. Buckingham, 12: 169.

It is true that by § 5139 of the Revised Statutes shares of the capital stock of national banks are declared to be personal property, "transferable on the books of the association in such manner as may be prescribed in the by-laws or articles of association;" and it is conceded by defendant in error that by one of the by-laws of defendant bank it was prescribed that its stock should be "assignable and transferable only on the books of this bank, subject to the restrictions and provisions of the banking laws, and transfer book shall be provided, in which all assignments and transfers of stock shall be made. No transfer of stock shall be made without the consent of the board of directors by any stockholder who shall be liable, either as principal debtor or otherwise;" and that the certificates in question contained the provision: "Transferable only by him or his attorney on the books of this bank on the surrender of this certificate."

But these matters raised no Federal question. The rights of third parties, or of creditors, or of the bank, were not in issue or determined here, but simply the equities as between the particular parties. The representative of the donor was manifestly bound by the donor's valid acts, and could assert no right superior to his. His right to make the gift was the right to dispose of his own property, and whether as between him and his donee the equitable title passed was a question of general or local law. The administrator's claim that he was entitled to receive the stock as rep-40] resenting the estate or for the *benefit of the next of kin rested on that law as administered by the courts of the state.

So far as the act of Congress is concerned, we understand the doctrine to be, as stated in Johnston v. Laflin, 103 U. S. 800, 804 [26: 532, 535], that "the transferability of shares in the national banks is not governed by different rules from those which are ordinarily applied to the transfer of shares in other corporate bodies."

In Black v. Zacharie, 44 U. S. 3 How. 483, 513 [11: 690, 704], it was said: "It is true that the charters of the Carrollton Bank and of the Gaslight & Banking Company provide that no transfer of the stock of these corporations shall be valid or effectual until such transfers shall be entered or registered in a book or books to be kept for that purpose by the corporation. But this is manifestly a regulation designed for the security of the bank itself, and of third persons taking transfers of the stock without notice of any prior equitable transfer. It relates to the transfer of the legal title, and not of any equitable interest in the stock subordinate to that title. In the case of the Union Bank of Georgetown v. Laird, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 390 [4: 269], this court took notice of the distinction between the legal and equitable title in cases of bank stock, where the charter of the bank had provided for the mode of transfer. The general construction which has been put upon the charter of other banks containing similar provisions as to the transfer of their stock is, that the provisions are designed solely for the safety and security of the bank itself, and of purchasers without notice; and that as between vendor and vendee a transfer, not in conformity to such provisions, is good to pass the equitable title and devest the vendor of all interest in the stock. Such are the decisions in the cases of Bank of Utica v. Smalley, 2 Cow. 777, 778 [14 Am. Dec. 526]; Gilbert v. Manchester Iron Mfg. Co. 11 Wend. 628; Commercial Bank of Buffalo v. Kortright, 22 Wend. 362; Quiner v. Marblehead Social Insurance Co. 10 Mass. 476, and Sargent v. Franklin Ins. Co. 8 Pick. 90 [19 Am. Dec. 306]."

We cannot perceive that any title, right, privilege, or immunity was specially set up or claimed by the administrator under a law of the United States and denied by the highest tribunal *of the state, which is the ground of [41 jurisdiction relied on. The controversy was merely as to which of the claimants had the superior equity to these shares of stock, and the national banking act was only collaterally involved. Conde v. York, 168 U. S. 642 [ante, 266]; Union National Bank v. Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. 163 U. S. 325 [41: 177]; Eustis v. Bolles, 150 U. S. 361 [37: 1111].

Writ of error dismissed.

Mr. Justice Harlan is of opinion that this court has jurisdiction and that the judgment should be affirmed.

tiff, the Illinois Steel Company, against John Budzisz, et al. for the recovery of the possession of certain lands in Milwaukee. On motion to dismiss. Dismissed.

See same case below, 82 Fed. Rep. 160.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

This was an action for ejectment brought in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin, in February, 1896, by the Illinois Steel Company, a corporation of the state of Illinois, against John Budzisz and August Budzisz, citizens of the state of Wisconsin, to recover certain lots or parcels of land in the fifth ward of the city of Milwaukee. The case was so proceeded in that, on November 20, 1897, a final judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for possession of the premises, and for costs. A writ of error was then sued out from this court.

Messrs. William E. Carter and Elbert H. Gary for defendant in error, in favor of motion to dismiss.

Mr. Rublee A. Cole for plaintiffs in error, in opposition to motion.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause is now before us on a motion to dismiss the writ of error, on the ground that there is not involved any question that brings the case within any of those provisions of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing circuit courts of appeals, which give this court jurisdiction to review the judgment of the circuit court. Neither the petition, containing, as it did, only the allegations usual in an action of ejectment, nor the answer, first filed, raised any question which, however disposed of in the circuit court, would have enabled either party to have brought the case directly to this court.

Subsequently, however, the defendants filed an amended answer, in which they averred that the title to the land in dispute was still in the United States; that the Indian title to said land had not been extinguished at the time of the inception of plaintiff's title; that any patent or purported patent granted by the United States while the Indian title was still existing was null and void. After, on motion of the plaintiff, certain portions of these answers had been stricken out, the defendants filed a second amended answer, the main allegations of which were as follows:

That the Indian title to the lands in dispute had not been extinguished when Increase Claflin and Daniel Darnell made their entry; that the Indian title was conveyed to the United States under and by virtue of several treaties with the Menominee Indians, to wit: The treaty of February 8, 1831; of February 17, 1831; of October 27, 1832; of October 18, 1848; that by reason of the aforesaid treaties the lands were not subject to entry under the laws of the United States, and that therefore the entry of Claflin and Darnell was null and void; that said lands were first offered for sale by the proclamation of the President on May 6, 1835; that [43] the patent of the United *States dated September 1, 1838, to Alexander J Irwin, assignee of Increase Claflin and Daniel Darnell, was and is null and void; that the patent of the United States dated April 16, 1838, to Albert G. Ellis, assignee of Daniel Darnell, was and is null and void, and in no way extinguished the title of the government of the United States to the lands in dispute.

On July 30, 1897, the court, on motion of the plaintiff, struck out those portions of the amended answers which have just been enumerated; and on August 3, 1897, the defendants filed exceptions to the orders of the court striking out those portions of the answers, which exceptions were allowed and signed by the judge.

With the record in that condition the case came on for trial, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

The record shows no exceptions taken or allowed during the course of the trial, either to the admission or rejection of evidence, or to the charge of the judge. The only bill of exceptions to be found in the record is the one allowed and signed by the judge relating to the striking out of portions of the answers.

The course most favorable to the plaintiffs in error will be to treat the orders of the court striking out portions of the answers as if they were rejections of offers made at the trial, to prove the allegations contained in the portions stricken out.

The reasons given by the court for striking out those portions of the answers were that a patent of the United States is the highest evidence of title, where the grant originates out of the public domain; that the defendants were mistaken in the inference that the ownership of these lands was at any time, in view of the law, vested in the Indians, or derived through the treaties referred to; that there is no recognition by any of the authorities of a fee vested in the Indians; that as to the land in Wisconsin, the treaty with Great Britain and the cessions of Massachusetts and Virginia are the legal sources of title in the general government; that the treaties with the Indians are regarded only for rights of occupancy and for reservations from sale; that therefore the doctrine is established that the patent issued by the government is "an *invaluable muniment of title and a source [44] of peace and quiet to its possessor;" that even if it be allowed, for the purposes of the motion, that there was no right of entry at the time of original entry alleged, the answer concedes that these lands were offered for sale by the President's proclamation of May 6, 1835, upon survey of 1834, and that the patents were issued, respectively, April 16 and September 1, 1838; that it is not asserted that their validity has ever been since questioned, either by the United States, or by any person in its right, under equities pre-existing or otherwise; that these lands became patentable after the survey and proclamation, and were clearly within the jurisdiction of the land department when the patents were issued in 1838; that all questions as to entry and right to patent were then determinable by that tribunal, and the patents were not void, even if they were voidable at the instance of proper parties; that the special matters alleged in the answers and included in the motion to strike out state no grounds which are available to these defendants by way of defense; that under the act of Congress of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. at L. 1093, chap. 559), any action by the United States is now barred, and that even if the defendants were possessed of paramount equities, or were in any manner entitled to avail themselves of rights existing in the United States, they are equally barred by that limitation. Illinois Steel Co. v. Budzisz, 82 Fed. Rep. 160.

The correctness of these views is not before us on this motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, and we only state them to show that no question is really presented which brings this case within our supervisory power. It is not claimed that the construction or application of the Constitution was involved, and we think it is quite clear that, in fact, neither the construction nor the validity of any treaty of the United States or made under its authority is in any way involved, or arises, or is drawn in question in this case. Mere allegations to that effect, not based upon the facts of the case, do not create a case which we are authorized to review. The alleged invalidity of the entries and of the patents do not arise out of any alleged misconstruction or breach of any treaty 45] *but out of the alleged misconduct of the officers of the Land Office in permitting the entries and in issuing the patents; and if any error was committed by the circuit court in dealing with that question, which we do not intimate, the proper course for the defendants was to have gone to the circuit court of appeals.

Moreover, the defendants did not connect themselves in any way with the Indian treaties, or with any of the parties to them; nor did they claim any rights under said treaties, or under any of the parties to them. In no true sense, therefore, can it be said that this is a case in which the validity or construction of any treaty made under the authority of the United States is drawn in question by a party having a rightful interest in such question.

The motion of the defendant in error must be allowed, and the writ of error is accordingly dismissed.

HOSMER B. PARSONS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA and Commissioners.

Federal question—water-main tax—power of Congress—assessments.

1. The validity of statutes of the United States and of authority exercised under the United States is drawn in question in the determination of the constitutionality of certain acts of Congress, and of proceedings under them for special assessment, without sufficient notice or opportunity to be heard.
2. Notice to a property owner is not necessary to sustain a water-main tax under an act of Congress providing that all assessments for laying water mains in the District of Columbia shall be at a specified rate per front foot on abutting lots, and giving commissioners power to lay water mains whenever they deem necessary for the public safety, comfort, or health.
3. Congress can create a general system to store water and furnish it to the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, and prescribe the amount and method of collection of the assessment; and plaintiff in error cannot be heard to complain that he was not notified of the creation of the system or consulted as to its cost.
4. An assessment for water mains, exceeding the actual cost of laying them, is not for that reason excessive, when it is made, not merely to put down the pipes, but to raise a fund to keep the water system in efficient repair.

Submitted December 20, 1897. Decided April 11, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of that District dismissing suit brought by Hosmer B. Parsons, plaintiff, against the District of Columbia et al., to annul a certain special assessment for laying a water main as illegal. There was also motion to dismiss. Affirmed.

See same case below, 8 App. D. C. 391.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

On October 5, 1895, Hosmer B. Parsons, the plaintiff in error, filed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia *his petition [46 against the District of Columbia and John W. Ross, Charles F. Powell, and George Truesdell, commissioners of the District, complaining, as illegal, of a certain charge or special assessment against land belonging to the petitioner, as a water-main tax, or assessment for laying a water main in the street on which said land abuts. The petition avers that the charge or assessment in question was made in accordance with the act of the legislative assembly of the District of Columbia approved June 23, 1873, and the acts of Congress approved respectively June 10, 1879, June 17, 1890, and August 11, 1894. The petition alleged the following grounds of objection to the assessment:

1. That the petitioner was not one of the property holders who requested that the work and improvements for which said parcel of land was assessed should be done and made, and that said charge was made against property whose owner had not requested the doing of said work or the making of said improvements.

2. That the petitioner was not consulted as to advisability of making said improvements, and was given no opportunity to be heard upon the questions of cost or utility or benefit of the work, or of the apportionment of the tax, and was not notified of the amount charged until after the work was concluded, and after the assessment had been made and had gone into effect as a lien upon said land, which was not a reasonable time.

3. Said assessment was not made and was not authenticated by any officer or person authorized to make or authenticate the same.

4. The assessment was made without any estimate of the cost of the work to be done, and without regard to the cost of the work or the value of the improvement, and not upon the basis of benefits to the property assessed, and said assessment is in excess of the cost of the work.

5. The assessment was made without authority of law, and the respondents had no jurisdiction or right to make the same.

47] *6. The description of the parcel of land assessed is insufficient.

7. The said tax was not assessed within thirty days after the said water main had been laid and erected.

8. All of the said land assessed does not abut upon the street in which said water main was laid.

The petition proceeded to allege that the said charge remained unpaid, and that the commissioners were threatening to sell and convey said land in order to pay and satisfy said illegal charge, whereby the petitioner's title to his land was clouded, and that he was thereby injured and has no appeal.

The petitioner prayed that a writ of certiorari should issue, commanding the respondents to certify to the court a copy of each and every record and part of record relating in any manner to the laying of said water main and said assessment, and that, upon the coming in of the return of the respondent, the said charge complained of should be quashed and annulled, etc.

The writ of certiorari was issued and a return made thereto, the principal facts appearing therein are that the petitioner's land was assessed with the sum of $872.50, being at the rate of $1.25 for each linear foot abutting on the street; that the land abutting on the opposite side of the street was charged with an equal sum, making a total assessment of $2.50 per foot; and that the cost of the main was $1.50 per foot.

On January 6, 1896, after a hearing upon the petition and return, the petition was dismissed. An appeal was thereupon taken to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, where, after argument, the judgment of the supreme court of the District was, on April 16, 1896, affirmed; and on May 5, 1896, the cause was by a writ of error brought to this court.

The principal enactments of Congress pertaining to the water system of the District of Columbia are found in the Revised Statutes relating to the District in chapter 8, §§ 195-221.

Thereby the legislative assembly, then in ex-
48] istence, was *authorized to supply the inhabitants of Washington and Georgetown with Potomac water from the aqueduct, mains, or pipes laid in the streets and avenues by the United States, and to make all laws and regulations for the proper distribution of the same; to establish a scale of annual rates for the supply and use of the water, and generally to enact such laws as might be necessary to supply the inhabitants of Washington and Georgetown with pure and wholesome water, and to carry into full effect the provisions of said chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes. It is further provided that a water tax may be levied and collected on all real property within the limits of the city of Washington, which binds or touches on any avenue, street, or alley in which a main water pipe may be laid by the United States or by the District; that the water tax may be levied on lots in proportion to their frontage or their area, as may be determined by law, and may be collected in not less than three nor more than five annual assessments; and that the water tax so authorized to be levied and collected shall constitute a fund to be used exclusively to defray the cost of distribution of the water, including all necessary fixtures and machines connected with such distribution.

In pursuance of the authority thus delegated, the legislative assembly, by act approved June 23, 1873, provided as follows:

"That hereafter, in order to defray the expenses of laying water mains and the erection of fire plugs, there be, and is hereby, levied a special tax of one and a quarter cents per square foot on every lot or part of lot which binds inor touches on any avenue, street, or alley in which a main water pipe may hereafter be laid and fire plug erected, which tax shall be assessed by the water registrar within thirty days after such water mains and fire plugs shall have been laid and erected; of which assessments the water registrar shall immediately notify the owner or agent of the property chargeable therewith, setting forth in said notice the number of the square in which is situated the property on which said tax is assessed, and the avenue, street, or alley on which it fronts; and the said tax shall be due and payable in four *equal instalments, the first of [49 which shall be payable within thirty days from the date of the notice," etc.

By the act of March 3, 1863 (Rev. Stat. D. C. § 204), it was provided that, "on petition of the owners of the majority of real estate on any square or line of squares in the city of Washington, water pipes may be laid and fire plugs and hydrants erected wherever the same may be requisite and necessary for public convenience, security from fire, or for health." But this provision was replaced by the act of June 17, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 159, chap. 428), which enacted that "the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have the power to lay water mains and water pipes and erect fire plugs and hydrants wherever the same may be, in their judgment, necessary for the public safety, comfort, or health."

By the act of August 11, 1894 (28 Stat. at L. 275, chap. 253), it was provided "that hereafter assessments levied for laying water mains in the District of Columbia shall be at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per linear front foot against all lots or land abutting upon the street, road, or alley in which a water main shall be laid."

Mr. Arthur A. Birney, for plaintiff in error:

In any case where proceedings are to be had for the taking of property, or to impose a burden upon it, the statute itself must provide for notice to the property owner; otherwise it is unconstitutional.

A law which authorizes assessments to be laid without regard to benefits would take property for the public without compensation, or take property from one person for the benefit of another, and in either aspect it would be unconstitutional.

Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345 (31: 763).

The original water-main tax of a cent and a quarter a square foot for laying water mains was a deliberate legislative judgment of the immediate cost of laying mains and the contingent expense of maintaining and keeping the same in repair.

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in error have moved to dismiss the writ of error, because the sum or value of the matter in dispute is less than $5,000, and because the judgment of the court below does not involve the validity of a statute of the United States or of an authority exercised under the United States.

It is true that the amount or value of the matter in dispute is not sufficient to enable this court to exercise its revisory power *over [50 the judgment of the court of appeals, but we think it plainly appears that the validity of statutes of the United States and of an authority exercised under the United States was drawn into question in the court below, and is presented, by the assignment of error, for the consideration of this court.

It is stated in the opinion of the court of appeals that the questions raised in that court were three: 1st, whether the act of the legislative assembly of the District of Columbia, approved June 23, 1873, in reference to the construction of water mains, and providing the mode of assessment therefor, and also the act of Congress of August 11, 1894 [28 Stat. at L. 275, chap. 253], "to regulate water-main assessments in the District of Columbia," are constitutional and valid enactments; 2d, whether in the assessment there was a sufficient description of the appellant's property; 3d, whether there was sufficient notice of the assessment given to the appellant. 8 App. D. C. 391. Those questions are clearly within the terms of the statute authorizing this court to review the final judgments or decrees of the court of appeals.

The proposition chiefly urged on our consideration is that, in all cases where proceedings are to be had for taking of property, or to impose a burden upon it, the statute itself must provide for notice to the property owner: otherwise it is unconstitutional; and that the statutes under which the present proceeding was had did not provide for notice to the owner of land to be assessed, nor give him an opportunity to be heard.

Before we reach a particular examination of the reasoning advanced and of the authorities cited on behalf of the plaintiff in error, certain principles, so well settled by the authorities, Federal and state, and by views expressed by esteemed authors, as to form safe materials from which to reason, may well be briefly adverted to.

In every modern civilized community or state there are some matters of which every citizen and property owner must be indisputably visited with notice. In the eye of the law, he knows that his personal service is due to maintain public order and to protect his country from hostile invasion. He is bound to know that, in view of the protection he and his 51]*property receive, it is his duty to contribute his due share to the establishment and maintenance of stable government. No person, in any country governed by laws, least of all in a country where the laws are passed and administered by legally constituted authorities, can be heard to say that he was ignorant of the fact that such was his duty, and that, if he neglected or failed to make such due contribution, lawful compulsory methods might be resorted to.

So, too, when he elects to become a member of a municipal community, and seeks to enjoy the social benefits thereby afforded, he is supposed to have notice of the necessary obligations he thus incurs. Streets must be graded, paved, and lighted. A police force to enforce peace and order must be provided. Particularly, in the line of our present investigation, there is the obvious necessity for a system to supply the inhabitants with a constant and unfailing supply of water, as essential for health, comfort, and safety next in importance to air. He cannot be heard to contend that he is entitled to gratuitously receive such advantages, nor that the laws and ordinances under which they are created and regulated are invalid, unless his individual and personal views have been formally obtained and considered.

On the other hand it is equally well settled that the exercise of the power to assess and collect the public burdens should not be purely arbitrary and unregulated.

In each case, therefore, where the party, whose property is subjected to the charge of a public burden, challenges the validity of the law under which it was imposed, it becomes the duty of the courts to closely consider the special nature of the tax and legislation complained of.

It is trite to say that general principles announced by courts, which are perfectly sound expressions of the law under the facts of a particular case, may be wholly inapplicable in another and different case; and there is scarcely any department of the law in which it is easier to collect one body of decisions and contrast them with another in apparent conflict, than that which deals with the taxing and police powers.

There is a wide difference between a tax or as 52]sessment *prescribed by a legislative body, having full authority over the subject, and one imposed by a municipal corporation, acting under a limited and delegated authority. And the difference is still wider between a legislative act making an assessment, and the action of mere functionaries, whose authority is derived from municipal ordinances.

The legislation in question in the present case is that of the Congress of the United States, and must be considered in the light of the conclusion, so often announced by this court, that the United States possess complete jurisdiction, both of a political and municipal nature, over the District of Columbia. Mattingly v. District of Columbia, 97 U. S. 687 [24: 1098]; Gibbons v. District of Columbia, 116 U. S. 404 [29: 680]; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 282 [37: 170]; Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 568 [42: 280].

By this legislation a comprehensive system, regulating the supply of water and the erection and maintenance of reservoirs and of water mains, was established, and of this legislation every property owner in the District must be presumed to have notice. And accordingly when by the act of August 11, 1894, Congress enacted that thereafter assessments levied for laying water mains in the District of Columbia should be at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per linear front foot against all lots or land abutting upon the street, road, or alley in which a water main shall be laid, such act must be deemed conclusive alike of the question of the necessity of the work, and of the benefits as against abutting property. To open such questions for review by the courts, on the petition of any or every property holder, would create endless confusion. Where the legislature has submitted these questions for inquiry to a commission, or to official persons to be appointed under municipal ordinances or regulations, the inquiry becomes in its nature judicial in such a sense that the property owner is entitled to a hearing, or to notice or an opportunity to be heard.

This distinction was clearly brought out in the noted case of Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183 [30 Am. Rep. 289]. There an act of the state of New York empowered a commission composed of three persons to open and pave an avenue, and for that purpose "to take *such[53 land as was requisite, estimate the value thereof, and assess the amount on the lands benefited by the opening of the avenue in proportion to the benefits," but which provided for no notice to the property owner; and the court of appeals held that notice of the proceeding was essential, and that, accordingly, the proceedings were invalid. Subsequently the legislature passed a validating act, directing a sum equal to so much of the first assessment as had not been paid, with interest, and a proportionate part of the expenses of that assessment, should be assessed upon and apportioned among the lots upon which the former assessment had not been paid. The court of appeals sustained the act. [Spencer v. Merchant], 100 N. Y. 585. In delivering the opinion of that court, Judge Finch said:

"The act of 1881 determines absolutely and conclusively the amount of tax to be raised, and the property to be assessed and upon which it is to be apportioned. Each of these things was within the power of the legislature whose action cannot be reviewed in the courts upon the ground that it acted unjustly or without appropriate and adequate reason. . . . The legislature may commit the ascertainment of the sum to be raised and of the benefited district to commissioners, but is not bound to do so, and may settle both questions for itself; and when it does so its action is necessarily conclusive and beyond review. Here an improvement has been ordered and made; the expense of which might justly have been imposed upon adjacent property benefited by the change. By the act of 1881, the legislature imposes the unpaid portion of the cost and expense with the interest thereon upon that portion of the property benefited which has thus far borne none of the burden. In so doing it necessarily determines two things, viz., the amount to be realized, and the property specially benefited by the expenditure of that amount. The lands might have been benefited by the improvement, and so the legislative determination that they were, and to what amount or proportion of the cost, even if it may have been mistakenly unjust, is not open to our review. The question of special benefit and the property to which it extends is of neces-54]sity a question of fact, and *when the legislature determines it in a case within its general power, its decision must of course be final. . . . The precise wrong of which complaint is made appears to be that the landowners now assessed never had opportunity to be heard as to the original apportionment, and find themselves now practically bound by it as between their lots and those of the owners who paid. But that objection becomes a criticism upon the action of the legislature and the process by which it determined the amount to be raised and the property to be assessed. Unless by special permission that is a hearing never granted in the process of taxation. The legislature determines expenditures and amounts to be raised for their payment, the whole discussion and all questions of prudence and propriety and justice being confided to its jurisdiction. It may err, but the courts cannot review its discretion. In this case, it kept within its power when it fixed, first, the amount to be raised to discharge the improvement debt incurred by its direction; and, second, when it designated the lots and property which, in its judgment, by reason of special benefits should bear the burden; and, having the power, we cannot criticise the reasons or manner of its action."

The case was brought to this court, and, under the style of Spencer v. Merchant, is reported in 125 U. S. 345 [31: 763]. The reasoning of the court of appeals was quoted and approved, and its judgment, sustaining the constitutionality of the act in question, was affirmed.

In Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701 [28: 569], the distinction between a tax or assessment imposed by a direct exercise of the legislative power, calling for no inquiry into the weight of evidence, nor for anything in the nature of judicial examination, and a tax or assessment imposed upon property according to its value to be ascertained by assessors upon evidence, was pointed out, and it was held that in the former case no notice to the owner is required, but that in the latter case the officers, in estimating the value, act judicially, and notice and an opportunity to be heard are necessary. In giving the opinion of the court it was said by Mr. Justice Field: "Of 55]the different kinds of taxes which the *state may impose, there is a vast number of which, from their nature, no notice can be given to the taxpayer, nor would notice be of any possible advantage to him,—such as poll taxes, license taxes, . . . and, generally, specific taxes on things or persons or occupations. In such cases the legislature, in authorizing the tax, fixes its amount, and that is the end of the matter. If the tax be not paid, the property of the delinquent may be sold and he be thus deprived of his property. Yet there can be no question that the proceeding is due process of law, as there is no inquiry into the weight of evidence, or other element of a judicial nature, and nothing could be changed by hearing the taxpayer. No right of his is, therefore, invaded."

Similar views have prevailed in most of the state courts, but, instead of citing the cases, we shall content ourselves with referring to the conclusions reached by two text-writers of high authority.

In Cooley on Taxation, p. 447, the following conclusions, from many cases, are stated:

"1. The major part of the cost of a local work is sometimes collected by general tax, while a smaller portion is levied upon the estates specially benefited.

"2 The major part is sometimes assessed on estates benefited, while the general public is taxed a smaller portion in consideration of a smaller participation in the benefits.

"3. The whole cost in other cases is levied on lands in the immediate vicinity of the work.

"In a constitutional point of view either of these methods is admissible, and one may be sometimes just, and another at other times. In other cases it may be deemed reasonable to make the whole cost a general charge, and levy no special assessment whatever. The question is legislative, and, like all legislative questions, may be decided erroneously; but it is reasonable to expect that, with such latitude of choice, the tax will be more just and equal than it would be were the legislature required to levy it by one inflexible and arbitrary rule."

In Dillon's Municipal Corporations, vol. 2, § 752, 4th ed., the conclusions reached are thus expressed:

*"The courts are very generally agreed [ that the authority to require the property specially benefited to bear the expense of local improvements is a branch of the taxing power, or included within it . . . Whether the expense of making such improvements shall be paid out of the general treasury, or be assessed upon the abutting property or other property specially benefited, and, if in the latter mode, whether the assessment shall be upon all property found to be benefited, or alone upon the abutters, according to frontage or according to the area of their lots, is, according to the present weight of authority, considered to be a question of legislative expediency."

It is well settled, by repeated decisions of this court, that the power of Congress to exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatever within the District includes the power of taxation. Loughborough v. Blake, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 317 [5: 98]; Willard v. Presbury, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 676 [20: 719]; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 282 [37: 170]; Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 548 [42: 270]; Wilson v. Lambert, 168 U. S. 611 [ante, 599].

Our conclusion is that it was competent for Congress to create a general system to store water and furnish it to the inhabitants of the District, and to prescribe the amount of the assessment and the method of its collection; and that the plaintiff in error cannot be heard to complain that he was not notified of the creation of such a system or consulted as to the probable cost thereof. He is presumed to have notice of these general laws regulating such matters.

The power conferred upon the Commissioners was not to make assessments upon abutting properties, nor to give notice to the property owners of such assessments, but to determine the question of the propriety and necessity of laying water mains and water pipes, and of erecting fire plugs and hydrants, and their bona fide exercise of such a power cannot be reviewed by the courts.

Another complaint urged is that the assessment exceeded the actual cost of the work, and this is supposed to be shown by the fact that the expense of putting down this particular main was less than the amount raised by the as-57] sessment. *But this objection overlooks the fact that the laying of this main was part of the water system, and that the assessment prescribed was not merely to put down the pipes, but to raise a fund to keep the system in efficient repair. The moneys raised beyond the expense of laying the pipe are not paid into the general treasury of the District, but are set aside to maintain and repair the system; and there is no such disproportion between the amount assessed and the actual cost as to show any abuse of legislative power.

A similar objection was disposed of by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts in the case of Inhabitants of Leominster v. Conant, 139 Mass. 384. In that case the validity of an assessment for a sewer was denied because the amount of the assessment exceeded the cost of the sewer; but the court held that the legislation in question had created a sewer system, and that it was lawful to make assessments by a uniform rate which had been determined upon for the sewerage territory.

In Hyde Park v. Spencer, 118 Ill. 446, and other cases, the supreme court of Illinois held that a statutory assessment to defray the cost, maintenance, and keeping in repair of a drainage system, was valid.

The other contentions made on behalf of the plaintiff in error are covered by the observations already made.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is accordingly affirmed.

Federal question—power of this court—contracts affecting public welfare—contract between a city and a railroad to construct a viaduct—police power—due process of law.

1. A Federal question is raised by an unsuccessful contention in a state court that the obligations of a contract have been impaired by state statute and ordinances.
2. This court, when reviewing a state judgment upholding a state enactment alleged to be in violation of the contract clause of the Constitution, will determine for itself the existence or nonexistence of the alleged contract, and whether its obligation has been impaired by the state enactment.
3. Contracts which affect the safety and welfare of the public are within the supervising power and control of the legislature when exercised to protect the public safety, health, or morals.
4. A contract between a city and a railroad company to participate in the construction of a viaduct in view of their mutual duty to the public is not violated by a statute and ordinance compelling the railroad company to repair it.
5. The maintenance of a safe viaduct over railroad tracks at an important street crossing in a populous city cannot be taken out of the police power of the legislature by contract between the city and railroad company.
6. An apportionment by ordinance, of the repairs to a railroad viaduct between railroad companies, without notice to them, is not without due process of law, when they have opportunity to, and do in fact, put in issue the validity of the ordinance and the reasonableness of the apportionment.

Argued January 10, 11, 1898. Decided April 11, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Nebraska to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District of Nebraska in favor of the plaintiff, the state of Nebraska, on the relation of the City of Omaha, against the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company for a peremptory mandamus requiring the defendant company to make repairs upon a viaduct in the city of Omaha. There was also motion to dismiss. Judgment affirmed.

See same case below, 47 Neb. 549.

Statement by Mr. Justice Shiras:

The state of Nebraska on the relation of the city of Omaha filed its petition in the district court of the fourth judicial district of Nebraska on January 19, 1895, asking judgment for the issuing of a writ of mandamus requiring the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company to repair, in accordance with the directions of a city ordinance enacted under certain statutes of the state legislature, the south one third of the viaduct at Eleventh street in the city of Omaha, a structure forming a part of that street and spanning a number of railroad tracks, one of which was owned and used by the said company, the others being owned by the Union Pacific Railway Company and used by it and two other companies. The defendant filed its answer on March 6, 1895, alleging therein, amongst other things, that the legislature of Nebraska had no *power to [59 impose upon the defendant the duty of maintaining or repairing the viaduct, for the reason that to do so would be in violation of the obligations of the contract, hereinafter described, under which the viaduct was constructed, and contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. At the trial of the case evidence was adduced by both parties, but there was substantially no dispute respecting the facts, the controversy having relation only to the validity, interpretation, and effect of legislative enactments and to the validity of city ordinances. On May 1, 1895, the court entered judgment in favor of the city, and directed that a peremptory writ of mandamus issue to the defendant company, commanding and requiring it to make the repairs in question, the same to be commenced immediately and carried forward without unnecessary delay. The defendant, having been denied a new trial, took the case on writ of error to the supreme court of the state, and, upon the affirmance by that court of the judgment of the said district court, sued out a writ of error bringing the case here, alleging in its assignment of errors that the statutes of Nebraska, which were held by the supreme court of that state to be valid, and to require the company to make the said repairs, were repugnant to the Constitution of the United States because they impaired the obligation of contracts, abridged the company's privileges and immunities, deprived it of its property without due process of law, and denied to it the equal protection of the laws, and that the judgment enforcing those statutes was therefore erroneous.

The facts presented are substantially as follows:

The defendant company is a corporation of the state of Illinois, has complied with the laws of the state of Nebraska so as to be authorized to do business as a railroad company in that state, and maintains a general office therein, and is the grantee of and successor to the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska, a corporation of the state of Nebraska, which company was the lessee of the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company, a corporation organized in the year 1869 under chapter 25, Revised Statutes of Nebraska [60] of 1866. *That chapter contains, among other provisions, the following:

"Sec. 83. If it shall be necessary, in the location of any part of any railroad, to occupy any road, street, alley, or public way or ground of any kind, or any part thereof, it shall be competent for the municipal or other corporation or public officer or public authorities owning or having charge thereof, and the railroad company, to agree upon the manner, and upon the terms and conditions upon which the same may be used or occupied; and if said parties shall be unable to agree thereon, and it shall be necessary, in the judgment of the directors of such railroad company, to use or occupy such road, street, alley, or other public way or ground, such company may appropriate so much of the same as may be necessary for the purposes of such road, in the same manner and upon the same terms as is provided for the appropriation of the property of individuals by the eighty-first section of this chapter. . . . Sec. 86. Any railroad company may construct and carry their railroad across, over, or under any road, railroad, canal, stream, or watercourse, when it may be necessary in the construction of the same; and in such cases said corporation shall so construct their railroad crossings as not necessarily to impede the travel, transportation, or navigation upon the road, railroad, canal, stream, or watercourse so crossed. . . . Sec 103. Every railroad corporation shall maintain and keep in good repair all bridges with their abutments which such corporation shall construct, for the purpose of enabling their road to pass over or under any turnpike, road, canal, watercourse, or other way."

On May 14, 1884, an ordinance of the city of Omaha was approved, granting to the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company the right of way through portions of certain streets and alleys, including Eleventh street, in that city. The ordinance was in part as follows:

"Said Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate a line of railroad along, upon, through, and across said portions of said streets and alleys as a part of its line; Provided, that said *railroad track and tracks [61] are constructed so as to conform to the grade of said street as near as may be, and so as to interfere as little as possible with the travel along and upon said streets; and, provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed as interfering with the right of any property owner to recover from said company any damages resulting to private property by reason of the construction of said railroad, and nothing herein granted shall authorize any interference with the tracks of the Union Pacific Railway Company now laid and operated by said Union Pacific Railway Company in any portions of the streets and alleys herein named and enumerated."

On March 4, 1885, an act of the legislature of Nebraska was approved, entitled "An Act to Provide for Viaducts, Bridges, and Tunnels in Certain Cases, in Cities of the First Class;" whereby it was provided that the mayor and city council of any city of the first class should have power, whenever they deemed any such improvement necessary for the safety and convenience of the public, to engage and aid in the construction of any viaduct or bridge over or tunnel under any railroad track or tracks, switch or switches, in such cities, when such track or switches crossed or occupied any street, alley, or highway thereof, in the manner and extent provided for in the act; and should have the power to pass any or all ordinances, not in conflict with the act, that might be necessary or proper for the construction, maintenance and protection of the said works.

By virtue of this act the city of Omaha, which was then a city of the first class, and the Union Pacific Railway Company and the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company, the lessor of the defendant company, executed an agreement in writing February 1, 1886, providing, amongst other things, for the construction of a viaduct on Eleventh street across the tracks of those companies The agreement was in part as follows:

"That the said parties of the second part, [the Union Pacific Railway Company and the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company], in 62] pursuance of the provisions of an act *of the legislature of the state of Nebraska, entitled 'An Act to Provide for Viaducts, Bridges, and Tunnels in Certain Cases, in Cities of the First Class,' do hereby assume and agree to pay as may be required by the mayor and city council of said city three fifths of the entire cost of constructing a viaduct along Eleventh street and three fifths of the damages to abutting property on account of the construction of such viaduct not otherwise provided for by waivers or private contributions, such entire costs and damages not to exceed the sum of ninety thousand dollars ($90,000), the amount so assumed and agreed to be paid being three fifths of the entire cost and damages, to be proportioned between said parties of the second part, as follows: Three fourths thereof to be paid by said Union Pacific Railway Company and one fourth thereof to be paid by said Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company. . . . The plans and specifications for said viaducts, before contracts for the construction thereof are entered into, shall be submitted and approved by said parties of the second part, and should plans and specifications be adopted by said party of the first part, and approved by said party of the second part, which shall increase the said cost and damages beyond the amounts herein limited, then the said parties of the second part are to pay their respective proportions of said increased cost and damages, in the same manner and according to the same division as hereinbefore agreed."

Under the provisions of this agreement the viaduct was built, and in 1887 it was opened to the use of the public. On March 30 of that year, a short time before the viaduct was completed, an act of the legislature was approved, entitled "An Act to Incorporate Metropolitan Cities, Defining, Regulating, and Prescribing Their Duties, Powers, and Government" The act, which took effect from its passage, declared that all cities in the state of Nebraska then having a population of 60,000 inhabitants or more according to the state census of 1885, and all cities in the state which should thereafter have a population of 60,000 inhabitants or more, should be considered and known as cities of the metropolitan class, and should be governed by the provisions of the act. Chap. 10, Laws 63]of *Nebraska 1887. At that time the city of Omaha, according to the state census of 1885, had a population in excess of the said number, and under the act was incorporated a city of the metropolitan class. Section 48 of this act, as amended by an act approved in 1893 (chap. 3, Laws of Nebraska 1893), is as follows:

"Sec. 48. The mayor and council shall have power to require any railroad company or companies, owning or operating any railroad track or tracks upon or across any public street or streets of the city, to erect, construct, reconstruct, complete, and keep in repair any viaduct or viaducts, upon or along such street or streets, and over or under such track or tracks, including the approaches to such viaduct or viaducts, as may be deemed and declared by the mayor and council necessary for the safety and protection of the public. Whenever any such viaduct shall be deemed and declared by ordinance necessary for the safety and protection of the public, the mayor and council shall provide for appraising, assessing, and determining the damages, if any, which may be caused to any property by reason of the construction of such viaduct and its approaches.

"The proceedings for such purpose shall be the same as provided herein for the purpose of determining damages to property owners by reason of the change of grade of a street, and such damages shall be paid by the city, and may be assessed by the city council against property benefited.

"The width, height, and strength of any such viaduct, and approaches thereto, the material therefor, and the manner of the construction thereof, shall be as required by the board of public works, as may be approved by the mayor and council.

"When two or more railroad companies own or operate separate lines of track to be crossed by any such viaduct, the proportion thereof, and the approaches thereto, to be constructed by each, or the cost to be borne by each, shall be determined by the mayor and council.

"It shall be the duty of any railroad company or companies, upon being required as herein provided, to erect, construct, reconstruct, *or repair any viaduct, to proceed [64 within the time and in the manner required by the mayor and council, to erect, construct, reconstruct, or repair the same, and it shall be a misdemeanor for any railroad company or companies, to fail, neglect, or refuse to perform such duty, and upon conviction any such company or companies shall be fined one hundred dollars ($100), and each day any such company or companies shall fail, neglect, or refuse to perform such duty shall be deemed and held to be a separate and distinct offense, and in addition to the penalty herein provided any such company or companies shall be compelled by mandamus or other appropriate proceeding to erect, construct, reconstruct, or repair any viaduct as may be required by ordinance as herein provided. The mayor and council shall also have power whenever any railroad company or companies shall fail, neglect, or refuse to erect, construct, reconstruct, or repair any viaduct or viaducts, after having been required so to do as herein provided, to proceed with the erection, construction, reconstruction, or repair of such viaduct or viaducts by contract or in such other manner as may be provided by ordinance, and assess the cost of the erection, construction, reconstruction, or repair of such viaduct or viaducts against the property of the railroad company or companies required to erect, construct, reconstruct, or repair the same, and such cost shall be a valid and subsisting lien against such property, and shall also be a legal indebtedness of said company or companies in favor of such city, and may be enforced and collected by suit in the proper court."

In May, 1890, the Union Pacific Railway

Company, which now owns twenty one tracks crossing Eleventh street beneath the said viaduct, entered into agreements with the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company and the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company, by the terms of which agreements it granted to those companies the right to possess and use, in common with itself, its main and passing tracks between certain points, which tracks are among the said twenty-one tracks, for the period of 999 years. Subsequently, in that year, the said companies 65] entered *into possession of the interests granted them, and have since continued to use the said tracks in common with their grantor.

By a concurrent resolution of the city council of Omaha, adopted July 21, 1892, it was provided that the city engineer and the committee on viaducts and railways should examine the roadbed of the said viaduct and report whether or not it was necessary to repave it. Acting under this resolution the committee made an examination, and on the 23d of the following month reported in writing that both the roadway and sidewalk of the viaduct were in a dangerous condition. By authority of the city, the viaduct was closed to general public travel sometime in 1892, but continued to be used by a street-railway company, whose tracks were laid across it, until the autumn of 1894, since which time the city has not permitted it to be used for any travel.

By an ordinance approved December 12, 1893, the city declared the necessity of repairing the viaduct, and empowered and directed the board of public works to prepare plans and specifications for the repairs. Such plans and specifications were thereafter prepared, and were submitted to the council December 15, 1893, by the board of public works and the city engineer, and on January 30, 1894, the council passed an ordinance, No. 3752, approved February 3, 1894, which is as follows:

"An Ordinance Approving the Plans and Specifications Submitted by the Board of Public Works for the Repairing of the Eleventh Street Viaduct over the Railroad Tracks and Ordering the Repairing of Said Viaduct to Be Done.

"Whereas, it has been and hereby is deemed and declared necessary for the safety and protection of the public that the Eleventh street viaduct be repaired as herein required; and

"Whereas, it is right, proper, and reasonable that the railroad companies owning or operating railway tracks across said Eleventh street should make said repairs to said viaduct; therefore "Be it ordained by the City Council of the City of Omaha: Section 1, That the plans and specifications submitted by the board of public works of the city of Omaha, December 15, 1893, 66]*for the repairs of the Eleventh street viaduct over the railroad tracks, upon and across Eleventh street, from a point near Jackson street to a point near Mason street, in the city of Omaha, as prepared by the city engineer of said city, be and the same are hereby approved and adopted.

"Sec. 2. That the Union Pacific Railway Company be and is hereby ordered, directed, and required to repair that portion of said Eleventh street viaduct from the north end of said viaduct south for a distance of two thirds of the entire length of said viaduct; and the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company, grantee and successor to the Missouri River Railroad Company, in Nebraska, and the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company, be and is hereby ordered, directed, and required to repair that portion of said Eleventh street viaduct commencing at the south end thereof, and extending northward a distance of one third of the entire length of said viaduct; the said repairs to be made in accordance with said plans and specifications, and to be done under the supervision of the city engineer; the said repairs to be commenced without unnecessary delay and fully completed, as herein required, within ninety days from the passage and approval of this ordinance.

"Sec. 3. That the city clerk be and is hereby directed to furnish to said Union Pacific Railway Company and to said Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company, owning or operating railroad tracks upon and across said Eleventh street under said Eleventh street viaduct, a duly certified copy of this ordinance, without unnecessary delay, and that the city engineer is hereby directed to furnish to each of said railroad companies a copy of said plans and specifications, and to superintend the work of making said repairs.

"Sec. 4. That this ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

Certified copies of this ordinance and of the said plans and specifications were furnished to the defendant company, but it refused to make the said repairs, or to take any action with reference to making the same. Wherefore the present proceeding was instituted as aforesaid.

Messrs. Charles J. Greene and Ralph W. Breckenridge for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. J. Connell for defendant in error.

Mr Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion to dismiss the writ of error, on the ground that the rights and immunities of the plaintiff in error under the Constitution of the United States were not set up or claimed in the state courts at the proper time and in the proper way, cannot be allowed.

This subject has been so frequently and so recently discussed by this court that it is unnecessary for us to further consider it at large. It is sufficient to say that this record discloses that the plaintiff in error, in its answer to the writ of mandamus issued out of the district court of Douglas county, state of Nebraska, claimed that by reason of certain provisions of its charter, of general laws of the state, and of ordinances of the city of Omaha, all of which were specifically set forth, a contract was created between the plaintiff in error and said city in respect to the viaduct in question, the obligations whereof would be violated by the proposed enforcement of the subsequent act 1887, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States; that the district court held that the laws and ordinances so pleaded did not create a contract between the state and city on the one side and the plaintiff in error on the other;

that the plaintiff in error in its petition in error to the supreme court of the state, specifically assigned as error the holding of the trial court, that the said laws, charter, and ordinances did not constitute a contract within the meaning and protection of the Constitution of the United States, guaranteeing the inviolability of contracts; and that the supreme court of the state, in its opinion disposing of the case, states that "the most important subject of inquiry is presented by respondent's contention that the ordinance under which the 68] city proceeded in ordering *the repairs in question contemplates the taking of its property without due process of law within the meaning of the state and Federal Constitutions, and also impairs the obligation of the contract under which its track was laid and under which said viaduct was constructed."

We think it is plain, from this recital, that a Federal question was specifically presented in both the trial and supreme court of the state.

As the record further discloses that the state supreme court overruled the railroad company's contention that it held an existing contract whose obligation would be violated by the enforcement of the provisions of a subsequent law of the state, it becomes the duty of this court to inquire whether there was error in that judgment of the supreme court of the state.

We have often had occasion to say that this court, when reviewing the final judgment of a state court upholding a state enactment alleged to be in violation of the contract clause of the Constitution, possesses paramount authority to determine for itself the existence or the nonexistence of the contract set up, and whether its obligation has been impaired by the state enactment. Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 436 [17: 173]; Mississippi & M. Railroad Co. v. Rock, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 177 [18: 381]; New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Ref. Co. 125 U. S. 18 [31: 607]; Mobile & Ohio Railroad Co. v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 492 [38: 796].

We shall proceed, therefore, to examine whether the statutes and ordinances to which the plaintiff in error points us constituted a contract within the protection of the Constitution of the United States, and whether such contract, if found to exist, has been impaired by the subsequent statute and the proceedings thereunder.

The contract, which the plaintiff in error sets up as constitutionally protected from subsequent legislation, is alleged to be found in the act of March 4, 1885, and the agreement in compliance with the provisions of that act between the city of Omaha, the Union Pacific Railway Company, and the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company on the 1st day of February, 1886.

69] *By the provisions of the act the mayor and city council in any city of the first class were authorized, whenever they deemed it necessary for the safety and convenience of the public, to engage and aid in the construction of any viaduct, or bridge over, or tunnel under any railroad track or tracks, switch or switches, in such cities, when such tracks or switches cross or occupy any street, alley, or highway thereof; to adopt and secure plans and specifications therefor, together with the estimated cost of the work, and thereupon, if the railroad company or companies, across whose tracks or switches the work is proposed to be built, will assume three fifths of all damages to abutting property on account of the construction of said viaduct, bridge, or tunnel, and secure to the city the payment of the necessary funds to meet it as the work progresses, in such manner and with such security as the mayor and city council shall require; and when the payment of the further sum of one fifth of the money required for said improvement is arranged for in manner satisfactory to said mayor and council, either by private donations or by execution of such good and sufficient bonds as will protect said city from the payment of said one fifth, then the said mayor and council may proceed to contract with the necessary party or parties for the construction of such viaduct, bridge, or tunnel, under the supervision of the board of public works of such city, and to provide for the payment of one fifth of the cost thereof by the city, by special tax on all taxable property in such city, and one fifth by special tax on property benefited. It was further provided that the city, with the assent of the railroad company or companies aiding in the construction of any such viaduct, bridge, or tunnel, may permit any street railway company to build its street-railway track and operate its railway upon or through the same, upon such terms and conditions and for such compensation as shall be agreed upon between the city and the street-railway company; and that the compensation for such use shall be set apart and used towards the maintenance of such viaduct, bridge, or tunnel; and it was further provided that the mayor and council of any such city should have the power to pass any and all ordinances, *not in conflict [70 with the act, that might be necessary or proper for the construction, maintenance, and protection of the works provided for.

The agreement made in pursuance of the said act, between the city of Omaha, as party of the first part, and the Union Pacific Railway Company and the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company, as parties of the second part, provided that the parties of the second part assumed and agreed to pay, as should be required by the mayor and city council, three fifths of the entire cost of constructing such viaduct along Eleventh street in said city over the railroad tracks of the said second parties, and three fifths of the damages to abutting property on account of the construction of such viaduct, not otherwise provided for by waivers or private contributions, such entire cost and damages not to exceed the sum of $90,000; and that the amount so assumed and agreed to be paid, being three fifths of the entire cost and damages, was to be apportioned between the railroad companies, so that three fourths thereof should be paid by the Union Pacific Railway Company and one fourth by the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company.

Under this agreement the viaduct was built and finally opened to the use of the public early in the year 1887.

By an act approved March 30, 1887 (Laws of Nebraska 1887, p. 105), entitled "An Act Incorporating Metropolitan Cities, and Defining, Regulating, and Prescribing Their Duties, Powers, and Government," it was, among other things, provided as follows: "The mayor and council shall have power to require any railroad company or companies, owning or operating any railroad track or tracks upon or across any public street or streets of the city, to erect, construct, reconstruct, complete, and keep in repair any viaduct or viaducts upon or along such street or streets and over or under such track or tracks, including the approaches to such viaduct or viaducts, as may be deemed and declared by the mayor and council necessary for the safety and protection of the public. . . . When two or more railroad companies own or operate separate lines of track to be 71]crossed by any such viaduct, *the proportion thereof, and of the approaches thereto, to be constructed by each, or the cost to be borne by each, shall be determined by the mayor and council. After the completion of any such viaduct, any revenue derived therefrom by the crossing thereon of street-railway lines or otherwise shall constitute a special fund, and shall be applied in making repairs to such viaduct. All ordinary repairs to any such viaduct or to the approaches thereto shall be paid out of such fund, or shall be borne by the city."

In 1893 another act was passed (Laws of Nebraska 1893, p. 70) amending the act of 1887, and making it the duty of any railroad company or companies to erect, construct, or repair any viaduct in the manner required by the mayor and council, providing a penalty for neglect or refusal to perform such duty, and prescribing a proceeding by mandamus to compel the companies to erect or repair any viaduct as may be required by ordinance, and empowering the city, in case of failure or refusal by the railroad companies, itself to do the necessary work, the cost thereof to be a charge and lien upon the property of the railroad companies, and also to be a legal indebtedness of the companies, collectible by suit in the proper court. On January 30, 1894, the city council passed an ordinance requiring the Union Pacific Railway Company to repair that portion of the said Eleventh street viaduct for a distance of two thirds of the entire length of the viaduct, and the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company, as grantee and successor of the Omaha & Southwestern Railroad Company, to repair the other one-third portion of said viaduct, said repairs to be made in accordance with plans furnished by the city and under the supervision of the city engineer, and to be completed within ninety days. And upon the refusal of the companies to comply with said ordinance separate proceedings in mandamus were brought against them.

No doubt the agreement of 1886 constituted a contract, in such a sense that the respective parties thereto continued to be bound by its provisions so long as the legislation, in virtue of which it was entered into, remained unchanged. While the agreement lasted its pro-72] visions defined the rights and duties *of the city and the railroad companies. But was it a contract whose continuance and operation could not be affected or controlled by subsequent legislation?

Usually, where a contract, not contrary to public policy, has been entered into between parties competent to contract, it is not within the power of either party to withdraw from its terms without the consent of the other; and the obligation of such a contract is constitutionally protected from hostile legislation. Where, however, the respective parties are not private persons, dealing with matters and things in which the public has no concern, but are persons or corporations whose rights and powers were created for public purposes, by legislative acts, and where the subject matter of the contract is one which affects the safety and welfare of the public, other principles apply. Contracts of the latter description are held to be within the supervising power and control of the legislature when exercised to protect the public safety, health, and morals, and that clause of the Federal Constitution which protects contracts from legislative action cannot in every case be successfully invoked. The presumption is that when such contracts are entered into it is with the knowledge that parties cannot, by making agreements on subjects involving the rights of the public, withdraw such subjects from the police power of the legislature.

We do not, indeed, understand that these principles are questioned on behalf of the plaintiff in error. What is claimed is that the subject-matter of the contract in question does not fall within the range of the police power of the state. It is argued that "while it may be true that a viaduct over railroad tracks located across a public street may be essential to the public safety, it does not follow that a legislative enactment impairing the obligation of an existing contract is necessary to secure its construction and maintenance, and that any attempt upon behalf of the state to establish a viaduct through such legislation, however necessary the viaduct itself may be to the public safety, would be an invasion of the Federal jurisdiction unless adopted under the compulsion of state necessity; that while it is not questioned that the *maintenance of the viaduct[73 is essential to the safety of the community, yet if existing contract obligations devolve this burden upon the city, the legislature of the state cannot, under the plea of public necessity, pass a law imposing it upon the plaintiff in error, without bringing the act within the prohibitions of the Federal Constitution."

Before considering this proposition it is proper to observe that it proceeds upon the assumption that, by the agreement between the parties in the present case, the duty of repairing and maintaining the viaduct was put upon the city. But an examination of the terms of the contract fails to show that this assumption is well founded. Certainly there is therein no express provision or stipulation that, after the viaduct had been constructed, its future repair and maintenance should be at the cost of the city. It is, however, contended that, as the viaduct when constructed became a part of Eleventh street, and as the law implies a duty on the city to keep its streets in a safe condition, such a duty entered into this contract as a part thereof, and therefore the city by the execution of the contract became bound to keep the viaduct in repair. On the other side, however, it was equally made the duty of the railroad company by the statute of Nebraska under which this agreement was made "to maintain and keep in good repair all bridges, with their abutments, which such corporation shall construct for the purpose of enabling their road to pass over or under any turnpike, road, canal, watercourse, or other way."

While, therefore, it is the equal duty of the city and of the railroad company to guard the safety of the public by the erection and maintenance of a proper crossing or viaduct, it does not follow that, in the absence of an express agreement to that effect, such a duty is, by implication of law, devolved upon one party to the relief of the other. Indeed, the contract in question shows that, in consideration of their mutual duty to the public, the parties participated in the expense of the construction of the viaduct; and it would seem to be a reasonable implication that there should be a common obligation to keep it in repair.

However this may be, we think that, in view [74] of the *paramount duty of the legislature to secure the safety of the community at an important crossing within a populous city, it was and is within its power to supervise, control, and change such agreements as may be, from time to time, entered into between the city and the railroad company, in respect to such crossing, saving any rights previously vested. Any other view involves the proposition that it is competent for the city and the railroad company, by entering into an agreement between themselves, to withdraw the subject from the reach of the police power, and to substitute their views of the public necessities for those of the legislature.

This subject has been so often considered by this court that it seems needless to here enlarge upon it. It is sufficient to cite a few of the cases. Boston Beer Co v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25 [24: 989]; Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659 [24: 1036]; New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Louisiana Light Co. 115 U S. 650 [29: 516]; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623 [31: 205].

In New York & New England R. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556 [38: 269], the subject was elaborately considered, and it was there held that an act of the state of Connecticut relating to railway crossings, being directed to the extinction of grade crossings as a menace to public safety, was a proper exercise of the police power of the state; that there is no unjust discrimination and no denial of the equal protection of the laws, in regulations regarding railroads, which are applicable to all railroads alike; and that the imposition upon a railroad corporation of the entire expense of a change of grade at a highway crossing is no violation of the Constitution of the United States, if the statute imposing it provides for an ascertainment of the result in a mode suited to the nature of the case. It is true that in that case there was a provision in the charter of the railroad company, reserving a right to the legislature to alter and amend the same; but this court based its reasoning and conclusion entirely upon the police power of the state. The following language of the supreme court of Connecticut was quoted with approval: "The act, in scope and purpose, concerns protection of life. Neither in intent nor fact does it increase or diminish the assets either of the city or of the *railroad corporations. It is the ex- [75] ercise of the governmental power and duty to secure a safe highway. The legislature having determined that the intersection of two railways with a highway in the city of Hartford at grade is a nuisance dangerous to life, in the absence of action on the part either of the city or of the railroads, may compel them severally to become the owners of the right to lay out new highways and new railways over such land and in such manner as will separate the grade of the railways from that of the highway at intersection; may compel them to use the right for the accomplishment of the desired end; may determine that the expense shall be paid by either corporation alone or in part by both; and may enforce obedience to its judgment."

Wabash Railroad Company v. Defiance, 167 U. S. 88 [42: 87], was a case much like the present one. It was there held, affirming the supreme court of Ohio, that the legislative power of a city may control the question of grades and crossings of its streets, and a power to that effect, when duly exercised by ordinances, will override any license or consent previously given, by which the control of a certain street had been surrendered; that such matters cannot, from their public nature, be made the subject of a final and irrevocable contract.

Another ground of complaint is that the act in question delegates to the municipality authority, in cases where two or more railway companies own or operate tracks across public streets, to impose the cost and expense of constructing and maintaining viaducts over the same upon either or any of such companies, and that the city ordinance, in execution of such authority, imposes upon two of the four companies named in the record the entire expense of the repairs in question, and this is said to deny the plaintiff in error the equal protection of the law.

It is true that, by virtue of agreements between the Union Pacific Railway Company and the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railroad Company and the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railroad Company, the latter two companies were using certain tracks belonging to the former which were under said viaduct. But it is not easy to see why the *plaintiff [76] in error can complain that the city omitted to bring those companies in as parties. The nature and extent of their rights under the agreements with the Union Pacific Railway Company do not appear, and, for aught that is disclosed in this record, it may have been a feature of those agreements that the Union Pacific should protect them from any charge or exaction of the kind in question.

Again, it is said that the apportionment made by the ordinance of the extent of the repairs, one third to the plaintiff in error and two thirds to the Union Pacific Railway Company, was arbitrary, without notice, and contrary to plain principles of justice and equality.

But if, as we have seen, it would have been competent for the legislature to have put the burden of these repairs upon one of the parties, or to have apportioned them among the parties, as it saw fit, so it may make a due apportionment through the instrumentality of the city council. The latter was not directed to proceed judicially, but to exercise a legally delegated discretion.

In State v. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. 33 Kan. 176, the power of the city of Atchison to compel the respondents to construct viaducts was sustained under legislation similar to that herein involved, and referring to the subject of notice, the court, per Judge Valentine, said: "We do not think that it is necessary that the city should have given the railroad companies notice before passing the ordinance requiring them to construct the viaduct. Notice afterward, with an opportunity on the part of the railroad company to contest the validity of the ordinance and the right of the city to compel them to construct the viaduct, is sufficient."

New York Health Department v. Trinity Church, 145 N. Y. 32 [27 L. R. A. 710], was the case of an action to recover a penalty under a statute requiring all tenement houses to be supplied with water on each floor occupied or intended to be occupied by one or more families, whenever so directed by the board of health. The statute made no provision for notice to property holders, and none in fact was given, while it was admitted that it would cost the respondent a considerable sum of money to comply with the order of the board. 77] *In the opinion of the court, per Peckham, J., it was said: "The legislature has power, and has exercised it in countless instances, to enact general laws upon the subject of the public health or safety without providing that the parties who are to be affected by those laws shall first be heard before they shall take effect in a particular case. . . . The fact that the legislature has chosen to delegate a certain portion of its power to the board of health . . . would not alter the principle, nor would it be necessary to provide that the board shall give notice and afford a hearing to the owner before it made such order. . . . Laws and regulations of a police nature, though they may disturb the enjoyment of individual rights, are not unconstitutional, though no provision is made for compensation for such disturbances. They do not appropriate private property for public use, but simply regulate its use and enjoyment by the owner. If he suffer injury, it is either damnum absque injuria, or, in the theory of the law, he is compensated for it by sharing in the general benefits which the regulations are intended and calculated to secure."

So, in the present case, while no notice may have been given to the railroad companies of the pendency of the ordinance, and while they may not have been invited to participate in the proposed legislation, yet they had an opportunity to, and did in fact, put in issue, by the answer, both the validity of the ordinance and the reasonableness of the amount apportioned to them respectively for the repair of the viaduct in question.

The validity of the statute and of the ordinance having been passed upon and upheld by the courts of the state, it is not the function of this court, apart from the provisions of the Federal Constitution supposed to be involved, to declare state enactments void, because they seem doubtful in policy and may inflict hardships in particular instances.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Nebraska is accordingly affirmed.

The CHIEF JUSTICE took no part in the hearing and decision of the case.

STATE OF MISSOURI, ex rel. LACLEDE GASLIGHT COMPANY, Plff. in Err., v. MICHAEL J. MURPHY, Street Commissioner of the City of St. Louis, and the City of St. Louis. [78

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 78–100.)

Mandamus—official duty—Federal question—placing electric wires under streets.

1. Mandamus lies to compel a party to do that which it is his duty to do, but can confer no new authority, and the party to be coerced must have the power to perform the act.
2. A court cannot command a city officer to do that which it is not his official duty to perform.
3. A judgment of a state court that the street commissioner of a city has no power under its charter and ordinances to issue a permit to a company to lay electric wires under the streets to light the city does not involve a Federal question, where there is no contract right that leave to do so shall be given by that officer.
4. The right of a company to place electric wires under the streets of a city is subject to such reasonable regulations as the city deems best to make for the public safety and convenience.
5. The exemption of a corporation from requirements inconsistent with its charter as to placing electric wires under streets will not relieve it from submitting itself to such police regulations as the city may lawfully impose.

tition for mandamus in the name of the state of 79]Missouri, on its relation, *against Michael J. Murphy, street commissioner of the city of St. Louis, on November 26, 1894, in the supreme court of that state.

This petition stated that the relator was incorporated by an act of the general assembly of Missouri, approved March 2, 1857, which was amended by an act approved March 3, 1857, and by an act approved March 26, 1868, and set forth the three acts in extenso.

The 5th section of the act of March 2, 1857, read as follows:

Sec. 5. The said company, its successors and assigns, shall, within all that portion of the present corporate limits of the city of St. Louis, in St. Louis county, not embraced within the corporate limits of said city, as established by the act entitled 'An Act to Incorporate the City of St. Louis,' approved February 8, 1839, have and enjoy, during the continuance of this act, the sole and exclusive privilege and right of lighting the same, and of making and vending gas, gaslights, gas fixtures, and of any substance or material that may be now or hereafter used as a substitute therefor; and, to that end, may establish and lay down, in said portion of said corporate limits, all pipes, fixtures, or other thing properly required, in order to do the same (the same to be done with as much despatch and as little inconvenience to the public as possible), and shall also have all other powers necessary to execute and carry out the privileges and powers hereby granted to said company."

The words "sole and exclusive" in the 5th section were stricken out by the act of March 3, 1857. Laws Mo. 1856–57, pp. 598, 599.

Section 1 of the act of March 26, 1868 (amending the act of March 2, 1857), was as follows:

"Sec. 1. The said Laclede Gaslight Company shall and may, within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis, as the same are now or may hereafter be established, exercise, have, hold, and enjoy forever all the rights, privileges, and franchises granted to it by the fifth section of the act to which this act is amendatory, and may, at any time, lease, sell, or dispose of any portion of said rights, privileges, and 80]*franchises to individuals, associations, or corporations intending or desiring to exercise the same within any portion of the limits aforesaid." Laws Mo. 1868, p. 187.

The petition then averred that the act of March 2, 1857, as amended by the subsequent acts, constituted relator's charter, by which relator was granted the privilege and right of lighting the city of St. Louis as in the acts set forth; "and to that end may establish and lay down in any portion of said corporate limits all pipes, fixtures, or other thing properly required in order to do the same, with this limitation only, that in laying down pipes, fixtures, or other thing properly required therefor relator shall do the same with as much despatch and as little inconvenience to the public as possible."

It was further stated that by a certain agreement executed February 28, 1873, relator had "abandoned and surrendered any and all exclusive rights and all claims or pretenses of claims of sole or exclusive privilege or right of lighting any part of the city of St. Louis with gas, or making or vending gas, gaslights, or gas fixtures, and also all exclusive right whatsoever under its said charter."

The petition went on to say that in pursuance of its charter relator had been for a long time engaged in the lighting business, both by gas and electricity; that under a contract with the city it was lighting a part of the public streets and alleys by electricity, and would be obliged to do so for some years to come; that it was furnishing light by means of gas or electricity to a large part of the inhabitants of the city; that in order to fulfil its obligations to the city and the public the company had erected and was maintaining "extensive and costly plants for the manufacture and distribution of gas, as well as for generating and distributing electric currents;" that for distributing gas it had constructed a system of pipes laid under ground, without objection; that for the distribution of electricity it had "hitherto used overhead wire strung upon poles along the streets and alleys of said city," which poles and electric wires had been and are maintained and used by relator without objection by said city or the authorities thereof for the distribution of electricity, as well to furnish *light [81 to private consumers as for the fulfilment by relator of its said contract with said city of St. Louis for the lighting by electricity of certain public streets and alleys thereof; that to effect such distribution it is necessary to transmit through and by means of said wires electric currents of great power which, if and when accidentally diverted, are dangerous to human life and property; that in order to avoid the inconvenience and danger to the public necessarily incident to that method of distributing electric currents, and in order to provide more effective and proper service, relator has made arrangements to lay its wires underground along and under the streets of said city according to approved and practicable plans, and is now ready to do so with as much despatch and as little inconvenience to the public as possible.

It was then stated that Murphy was street commissioner, to whom was committed, under the city charter, "the supervision and control of the streets and alleys of said city and the enforcement of city ordinances relating thereto." And relator averred that, having completed its preparation to carry out the work above indicated, and having given notice to the street commissioner of its intention to do so, the company proceeded, on the 30th day of October, 1894, to begin the work of excavating at a point on the east side of Broadway street in St. Louis, near the corner of Mound street, that point being adjacent to its generating plants, which work was proper and necessary for placing wires underground, when the street commissioner caused the work to be stopped, and notified relator "that he would not allow any part of any street of said city to be excavated for any purpose whatever without a permit previously obtained from him for that purpose as provided by ordinance; and relator states that by § 568, art. 1, chap. 15, of the Revised Ordinance 1887 of said city of St. Louis, it is provided that 'no person shall make or cause to be made any excavation on any public street, highway, or alley, without written permission of the street commissioner so to do, excepting public work under the authority of the water or sewer commissioner, who at the time of ordering any such excavating shall notify the street commissioner of the same.' "

82] *That upon being so notified the company applied to the street commissioner for a permit to make the necessary excavation on Broadway, so that it might place its wires under the street for the purposes indicated. That the officer refused to give the permit asked, whereby, it was alleged, the company, in the exercise of its vested rights, was prevented from laying down in the streets of the city the pipes and fixtures required in the conduct of its business.

That it was the duty of the street commissioner to grant the permit; and, being without other remedy, relator prayed a mandamus against that officer, commanding him to issue a permit to the company to make an excavation along the east side of Broadway street, as near the curb as practicable, and extending from the southeast corner of Mound street to the southeast corner of Olive street and Broadway, in so far as was necessary for the laying of the company's electric wires under ground, "the same to be done with as much despatch and as little inconvenience to the public as possible."

An alternative writ of mandamus having been issued, the street commissioner filed his return thereto, alleging therein that the act of March 26, 1868, was in conflict with paragraph 2 of § 1 of article 8 of the Constitution of Missouri of 1865, because the company did not, within one year from the time the act of March 2, 1857, took effect, organize or commence the transaction of its business; and not until 1873; and that said act was in conflict with § 25, art. 4, of the Constitution of Missouri, because it did not set forth the act or part of act amended at length, as if it were an original act or provision.

That relator had never by any act been granted the franchise to make and vend electricity for any purpose whatever; and that lighting by electricity was wholly unknown March 2, 1857, and March 26, 1868.

"That the relator has heretofore placed its pipes and fixtures beneath the surface of the street on the east side of Broadway, from Mound street to Olive street, and at divers and sundry other places beneath the surface of the streets of the city of St. Louis, for the purpose

83] of transmitting and *vending and supplying gas to consumers in the city of St. Louis; that in order to convey electricity it is necessary to carry the same by means of wires strung on poles above the surface of the streets or by means of wires strung in nonconductive tubes or condults beneath the surface of the streets, and that relator has never acquired from the state of Missouri or the city of St. Louis any right to place such wires above or beneath the streets of said city.

"That it is provided by § 2721 of art. 5 of chap. 42, Rev. Stat. 1889, that no company shall place its wires and other fixtures under ground in any city unless it shall first obtain consent from said city, through the municipal authorities thereof.

"And that it is provided by art. 2, chap. 15, Rev. Ordinance of the city of St. Louis, 1887, as the same has been amended by Ordinance No. 16,894, that no wires, tubes, or cables, conveying electricity for the production of light, heat, or power shall hereafter be placed along or across any of the streets, alleys, or public places in the city of St. Louis by any person, corporation, or association not having, previous to the passage of this ordinance, accepted and complied with Ordinance No. 12,723, now amended, or shall be duly authorized by the municipal assembly, and then only upon condition that such person, corporation, or association so authorized by ordinance, before placing its wires, tubes, and cables under ground, shall file in the office of the board of public improvements an application therefor, stating in detail the streets, alleys, or public places which said wires, tubes, or cables are to occupy, and the manner in which said wires, tubes, or cables are to be secured or supported and insulated, together with a plat showing the route of such wires, tubes, and cables, and that thereupon, if the same is approved, the board of public improvements shall grant a permit therefor, subject to such restrictions, regulations, and qualifications as may be prescribed by said board, and all such work shall be done under the supervision of and to the satisfaction of the supervisor of city lighting; and that whenever an alley is available for placing such wires, tubes, or cables the same shall be placed in or under alleys, and not along *or under streets; that relator has never ac-[84 cepted the provisions of said article and chapter, nor of said Ordinance No. 16,894, nor has it ever been authorized by the municipal assembly of St. Louis to place its wires, tubes, and cables under the streets or alleys of St. Louis.

"Respondent further shows unto the court that said ordinance provisions are legal and binding and valid provisions, and such as the city of St. Louis had the right to adopt and enact under ¶ 2 of § 26 of art. 3 of the charter of St. Louis, which gives said city the power to regulate the use of all streets, avenues, alleys, and so forth in said city, and such ordinance provisions are legal enactments, notwithstanding any rights which relator now has or may heretofore have had, by virtue of any act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri.

"Respondent further shows unto the court that relator has never made application to the board of public improvements for a permit to place its wires, tubes, and cables under ground in said city, nor has it complied in any manner with any of the ordinance provisions aforesaid, and that respondent has not the power to grant any such permit as is asked for by relator in this case."

The relator moved to strike out certain portions of the return, and demurred to certain other portions thereof, assigning, among other grounds, that its "charter was and is a contract between the state of Missouri and said corporation, not subject to alteration, suspension, or repeal except with the consent of said corporation, and that any constitutional provision, law, or municipal ordinance adopted or enacted after said date, by or by authority of said state or by any municipality thereof, inconsistent with any right, privilege, or franchise granted by said charter to relator or the effect of which would be to deny to relator any such right, privilege, or franchise, or to annex to the full exercise thereof by relator any condition or requirement not prescribed by said charter, would be in contravention of section fifteen of article 2 of the Constitution of Missouri, 1875, forbidding the general assembly to pass any law impairing the obligation of con-85] tracts, and *also of section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, forbidding any state to pass any such law."

That "the provisions of said ordinance of said city of St. Louis in said portion of said return mentioned, if held valid or binding upon relator, would necessarily impair the obligation of the contract between relator and said state of Missouri, contained in said charter, by annexing to the exercise by relator of the rights and privileges by said charter granted to it certain conditions and requirements not prescribed by said charter, and which it does not appear nor is by respondent averred that the relator has ever consented to or accepted."

On the issues thus presented the supreme court heard the cause and denied the peremptory writ.

Subsequently on the application of relator the judgment was set aside; the demurrer to the return and motion to strike out parts thereof were overruled; and leave was given to plead over.

Relator thereupon filed a traverse to the return, setting forth at length the grounds on which relator denied that the averments in the return in respect of the organization of the company and of the time when it commenced the transaction of business, and of the invalidity of the act of March 26, 1868, constituted defenses to the proceeding.

The traverse further stated that if electricity was not a substance or material as averred by respondent, which relator denied, that constituted no defense. That relator was incorporated to carry on the business of lighting the city of St. Louis, and the right and privilege of doing so was granted, as before set forth and reiterated. The traverse explained the process of lighting by gas, and also by electricity, which relator asserted was included in the grant; admitted that the company had theretofore exercised its corporate franchise of lighting the city with gas through pipes laid beneath the surface of the street on the east side of Broadway from Mound street to Olive street, and in other places; that to furnish light by means of electricity it was necessary to use wires "either on poles above the surface of the 86] street, as relator is *now doing under a contract with said city of St. Louis, or in tubes or conduits beneath said surface," and that "its purpose in making the excavation on Broadway mentioned in the petition was to construct and place under ground a conduit for wires, such conduit and wires being properly required for the production of electric light as a substitute for gaslight;" and set forth that the conduit and wires so intended to be laid down were of the most approved description, offering no obstruction, and avoiding the danger to life and property attending the use of overhead electric wires.

The traverse denied that relator had not acquired the right to place such wires above or beneath the streets; and denied that § 2721 of article 5, chapter 42, Revised Statutes of Missouri, 1889, applied to relator, but averred that if it did, its provisions would be invalid as impairing the obligation of the contract contained in its charter.

The traverse admitted that by article 2, chapter 15, Revised Ordinance of St. Louis of 1887, as amended by Ordinance No. 16,894, the municipal authorities undertook to prescribe certain conditions for placing wires, tubes, or cables conveying electricity along, across, or under the streets and alleys of the city; and averred that said ordinance and the amendatory Ordinance No. 16,894 are the same ordinances revised and re-enacted in article 2 of chapter 15 of the Revised Ordinance of 1892, by an Ordinance No. 17,188, approved April 7, 1893, and that §§ 603–614 are the only provisions prescribing regulations or conditions in respect of placing along, across, or under any of the streets, alleys, and public places of wires, tubes, or cables conveying electricity for the production of light, heat, or power, and are the provisions insisted on by respondent. These sections were set out in the traverse and are printed in the margin.† *The traverse [87 then proceeded:

†Sec. 603. That no wires, tubes, or cables conveying electricity for the production of light, heat, or power shall hereafter be placed along or across any of the streets, alleys, or public places in the city of St. Louis, by any person, corporation, or association not having, previous to the passage of this ordinance, accepted and complied with ordinance number twelve thousand seven hundred and twenty-three, now amended, or shall be duly authorized by the municipal assembly, and then only as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 604. All such wires, tubes, or cables, along or across any of the streets, alleys, or public places of the city of St. Louis, shall be placed at such distances above or below the surface of the ground, and secured in such manner as shall be prescribed by the board of public improvements.

Sec. 605. That any person or persons, corporation or association, duly authorized by ordinance to do business in the city of St. Louis, and desiring to place along or across any of the streets, alleys, or public places of the city of St. Louis, such wires, tubes, or cables, shall file in the office of the board of public improvements an application therefor, stating in detail the streets, alleys, or public places which said wires, tubes, or cables are to occupy, and the manner in which said wires, tubes, or cables are to be secured or supported and insulated, together with a plat showing the route of such wires, tubes, or cables.

Sec. 606. The board of public improvements is hereby authorized, upon the filing of the application and plat required by the preceding section, to grant a permit for such occupancy of the streets, alleys, and public places herein named, with such restrictions, regulations, and qualifications as may be prescribed by said board, and under the supervision and to the satisfaction of the supervisor of city lighting.

Sec. 607. That in case any person or persons, corporation or association, duly authorized by ordinance, desiring to place along or across any of the streets, alleys, or public places of the city of St. Louis, such wires, tubes, or cables, shall, with the application and plat heretofore provided for, file in the office of the board of public improvements the written consent of any telegraph or telephone company, or any other electric light or power company, doing business in the city of St. Louis, to the placing of such wires, tubes, or cables upon the poles of said telegraph, telephone, electric light, or power company, situated in the streets, alleys, or public places named in such application, the board of public improvements is hereby authorized to grant a permit for such occupancy of the poles of such telegraph, telephone, electric light, or power company, with such restrictions, regulations, and qualifications as may be prescribed by said board, and under the supervision and to the satisfaction of the supervisor of city lighting.

"Relator denies that the requirements of said city ordinances set forth were or are legal and binding and valid provisions so far as the rights 88] of this relator under its *charter were or are concerned, and denies that as against this relator said city of St. Louis had or has the lawful right or power to adopt or enforce the same, whether under the provisions of paragraph 2 of section 26 of article 3 of the charter 89] of said *city, as by respondent alleged, or under any other provision of the charter of said city.

"Relator further shows to the court that by reason of the exemption contained as aforesaid in section 8 of said act of March 2, 1857, relator's charter as granted in and by said act of 1857 and as subsequently amended by the act of March 26, 1868, hereinbefore mentioned, was and is a contract by the state of Missouri with relator, which was not nor is subject to alteration, suspension, or repeal by the state of Mis-90]souri *or by any municipality thereof; that said city of St. Louis had not nor has lawful power by ordinance or otherwise to impair the obligation of said contract, nor to abridge or interfere with the full exercise by relator or any corporate franchise thereby granted to it; that the enforcement against said relator of said provisions of said ordinances of said city of St. Louis would be a denial to relator of its corporate rights and franchises aforesaid, and would impair the obligation of the said contract of the said state of Missouri contained in relators's charter as amended, and would be in contravention of section 15 of article 2 of the Constitution of Missouri, 1875, forbidding the general assembly to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, and also section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, forbidding any state to pass any such law, each of which constitutional provision is hereby referred to and relied on by relator for the protection of its corporate rights and franchises aforesaid in his behalf.

"Relator further shows to the court that the only condition annexed by its charter, as amended, to the exercise by relator of its right to establish and lay down in said city all pipes, fixtures, or other thing properly required in order to carry on relator's said lighting business, is that the same shall be done with as much despatch and as little inconvenience to the public as possible, and avers not only that in making its arrangements and preparations to lay its wires under ground along and under the streets of said city as in its peti-

Sec. 608. That whenever an alley is available for the placing of poles for the support of such wires, tubes, or cables, the board of public improvements will advertise for five days previous to a day set for hearing objections or arguments in favor of placing the said poles in the alley. If, after due consideration, the board of public improvements are of the opinion that the placing of poles for the purposes aforesaid is practicable, such poles shall be placed along said alley instead of along the street named in application. Where the poles are set in any alley they shall be located as near the side lines of the alley as practicable, and in such a manner as not to incommode the public or the adjoining proprietors or residents.

Sec. 609. The poles used as herein provided shall be of sound timber, not less than five inches in diameter, at the upper end, straight, shapely, and of uniform size, neatly planed or shaved, and thoroughly painted with two coats of lead and oil paint, of such color as may be directed by the board of public improvements, and be supplied with iron steps, commencing twelve feet from the surface of the ground and reaching to the arms supporting the wires, tubes, or cables; said wires, tubes, or cables shall be run at a height not less than twenty-five feet above the grade of the street. Whenever the poles are erected on a street they shall be placed, in all cases, when practicable, on the outer edge of the sidewalk, just inside the curbstone and on the line dividing the lots one from the other, and in no case be so placed as to obstruct the drainage of the streets, or interfere with or damage in any way the curbstones, trees, or other public or private property on the line of the street or alley or public place where such pole shall be erected.

Sec. 610. Any person or persons, corporation or association, having made excavations in the streets, alleys, or public places of the city of St. Louis for the purposes aforesaid, shall replace the streets, alleys, or public places in such manner and in accordance with such regulations as may from time to time be prescribed by ordinance or by the board of public improvements, to the satisfaction of the street commissioners.

Sec. 611. The right is hereby reserved to the board of public improvements at any time to direct any alterations in the location of said poles, and also in the height at which the wires, tubes, or cables shall run; but before any alteration is made, at least five days' notice in writing shall be given to the person or persons, or the president or the officer in charge of the company affected by the proposed alteration, and reasonable opportunity shall be afforded the representative of such company, or any citizen interested, to be heard in regard thereto. But when any such alteration shall be ordered, the said company shall within five days thereafter commence such alterations and complete the same as soon as practicable thereafter; and upon failure so to do, it shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished as hereafter provided.

Sec. 612. No person or persons, corporation or association, shall be entitled to any of the privileges conferred by this article, except upon the following conditions: That said person or persons, corporation or association, before availing himself or itself of any of the rights or privileges granted by this article shall file with the city register his or its acceptance of all the terms of this article, and agree therein that he or it will file with the comptroller of the city, on the first days of January and July of each year, a statement of his or its gross receipts from his or its business arising from supplying electricity for light or power for the six months next preceding such statement, which shall be sworn to by such person or persons, or the president or secretary of such corporation or association; and further agree that he or it will, at the time of filing said statement with the comptroller, pay into the city treasury two and one half per cent on the amount of such gross receipts up to the year eighteen hundred ninety, and five per cent on the amount of gross receipts thereafter. And said person or persons, or corporation or association, shall, at the time of filing said acceptance, also file with the city register his or its penal bond in the sum of twenty thousand dollars with two or more good and sufficient securities, to be approved by the mayor and council, conditioned that he or it will comply with all the conditions of this article, or any ordinance which may be hereafter passed, regulating the placing of wires, tubes, or cables in the streets and alleys for the purposes named therein; that he or it will comply with all the regulations made by the board of public improvements having reference to the subject embraced in this article or any ordinance herein named; that he or it will make the statements and payments required by the provisions of this section, and will save the city of St. Louis harmless and indemnified from all loss, cost, or damage by reason of the exercise of any of the privileges granted by this article or any ordinance which may be hereafter passed relating to the subject-matter of this article.

Sec. 613. Any person or persons, corporation or association which, or any president, manager, superintendent, or officer in charge of any corporation or association, who shall violate or fail to comply with any of the provisions of this article, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than fifty dollars, nor more than five hundred dollars.

Sec. 614. The city reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this article at any time.

tion in this behalf alleged, and in applying to respondent as street commissioner of said city for a p rmit to make the necessary excavation therefor, relator has fulfilled every condition to which it was or is lawfully subject in that behalf, but also that respondent in refusing to relator such permit did not allege as a ground for such refusal, nor did in fact refuse such permit for the reason that by laying its wires under ground in the manner by it proposed relator would cause any inconvenience to the public, but expressly and unconditionally refused to permit relator to make any excavation in any street of said city.

91] *"Relator shows to the court that, as against this relator, the said ordinances and provisions above mentioned are not valid, legal, or binding enactments, nor constitute any defense to this proceeding:

"Because, as relator avers, said provisions are not, so far as relator's rights are concerned, lawful or reasonable regulations of the use of the streets of said city, but were intended to and do prohibit relator from exercising its said charter rights and powers except upon compliance by relator with conditions which the city of St. Louis has not nor has the municipal assembly thereof any lawful right or power to impose on relator in that behalf, including as one of said conditions that relator shall first be duly authorized thereto by the municipal assembly, thereby impairing the obligation of the contract contained in relator's charter as amended.

"Because the enforcement against relator by said city or any officer thereof of the conditions prescribed by said ordinances would not be a lawful or reasonable exercise of the power of said city under its charter to regulate the use of its streets or of the police power of said city, but is an attempt by said city under control of its charter powers to compel relator to enter into the obligations and to pay to said city, from time to time, the tax of five per cent upon the gross annual receipts from relator's business prescribed by section 590, article 2, chapter 15, of the Revised Ordinance 1887, re-enacted as section 612, article 2, chapter 15, of the Revised Ordinance 1892, above mentioned; forasmuch as it is provided by said section 690, article 2, chapter 15, of the Revised Ordinance 1887, re-enacted as section 612, article 2, chapter 15, of the Revised Ordinance 1892, that no person or persons, corporation or association, shall be entitled to any of the privileges conferred by said article 2, chapter 15, except upon fulfilling the several conditions in said section 612 prescribed as hereinbefore set forth.

"Because among the conditions prescribed by said section 590, re-enacted as section 612, relator would be compelled, before availing itself of any of the rights or privileges mentioned in said article 2, chapter 15, Revised 92] Ordinance 1887, *re enacted as article 2, chapter 15, Revised Ordinance 1892, to file with the city register its penal bond in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, conditioned that relator will comply with all the conditions of said article 2, or with any ordinance which might thereafter be passed, and will comply with all regulations which may be made by the board of public improvements having reference to the subject-matter embraced in said article 2 or any ordinance therein named; all which requirements and conditions are a denial of relator's rights under its charter and impair the obligation of the contract contained therein as aforesaid.

"Because said article 2, chapter 15, Revised Ordinance 1887, re-enacted as article 2, chapter 15, Revised Ordinance 1892, purports to authorize the board of public improvements of said city, in granting a permit for the use or occupation of the streets, alleys, and public places of said city for the purposes therein mentioned, to prescribe such restrictions, regulations, and qualifications as said board may think fit in respect of the use of said streets, alleys, and public places, and requires every person or corporation obtaining such permit, as a condition of availing itself of the privileges mentioned in said article 2, to agree to comply with all such regulations made by said board, whereas the power to regulate the use of the streets of said city, granted—clause 2, section 26, of article 3, of its charter—is granted only to the mayor and assembly of said city, to be exercised by ordinance not inconsistent with the Constitution or any law of this state or with said charter, and does not authorize the said mayor and municipal assembly, or either of them, by ordinance or otherwise, to delegate to the board of public improvements of said city the power to make regulations for the use of said streets. Wherefore relator says that said requirements and said conditions are unlawful and void.

"And relator says that the several conditions and requirements prescribed in said article 2, chapter 15, Revised Ordinance 1887, as amended and re-enacted in article 2, chapter 15, Revised Ordinance 1892, are not independent of each other, but are so framed as to subject relator, its officers and *agents, to the [93 penalties prescribed in section 591 of Revised Ordinance 1887, re-enacted as section 613 of Revised Ordinance 1892, unless, before placing along, across, or under any street of the city of St. Louis any wires, such as hereinbefore mentioned, it, said relator, shall not only have obtained authority so to do from the municipal assembly of the city of St. Louis, but shall also have filed in the office of the board of public improvements of said city an application therefor, such as prescribed in section 583, Revised Ordinance 1887, re-enacted as section 605, Revised Ordinance 1892, and shall have obtained a permit therefor from said board with such restrictions, regulations, and qualifications as by it prescribed, and shall also have filed with the city register its acceptance of all the terms of said article 2, chapter 15, and shall therein agree as required by section 590, Revised Ordinance 1887, re-enacted as section 612, Revised Ordinance 1892, to file with the comptroller of said city sworn semi-annual statements of its gross receipts from its business, and to pay to the city treasurer a tax of five per cent upon the amount of such gross receipts, and shall also have filed with the city register its bond in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, conditioned as prescribed in said section 590, Revised Ordinance 1887, re-enacted as section 612, Revised Ordinance 1892; all of which requirements and conditions are a denial of relator's rights under its charter and impair the obligation of the contract contained therein as aforesaid."

To this traverse respondent filed a general demurrer, assigning also special grounds.

Subsequently the city of St. Louis was made a party; entered its appearance; and adopted as its own the return of the street commissioner and his demurrer to the traverse.

The demurrer was then sustained by the supreme court, "for the reasons given in the opinion heretofore rendered in this cause, to which reference is hereby made as a part of this judgment," and judgment was again entered denying the peremptory writ.

A writ of error from this court was allowed by the chief justice of Missouri. The opinion of the state court forms part of the record and is reported in 130 Mo. 10 [31 L. R. A. 798].

94] *The court in that opinion stated that on the pleadings the following issues of law were fairly framed:

"First. Is the act of March 26, 1868, unconstitutional as being in conflict with section 2, article 8, of the Constitution of Missouri of 1865?

"Second. Is said act void as being in conflict with section 25 of article 4 of said Constitution?

"Third. Did the charter of relator expire by limitation at the end of thirty years from the date of the act of March 2, 1857?

"Fourth. Do the powers granted relator include the right to manufacture, sell, or distribute electricity for lighting purposes?

"Fifth. Has relator the right, under its charter, to place its wires under ground without the assent of the municipal authorities and without compliance with the requirements of the valid ordinances of the city?"

But the court declined to express an opinion on "any question involving the right of relator to exercise the rights, or enjoy the franchises which appear to have been granted under the acts of the general assembly mentioned in the statement;" or "to inquire whether the right to use electricity for making light was included under the terms 'substance or material' as used in the charter," and confined itself "to the question whether relator has a vested right to place its electric wires under the surface of the streets without the assent of the municipal authorities thereof and without compliance with valid ordinances of the city."

And this question, for reasons given, the supreme court determined in the negative, and held that "respondent, under his official duties as street commissioner, properly refused to grant the permit demanded, unless relator first complied with the requirements of the valid ordinances then in force."

Messrs. Henry Hitchcock and Isaac H. Lionberger for plaintiff in error on first argument.

Mr. W. C. Marshall for defendants in error on first argument.

Mr. Henry Hitchcock for plaintiff in error on reargument.

Mr. W. C. Marshall for defendants in error on reargument.

Mr. Isaac H. Lionberger, for plaintiff in error:

This court has jurisdiction to review the record and decision below. The plaintiff in error asserts certain charter privileges. The validity and effect of the charter, and the validity of a subsequent law which impairs the obligation of the charter, are directly drawn in question. The decision of the court below was in favor of the validity of the ordinance.

U. S. Const. art. 1, § 10; Rev. Stat. § 709; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 486 (38: 793).

The acts creating the plaintiff corporation are valid enactments. They do not violate § 1 of article 8 of the Constitution of Missouri, 1865.

St. Louis v. St. Louis Gaslight Co. 70 Mo. 118; St. Louis Gaslight Co. v. St. Louis, 86 Mo. 499; State, St. Louis, v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 102 Mo. 483; St. Louis & I. R. Co. v. Shambaugh, 106 Mo. 568.

Neither do they violate § 25 of article 4 of said Constitution.

Boonville v. Trigg, 46 Mo. 289; State, Maguire, v. Draper, 47 Mo. 33; State, Atty. Gen., v. Miller, 100 Mo. 446; State v. Bennett, 102 Mo. 356, 10 L. R. A. 717.

Said acts are now in full force, and entitle the plaintiff to "have, hold, exercise, and enjoy" the rights thereby conferred.

State, St. Louis, v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 102 Mo. 483.

Among the privileges conferred is the right to light the city of St. Louis, and to make and vend gas, gaslights, and gas fixtures, and any substance or material that may now or hereafter be used as a substitute therefor; and to that end to establish and lay down in any portion of the corporate limits of St. Louis any pipe, fixture, or thing necessary or proper to do the same.

Act March 2, 1857, § 5, as amended by § 1 of the act of March 26 1868.

The ordinance of 1887, as amended by ordinance 16,894 is void because:

First. It delegates to the board of public improvements the regulation of the use of the streets of St. Louis by electric companies, whereas the charter of the city provides that the "mayor and municipal assembly shall by ordinance regulate the use of the streets."

Ruggles v. Collier, 43 Mo. 353; St. Louis, Murphy, v. Clemens, 43 Mo. 395; St. Louis, Creamer, v. Clemens, 52 Mo. 133; St. Louis, Murphy, v. Buckner, 44 Mo. 19; Haegele v. Mallinckrodt, 46 Mo. 577; Saline County v. Wilson, 61 Mo. 237; Matthews v. Alexandria, 68 Mo. 115, 30 Am. Rep. 776; Thomson v. Boonville, 61 Mo. 282; St. Louis v. Russell, 116 Mo. 248, 20 L. R. A. 721; St. Louis v. Howard, 119 Mo. 41; St. Joseph v. Wilshire, 47 Mo. App. 125; King Hill Brick Mfg. Co. v. Hamilton, 51 Mo. App. 120; O'Neil v. American F. Ins. Co. 166 Pa. 72, 26 L. R. A. 715; Anderson v. Manchester F. Assur. Co. 59 Minn. 182, 28 L. R. A. 609.

Second. It exacts from the plaintiff a tax of 5 per cent upon its gross receipts, and to that extent impairs the obligation of its contract with the state.

State, St. Louis, v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 102 Mo. 483; Rushville v. Rushville Natural Gas Co. 132 Ind. 575, 15 L. R. A. 321.

Third. It wholly prohibits the exercise by plaintiff of the powers and privileges conferred by its charter, and thereby impairs the obligation of said contract.

U. S. Const. art. 1, § 10.

Section 35 of article 4 of the charter of St. Louis charges upon the street commissioner of said city the duty of repairing, etc., the streets, and the ordinances of the city provide that no person shall make an excavation in the streets without a permit from said commissioner.

2 Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, p. 2109; Rev. Ord. St. Louis 1892, § 1335.

The street commissioner refuses a permit, and mandamus is the proper remedy.

State, St. Louis, v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 102 Mo. 472; State, Sharp, v. Weeks, 93 Mo 499; State, Cannon, v. May, 106 Mo. 488.

Mr. W. C. Marshall, for defendants in error:

The act of March 26, 1868, is unconstitutional, null, and void, and is in conflict with ¶ 2 of § 1 of art. 8 of the Constitution of Missouri of 1865.

Unless the act of 1868 extended the life of relator "forever" the franchises, rights, and privileges of the Laclede Gaslight Company expired in 1887.

The cases of Boonville v. Trigg, 46 Mo. 288, and French v. Woodward, 58 Mo. 66, did not discuss nor decide the question here involved.

The said act of March 26, 1868, is null and void and in conflict with § 25 of art. 4 of the Constitution of 1865.

People, Drake, v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 497; Boonville v. Trigg, 46 Mo. 288; French v. Woodward, 58 Mo. 66; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Evans Brick Co. 85 Mo. 307; State, Harris, v. Laughlin, 75 Mo. 150.

The charter of the relator, by the terms of § 9 of the act of 1857, expired on the 2d of March, 1887, and hence relator is not entitled to any of the privileges, rights, and franchises claimed by it.

Article 2, chap. 15, Rev. Ord. 1887, as amended by ordinance No. 16,894, provides that no wires, tubes, cables, etc., conveying electricity for the production of light, heat, or power, shall hereafter be placed along or across any of the streets, alleys, or public places in the city of St Louis, by any person, corporation, or association not having, previous to the passage of this ordinance, accepted and complied with ordinance No. 12,723 now amended, unless the same shall be duly authorized by the municipal assembly, and then only upon condition that the plans showing the places to be occupied, the manner of insulation, etc., be approved by the board of public improvements, and under a permit issued by it; that the relator has not brought itself within the provisions of this ordinance by either applying for or obtaining such ordinance and permit, and that ¶ 2 of § 26 of article 3 of the charter of the city of St. Louis, confers the power upon it to enact this ordinance.

By § 2721 of article 5 of chapter 42, Rev. Stat. 1889, no company shall place its wires or other fixtures underground in any city unless it shall first obtain consent from said city, through the municipal authorities thereof.

St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 U. S. 92 (37: 380), 149 U. S. 465 (37: 810).

The general assembly of Missouri, by the act of March 2, 1857, did not, and did not intend to, confer upon relator the right to manufacture and vend electricity for lighting purposes.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivered the opinion of the court:

*Mandamus lies to compel a party to do [95 that which it is his duty to do, but can confer no new authority, and the party to be coerced must have the power to perform the act. Brownsville Taxing Dist. v. Loague, 129 U. S. 493, 501 [32: 780, 783].

On the facts disclosed by the record, was it the duty of the street commissioners to issue a permit to the company to make excavations on Broadway so that it might place electric wires under the surface of the street?

The supreme court of the state held that it was not the duty of the street commissioner to do so. Did that court in so holding give effect to ordinances impairing the obligations of the contract created by the company's charter?

Assuming the charter to be in force, as contended, the company was authorized to light the city, and to lay down pipes for that purpose, "with as much despatch and as little inconvenience to the public as possible." It originally furnished light by means of gas through underground pipes, and when electricity came into use it furnished electric light through overhead wires. It now sought to put these electric wires under the surface; and it insisted that it had a vested right to do this without being controlled by the municipal authorities.

Subsequently to the passage of the acts of 1857 and 1868, a city charter had been adopted, whereby the state vested the city with the power to regulate the use of the streets, and pass ordinances deemed expedient "in maintaining the peace, good government, health, and welfare of the city, its trade, commerce, and manufactures."

The board of public improvements of the city of St. Louis, consisting of a president, the street commissioner, the sewer commissioner, the water commissioner, the harbor and wharf commissioner, and the park commissioner, has existed for many years under the charter and ordinances of that city. Each of these commissioners is the head of the department indicated by the title of the office, and has special charge thereof, but subject to the general control of the board, and the board is charged with the duty, among other things, of furnishing data and information to the municipal assembly of the city in respect of matters with which it is called upon *to deal; pre- [96 paring and recommending ordinances for the improvement and lighting of the streets; and establishing regulations for excavations and the laying of gas pipes in the streets, etc., etc. Rev. Ord. 1892, p. 976; Rev. Ord. 1887, p. 893; Rev. Ord. 1881, p. 716.

The street commissioner had primary jurisdiction over streets and highways, and § 568, article 1, of chap. 15 of the Revised Ordinance of 1887, which article treated of excavations in streets and public places, for various purposes, provided that "no person shall make or cause to be made any excavation on any public street, highway, or alley, without written permission of the street commissioner so to do, except public work done under the authority of the water or sewer commissioner, who at the time of ordering any such excavating shall notify the street commissioner of the same."

By §§ 581, 582, 583 et seq., article 2 of the same chapter, wires, tubes, or cables carrying electricity for the production of light or power were to be placed above or below the surface of the ground of streets, alleys, or public places, and secured in such manner as prescribed by the board of public improvements, and that board, on the filing of an application stating the streets, alleys, and public places desired to be occupied and the manner in which the wires, tubes, or cables were to be secured, were authorized to grant a permit for such occupancy, with such restrictions, regulations, and qualifications as the board might designate, etc., etc. These were sections of Ordinance No. 12,723. (See Revised Ordinance 1887, p. 652.)

Section 590, article 1, chap. 15, of the Revised Ordinance of 1892, was the same as § 568 of Revised Ordinance of 1887, and §§ 603, 604, et seq., of article 2 of that chapter, quoted ante, corresponded substantially with sections 581, etc., of the Ordinance of 1887. Revised Ordinance 1892, p. 660.

Section 2721, chap. 42, of the Revised Statute of Missouri of 1889 (vol. 1, p. 693), provided: "Companies organized under the provisions of this article for the purpose of constructing and maintaining telephone or magnetic telegraph lines, are authorized to set their poles, piers, abutments, wires, and other fixtures along, across, or under any of the public roads, 97] *streets, and waters of this state, in such manner as not to incommode the public in the use of such roads, streets, and waters: Provided, Any telegraph or telephone company desiring to place their wires and other fixtures under ground, in any city, they shall first obtain consent from said city through the municipal authorities thereof."

The company asserted by its pleadings that it had never accepted the provisions of Ordinance 12,723, and the subsequent ordinances, and had never obtained the consent of the municipal assembly to occupy the streets with electric wires laid under their surface.

Nor had the company ever applied to the board of public improvements for a permit to occupy Broadway with electric wires laid under the surface of that street.

But the company asserted that the only limitation on its power to so occupy the streets was that the work should be done "with as much despatch and as little inconvenience to the public as possible."

And, admitting that it sought to excavate with the view to occupy the street with electric wires laid under the surface, the company demanded the writ of mandamus to compel the street commissioner to issue a permit allowing it to excavate for that purpose.

The supreme court held that the grant of the state to the company, "though construed to include the right to use electricity for illuminating purposes in respect to such right was taken subject to reasonable regulations as to its use, and the power to regulate has been delegated to the city of St. Louis. Under its general police power the city has the right to require compliance with reasonable regulations as a condition to using its streets by electric wires."

In view of the want of knowledge in the art of producing light by electricity when the franchise was granted, the court thought that "it would be most unwarrantable to imply, not only that relator had the right under the general words used in the act of incorporation to use electricity for lighting purposes, but that it also had the right to adopt its own methods for exercising that power, regardless of the paramount rights *of the public to[98 the use of the streets. The power delegated to the city to regulate the use of its streets existed before the art of lighting by electricity was known, or at least before relator adopted it, and the art should be exercised, if at all, under the powers thus in force when it was brought into use."

Considering the danger to life and property from electric wires when charged, it seemed to the court too plain for argument that the city should have the right to direct the manner in which their use should be exercised, and especially when more than one method was open, and the rights and safety of the public were more or less affected by either.

Again, many companies used electric wires for various purposes, and to accommodate them all and prevent monopolies in the use of the streets it appeared absolutely necessary that the municipal authorities should have the right to direct the manner in which wires should be placed under ground.

The court was of opinion that it would be time enough for the company to complain when its rights were distinctly infringed, and held that the street commissioner "properly refused to grant the permit demanded, unless relator first complied with the requirements of the valid ordinances then in force."

Obviously the supreme court declined to enter on a discussion as to what were and what were not valid ordinances as respected the company, because the record showed that the company denied that it was subject to any control by the municipal authorities, and claimed that all that was required of it by its charter was to do the work with as much despatch and as little inconvenience as possible.

It had made no application to the municipal assembly, directly or through the board of public improvements, for authority to proceed.

It had not filed any application with the board of public improvements giving details of the streets it wished to occupy, and the manner in which the wires, etc., were to be secured, supported, and insulated, and a plat of the route; nor asked that board for a permit for the occupancy it desired.

Whatever objections the company may have 99] been entitled *to raise to particular provisions of the ordinances, in denial of their applicability or validity, it took no action whatever, so far as this record shows, calculated to bring such matters to a distinct issue.

The street commissioner had no power under the charter and ordinances to issue the permit requested in the absence of the assent of the board of public improvements, which had general control; and the court could not command him to do that which it was not his official duty to perform.

Judgment to that effect in itself involved no Federal question, for confessedly there was no contract right that leave to excavate should be given by a particular officer; but we concur with the conclusion of the supreme court that the company was subject to reasonable regulations in the exercise of the police powers of the city, and so far as that involved any Federal question, such question was correctly decided. New York [New York Electric Lines Co] v. Squire, 145 U. S. 175 [36: 666]; St. Louis v Western U. Telegraph Company, 148 U. S. 92 [37: 380], 149 U. S. 465 [37: 810].

We are unable to accede to the contention that the company was entitled by contract with the state to lay electric wires under ground without reference to the directions or regulations of the city on that subject; or that the street commissioner was obliged to permit it to excavate the streets for that purpose without the assent of the board of public improvements or of the municipal assembly, or effort to obtain either, on the mere averment of the company that it fears it might thereby subject itself to requirements from which it insists it was exempted by the terms of its charter.

If the company, as it asserted, possessed the right to place electric wires beneath the surface of the streets, that right was subject to such reasonable regulations as the city deemed best to make for the public safety and convenience, and the duty rested on the company to comply with them.

If requirements were exacted or duties imposed by the ordinances, which, if enforced, would have impaired the obligations of the company's contract, this did not relieve the company from offering to do those things which it was lawfully bound to do.

100] *The exemption of the company from requirements inconsistent with its charter could not operate to relieve it from submitting itself to such police regulations as the city might lawfully impose. And until it has complied, or offered to comply, with regulations to which it was bound to conform, it was not in a position to assert that its charter rights were invaded because of other regulations, which, though applicable to other companies, it contended would be invalid if applied to it.

The supreme court of Missouri did not feel called on to define in advance what might, or might not, be lawful requirements; and there is certainly nothing in this record compelling us to do so.

It must be remembered that the case does not come before us from the circuit court. This is a writ of error to revise the judgment of the highest tribunal of a state, and this we cannot do unless Federal questions have been erroneously disposed of.

Judgment affirmed.

Corporation, when a citizen—liability to be sued —in what courts—personal tort committed abroad—jurisdiction of Federal courts.

1. For the purposes of suing and being sued in a Federal court, a state corporation is to be considered as a citizen of the state, and the persons composing the corporation are presumed to be citizens of the same state.
2. The liability of a foreign corporation to be sued in a particular jurisdiction need not be distinctly expressed in the statutes of that jurisdiction, but may be implied from a grant of authority in those statutes to carry on its business there.
3. An alien or a foreign corporation may be sued in the United States circuit court by a citizen of a state, in any district in which valid service can be made on the defendant.
4. An action may be maintained in a Federal court in one state by a citizen and resident of another state against a foreign corporation doing business in the former state for a personal tort committed abroad, which would have been actionable if committed in the state, or elsewhere in this country.
5. That the legislature of the state has not authorized like suits to be brought in its own courts by citizens and residents of other states cannot deprive such citizens of their right to invoke the jurisdiction of the national courts under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action brought November 1, 1894, in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York by Michael Kane against the Barrow Steamship Company (Limited).

101] *The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was a citizen of New Jersey, and resided at Newark, in that state; and that "the defendant is a corporation organized and incorporated under the laws of the Kingdom of Great Britain, and is the owner of a certain steamship known as the Devonia, and is and was at the time hereinafter mentioned a common carrier of passengers, and engaged in the business of transportation of freight and passengers upon said steamship Devonia and other steamers, among other places, fron Londonderry, Ireland, to the city of New York, and has offices and property in the said city of New York, and its general agents therein, managing the affairs of the said company within said city, and is a resident and inhabitant of the city of New York and the southern district of New York, within the meaning of the statute in such case made and provided;" that "the said defendant operates its business, or part thereof, in and under the name and as part of the Anchor Line, and its said business is in whole or in part done under that name, and its steamers, including the said Devonia, belong to what is known as the Anchor Line steamships; that the general managers of said business in the city of New York are the firm of Henderson Brothers, who are the general agents of said defendant, and the officers of said defendant company and said agents are at No. 7 Bowling Green and pier 54 North river, in said city; that on or about September 13, 1893, the plaintiff purchased and paid for a ticket as a passenger for transportation hy defendant from Londonderry, in Ireland. Kingdom of Great Britain, to the city of New York, on the steamship Devonia, belonging to said defendant; and the said defendant received the said plaintiff as a passenger, and undertook and promised to transport the said plaintiff from said Londonderry to New York with due care, and to do all those things necessary and required for the safe transportation of the said plaintiff to and from said points; and it became and was its duty, and it became bound, to protect and save harmless the said plaintiff from any injury or harm from its agents or servants employed in its business;" and that "for the purpose of transporting passengers over part of the voyage, viz., from 102]Londonderry to *the steamship Devonia, lying in the harbor, the said defendant used a certain tender; that said plaintiff, being a passenger on said tender, in pursuance of the obligation and promise aforesaid, the same being part of the transportation to New York, was violently, on or about September 14, 1893, assaulted and maltreated, without just cause or excuse and wrongfully and unlawfully, by servants or agents of said defendant on said tender," as particularly stated in the complaint; and thereby suffered damages to the extent of $20,000.

To this complaint the defendant filed the following appearance and demurrer: "The defendant above named, appearing specially by Henry T. Wing and Harrington Putnam as its attorneys, specially, only for the purposes hereof, as stated in its special appearance noted herein, demurs to the complaint herein for the special purpose, and no other, until the questions herein raised have been decided, of objecting to the jurisdiction of this court, demurring and excepting to the complaint, because it appears upon the face thereof that the court has not jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, nor of the subject-matter of the action, for the reason that neither the defendant nor the plaintiff is an inhabitant or resident of the southern district of New York, and the action therefore cannot be maintained therein, and that the defendant is a foreign corporation, and the cause of action did not arise within the state of New York. Wherefore defendant prays judgment whether this court has jurisdiction, and asks that the complaint be dismissed, with costs; but should the court overrule this demurrer and exception, the defendant then asks time and leave to answer to the merits, though excepting to the action of the court in overruling said demurrer."

The court overruled the demurrer, with liberty to answer the complaint. The defendant thereupon answered, and the case went to trial.

When the plaintiff's counsel had opened the case to the jury, the defendant's counsel moved to dismiss the suit, upon the ground "that it appeared upon the face of the complaint that the court had not jurisdiction thereof; that it had no *jurisdiction of the person of the [103 defendant; and that it had no jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action;" and presented as grounds of the motion the same reasons that had been urged at the hearing on the demurrer. The court denied the motion, and the defendant duly excepted to the denial.

At the close of the testimony, the defendant again moved the court to dismiss the proceedings on the ground of want of jurisdiction, both of the subject matter and of the person of the defendant. The motion was denied and an exception reserved.

The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $7,500, upon which judgment was rendered.

The defendant took the case by writ of error to the circuit court of appeals, which requested the instruction of this court upon a question of law, and embodied in its certificate the provisions of the New York Code of Civil Procedure which are copied in the margin,† the † Sec. 432. (Amended 1877, chap. 416.) How personal service of summons made upon a foreign corporation.—Personal service of the summons upon a defendant, being a foreign corporation, must be made by delivering a copy thereof, within the state, as follows:

1. To the president, treasurer, or secretary; or, if the corporation lacks either of those officers, to the officer performing corresponding functions, under another name.

2. To a person designated for the purpose by a writing, under the seal of the corporation, and the signature of its president, vice president, or other acting head, accompanied with the written consent of the person designated, and filed in the office of the secretary of state. The designation must specify a place, within the state, as the office or residence of the person designated; and, if it is within a city, the street, and street number, if any, or other suitable designation of the particular locality. It remains in force until the filing in the same office of a written revocation thereof, or of the consent, executed in like manner; but the person designated may, from time to time, change the foregoing pleadings and proceedings in the case, and this statement of facts:

104] *"The cause of action is for damages alleged to have been sustained in consequence of an assault upon the plaintiff, a passenger by the defendant's steamship, while the plaintiff was in transit under a contract of transportation, by a person for whose acts it is alleged the defendant was responsible. The alleged assault took place in the port of Londonderry, Ireland. The plaintiff is a citizen and resident of the state of New Jersey. The defendant is a corporation organized and incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It is a common carrier operating a line of steamships from ports in that Kingdom to the port of New York. It does business in the state of New York through the firm of Henderson Brothers, its regularly appointed agents, and has property therein. There is no proof of any written designation by the defendant of anyone within the state of New York upon whom service of process may be made. Service of the summons was made on a member of the firm of Henderson Brothers as agents for the defendant."

The question of law certified was: "Had 105]the circuit court *jurisdiction to try the action and render judgment therein against the defendant?"

Mr. Esek Cowen for plaintiff in error.

Mr. F. K. Pendleton for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York against the Barrow Steamship Company, by a passenger on one of its steamships on a voyage from Londonderry in Ireland to the city of New York, for an assault upon him by its agents in the port of Londonderry. The certificate of the circuit court of appeals shows that the plaintiff is a citizen and resident of the state of New Jersey; that the defendant is a corporation, organized and incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and a common carrier running a line of steamships from ports in that Kingdom to the port of New York, and does business in the state of New York, through a mercantile firm, its regularly appointed agents, and upon whom the summons in this action was served.

It was contended, in behalf of the steamship company, that, being a foreign corporation, no suit could be maintained against it in personam in this country without its consent, express or implied; that by doing business in the state of New York it consented to be sued only as authorized by the statutes of the state; that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States held within the state depended on the authority given by those statutes; that the statutes of New York conferred no authority upon any court to issue process against a foreign corporation in an action by a nonresident, and for a cause not arising within the state; and therefore that the circuit court acquired no jurisdiction of this action brought against a British corporation by a citizen and resident of New Jersey.

*The constant tendency of judicial de-[106 cisions in modern times has been in the direction of putting corporations upon the same footing as natural persons in regard to the jurisdiction of suits by or against them.

By the Constitution of the United States, the judicial power, so far as depending upon citizenship of parties, was declared to extend to controversies "between citizens of different states," and to those between "citizens" of a state and foreign "citizens or subjects." And Congress, by the judiciary act of 1789, in defining the original jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, described each party to such a controversy, either as "a citizen" of a state, or as "an alien." Act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. at L. 78, chap. 20, § 11); Rev. Stat. § 629. Yet the words "citizens" and "aliens," in these provisions of the Constitution and of the judiciary act, have always been held by this court to include corporations.

The jurisdiction of the circuit courts over suits between a citizen of one state and a corporation of another state was at first maintained upon the theory that the persons composing the corporation were suing or being sued in its name, and upon the presumption of fact that all those persons were citizens of the state by which the corporation had been created; but that this presumption might be rebutted, by plea and proof, and the jurisdiction thereby defeated. Bank of United States v. Deveaux, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 61, 87, 88 [3: 38, 44, 45]; Hope Ins. Co. v. Boardman, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 57 [3: 36]; Commercial & R. R. Bank v. Slocomb, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 60 [10: 354].

But the earlier cases were afterwards overruled; and it has become the settled law of this court that, for the purposes of suing and being sued in the courts of the United States, a corporation created by and doing business in a state is, although an artificial person, to be considered as a citizen of the state, as much as a place specified as his office or residence to some other place within the state, by a writing, executed by him, and filed in like manner. The secretary of state may require the execution of any instrument, specified in this section, to be authenticated as he deems proper, and he may refuse to file it without such an authentication. An exemplified copy of a designation so filed, accompanied with a certificate that it has not been revoked, is presumptive evidence of the execution thereof, and conclusive evidence of the authority of the officer executing it.

3. If such a designation is not in force, or if neither the person designated, nor an officer specified in subdivision first of this section, can be found with due diligence, and the corporation has property within the state, or the cause of action arose therein, to the cashier, a director, or a managing agent of the corporation, within the state.

Sec. 1780. When foreign corporation may be sued. —An action against a foreign corporation may be maintained by a resident of the state, or by a domestic corporation, for any cause of action. An action against a foreign corporation may be maintained by another foreign corporation, or by a nonresident, in one of the following cases only:

1. Where the action is brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract, made within the state, or relating to property situated within the state, at the time of the making thereof.

2. Where it is brought to recover real property situated within the state, or a chattel, which is replevied within the state.

3. Where the cause of action arose within the state, except where the object of the action is to affect the title to real property situated without the state.

natural person; and there is a conclusive presumption of law that the persons composing the corporation are citizens of the same state with the corporation. Louisville, C. & C. Railway Co. v. Letson, 43 U. S. 2 How. 497, 558 [11: 353, 377]; Marshall v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. 57 U. S. 16 How. 314, 329 [14: 953, 959]; Muller v. Dows, 94 U. 107 *In Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 519 [10: 274], decided before the case of United States v. Deveaux, above cited, had been overruled, and while that case was still recognized as authority for the principle that in a question of jurisdiction the court might look to the character of the persons composing a corporation, Chief Justice Taney, in delivering judgment, said that the principle had 'never been supposed to extend to contracts made by a corporation, especially in another sovereignty;" but that "whenever a corporation makes a contract, it is the contract of the legal entity—of the artificial being created by the charter—and not the contract of the individual members." 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 586, 587 [10: 306, 307].

In Bank of Augusta v. Earle it was adjudged that a corporation created by one state, and acting within the scope of its charter, might do business and make contracts in another state when permitted to do so by the laws thereof, and might sue upon such contracts in the courts of that state. As was said in the opinion: "It is sufficient that its existence as an artificial person, in the state of its creation, is acknowledged and recognized by the law of the nation where the dealing takes place; and that it is permitted, by the laws of that place, to exercise there the powers with which it is endowed." 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 589 [10: 308]. And it was declared to be well settled that by the law of comity among nations, prevailing among the several states of the Union, "a corporation created by one sovereignty is permitted to make contracts in another, and to sue in its courts," except as to contracts repugnant to its own policy. 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 592 [10: 309].

The manifest injustice which would ensue, if a foreign corporation, permitted by a state to do business therein, and to bring suits in its courts, could not be sued in those courts, and thus, while allowed the benefits, be exempt from the burdens, of the laws of the state, has induced many states to provide by statute that a foreign corporation making contracts within the state shall appoint an agent residing therein, upon whom process may be served in actions 108 upon such contracts. This *court has often held that wherever such a statute exists service upon an agent so appointed is sufficient to support jurisdiction of an action against the foreign corporation, either in the courts of the state, or, when consistent with the acts of Congress, in the courts of the United States held within the state; but it has never held the existence of such a statute to be essential to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 59 U. S. 18 How. 404 [15: 451]; Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 369 [24: 853]; New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Woodworth, 111 U. S. 138, 146 [28: 379, 382]; Shaw v. Quincy Mining Co. [Ex parte Shaw], 145 U. S. 444, 452 [36: 768, 772].

In Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, the court said: "We limit our decision to the case of a corporation acting in a state foreign to its creation, under a law of that state which recognized its existence, for the purposes of making contracts there and being sued on them, through notice to its contracting agents." But it was cautiously added: "The case of natural persons, or of other foreign corporations, is attended with other considerations, which might or might not distinguish it; upon this we give no opinion." 59 U. S. 18 How. 408, 409 [15: 458].

The liability of a foreign corporation to be sued in a particular jurisdiction need not be distinctly expressed in the statutes of that jurisdiction, but may be implied from a grant of authority in those statutes to carry on its business there.

Accordingly, in Baltimore & O. Railroad Co. v. Harris, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 65 [20: 354], the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, a corporation chartered by the state of Maryland, and authorized by the statutes of the state of Virginia to extend its railroad into that state, and also by the act of Congress of March 2, 1831, (4 Stat. at L. 476, chap. 85), to extend, construct, and use a lateral branch of its railroad into and within the District of Columbia, and to exercise the same powers, rights, and privileges, and be subject to the same restrictions in regard thereto, as provided in its charter, was held, by reason of the act of Congress, and of service upon its president in the District of Columbia, to be liable to an action in the District by a passenger for an injury happening in the state of Virginia; although the railroad company was a corporation of the state of Maryland only, and *neither the act of Congress authoriz- [109 ing it to construct and use a branch railroad in the District of Columbia, nor any other act of Congress, had made any provision for bringing suits against foreign corporations, the action having been brought before the passage of the act of February 22, 1867 (14 Stat. at L. 404, chap. 64, § 11); Rev. Stat. D. C. § 790. Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering judgment, said: "If the theory maintained by the counsel for the plaintiff in error be correct, however large or small the cause of action, and whether it were a proper one for legal or equitable cognizance, there could be no legal redress short of the seat of the company in another state. In many instances the cost of the remedy would have largely exceeded the value of its fruits. In suits local in their character, both at law and in equity, there could be no relief. The result would be, to a large extent, immunity from all legal responsibility. It is not to be supposed that Congress intended that the important powers and privileges granted should be followed by such results. But turning our attention from this view of the subject and looking at the statute alone, and reading it by its own light, we entertain no doubt that it made the company liable to suit, where this suit was brought in all respects as if it had been an independent corporation of the same locality." 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 83, 84 [20: 359].

In that case, it is to be observed, the cause of action arose, neither in the state of Maryland, where the defendant was incorporated, nor in the District of Columbia, where the action was brought, but in the state of Virginia. The decision, in principle and in effect, recognizes that a corporation of one state, lawfully doing business in another state, and summoned in an action in the latter state by service upon its principal officer therein, is subject to the jurisdiction of the court in which the action is brought.

In England, the right of a foreign corporation doing business in England to sue in the English courts was long ago recognized; and its liability to be subjected to suit in those courts, by service made upon one of its principal officers residing and representing it within the realm, has been fully established by recent 110]decisions. Newby* v. Von Oppen, L. R. 7 Q. B. 293; Haggin v. Comptoir d' Escompte de Paris, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 519.

In the courts of several states of the Union, the like view has prevailed. Libbey v. Hodgdon, 9 N. H. 394; March v. Eastern Railroad Co. 40 N. H. 548, 579 [77 Am. Dec. 732]; Day v. Essex County Bank, 13 Vt. 97; Moulin v. Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. 25 N. J. L. 57; Bushel v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. 15 Serg. & R. 173; North Missouri Railroad Co. v. Akers, 4 Kan. 453, 469 [16 Am. Dec. 183]; Council Bluffs Canning Co v. Omaha Tinware Mfg. Co. 49 Neb 537. The courts of New York and Massachusetts, indeed, have declined to take jurisdiction of suits against foreign corporations, except so far as it has been expressly conferred by statutes of the state. M'Queen v. Middletown Manuf. Co. 16 Johns. 5; Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. 112 N. Y. 315 [2 L. R. A. 636]; Desper v. Continental Water Met-r Co. 137 Mass. 252. But the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States is not created by, and does not depend upon, the statutes of the several states.

In the circuit courts of the United States, there have been conflicting opinions, but the most satisfactory ones are those of Judge Drummond and Judge Lowell in favor of the liability of foreign corporations to be sued. Wilson Packing Co. v. Hunter, 8 Biss. 429; Hayden v. Androscoggin Mills, 1 Fed. Rep. 93.

In Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, above cited, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Curtis, after saying that a corporation created by one state could transact business in another state only with the consent, express or implied, of the latter state, and that this consent might be accompanied by such conditions as the latter state might think fit to impose, defined the limits of its power in this respect by adding, "and these conditions must be deemed valid and effectual by other states, and by this court, provided they are not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States, or inconsistent with those rules of public law which secure the jurisdiction and authority of each state from encroachment by all others, or that principle of natural justice which forbids condemnation without opportunity for defense." 59 U. S. 18 How. 407 [15: 453].

111] *The object of the provisions of the Constitution and statutes of the United States, in conferring upon the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction of controversies between citizens of different states of the Union, or between citizens of one of the states and aliens, was to secure a tribunal presumed to be more impartial than a court of the state in which one of the litigants resides.

The jurisdiction so conferred upon the national courts cannot be abridged or impaired by any statute of a state. Hyde v. Stone, 61 U. S. 20 How. 170, 175 [15: 874, 876]; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 516 [ante, 819, 838]. It has therefore been decided that a statute which requires all actions against a county to be brought in the county court does not prevent the circuit court of the United States from taking jurisdiction of such an action; Chief Justice Chase saying that "no statute limitation of suability can defeat a jurisdiction given by the Constitution." Mercer County Supers. v. Cowles, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 118, 122 [19: 86, 88]; Lincoln County v. Luning, 133 U. S. 529 [33: 766]; Chicot County v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 529 [37: 546]. So statutes requiring foreign corporations, as a condition of being permitted to do business within the state, to stipulate not to remove into the courts of the United States suits brought against them in the courts of the state, have been adjudged to be unconstitutional and void. Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445 [22: 365]; Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186 [30: 915]; Southern Pacific Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202 [36: 942].

On the other hand, upon the fundamental principle that no one shall be condemned unheard, it is well settled that in a suit against a corporation of one state, brought in a court of the United States held within another state, in which the corporation neither does business, nor has authorized any person to represent it, service upon one of its officers or employees found within the state will not support the jurisdiction, notwithstanding that such service is recognized as sufficient by the statutes or the judicial decisions of the state. St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350 [27: 222]; Fitzgerald & M. Constr. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 137 U. S. 98, 106 [34: 608, 612]; Goldey v. Morning News, 156 U. S. 518 [39: 517]. See also Mexican Central Railway Co. v. Pinkney, 149 U. S. 194 [37: 699].

By the existing act of Congress defining the general jurisdiction *of the circuit courts[112 of the United States, those courts "shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, when the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of two thousand dollars," "in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states," "or a controversy between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens, or subjects;" and, as has been adjudged by this court, the subsequent provisions of the act, as to the district in which suits must be brought, have no application to a suit against an alien or a foreign corporation; but such a person or corporation may be sued by a citizen of a state of the Union in any district in which valid service can be made upon the defendant. Act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. at L. 552, chap. 373, § 1), as corrected by the act of August 13, 1888 (25 Stat. at L. 434, chap. 866, § 1); Shaw v. Quincy Mining Co. [Ex parte Shaw], 145 U. S. 444, 453 [36: 768, 773]; Re Hohorst, 150 U. S. 653 [37: 1211]; Galveston,

H. & S. A. Railway Co. v. Gonzales, 151 U. S. 496, 503 [38: 248, 251]; Re Keasbey & Mattison Co. 160 U. S. 221, 229, 230 [40: 402, 405, 406].

The present action was brought by a citizen and resident of the state of New Jersey, in a circuit court of the United States held within the state of New York, against a foreign corporation doing business in the latter state. It was for a personal tort committed abroad, such as would have been actionable if committed in the state of New York or elsewhere in this country, and an action for which might be maintained in any circuit court of the United States which acquired jurisdiction of the defendant. Baltimore & O. Railroad Co. v. Harris, above cited; Dennick v. Central Railroad Co. 103 U. S. 11 [26: 439]; Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 670, 675 [36: 1123, 1129, 1130]; Stewart v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. 168 U. S. 445 [ante, 537]. The summons was duly served upon the regularly appointed agents of the corporation in New York. Re Hohorst, above cited. The action was within the general jurisdiction conferred by Congress upon the circuit courts of the United States. The fact that the legislature of the state of New York has not seen fit to authorize like suits to be brought in its own courts by citizens and residents of other states cannot deprive such 113] citizens *of their right to invoke the jurisdiction of the national courts under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The necessary conclusion is that the circuit court had jurisdiction to try the action and to render judgment therein against the defendant, and that the question certified must be answered in the affirmative.

Lien upon a tug—when a claim for tort—maritime lien.

1. A lien upon a tug for damages to her tow by negligent towage bringing the tow into collision with a third vessel is to be preferred, in admiralty, to a statutory lien for supplies furnished to the tug in her home port before the collision.
2. A claim by a tow against her tug for damages from coming into collision with a third vessel by reason of negligent towage is a claim in tort.
3. A claim for damages by collision, and a claim for supplies, are both maritime liens.

Argued January 27, 1897. Decided April 18, 1898.

ON A CERTIFICATE from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit certifying a question of law to this court for decision in a pending appeal in admiralty by Edward H. Loud et al., owners of the schooner C. R. Flint, from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York in favor of Frederich H. Gladwish et al., in a libel by Loud et al. for a collision damage. Question answered in the affirmative.

See same case below, 58 Fed. Rep. 792.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

In a pending appeal in admiralty by Edward H. Loud and others, owners of the schooner C. R. Flint, from a decree of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of New York in favor of Frederich H. Gladwish and others, coal merchants under the name of Gladwish, Moquin, & Company, the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit certified to this court a question of the priority of maritime liens on the steamtug John G. Stevens, arising, as the certificate stated, upon the following facts:

"The home port of the tug was New York. Between December 7, 1885, and March 7, 1886, Gladwish, Moquin, & Company furnished coal to the tug in her home port, and filed notices of liens therefor under the laws of the state of New York of 1862, chapter 482, thereby creating statutory liens on her. On March 8, 1886, the tug John G. Stevens was employed in the port of New York to tow the schooner C R. Flint *through the waters of said port, [114 and, while towing, negligently allowed the C. R. Flint to collide with the bark Doris Eckhoff in tow of the tug R. S. Carter.

"On March 16, 1886, Loud and others, owners of the C. R. Flint, libeled the John G. Stevens and the R. S. Carter in admiralty, in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of New York, for the collision damage. On March 16, 1886, Gladwish and others libeled the John G Stevens, in the same court, to enforce their supply lien under the state law. The Loud libel resulted in a decree condemning both tugs for damages exceeding $15,000. The Gladwish libel resulted in a decree condemning the John G Stevens for the coal supplied, and costs, in all $218.07.

"The district court awarded priority to the supply lien, which exhausts the fund resulting from the sale of the John G. Stevens, leaving the Loud decree unsatisfied." 58 Fed. Rep. 792.

Upon these facts, the circuit court of appeals desired the instruction of this court upon this question of law: "Is the lien for the damages occasioned by negligent towage, which arose on March 8, 1886, to be preferred to the previous state lien for supplies, the libel for supplies being filed last?"

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this record is whether a lien upon a tug for damages to her tow, by negligent towage bringing the tow into collision with a third vessel, is to be preferred, in admiralty, to a statutory lien for supplies furnished to the tug in her home port before the collision.

This question may be conveniently divided, in its consideration by the court, as it was in the arguments at the bar, into *two parts: [115 First. Is a claim in tort for damages by a collision entitled to priority over a claim in contract for previous supplies? Second. Is a claim by a tow against her tug, for damages from coming into collision with a third vessel by reason of negligent towage, a claim in tort?

In the case of The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moore, P. C. C. 267, decided in 1852 by the judicial committee of the privy council, upon appeal from the English high court of admiralty, and ever since considered a leading case, both in England and in America, it was adjudged that a collision between two ships by the negligence of one of them created a maritime lien upon or privilege in the offending ship, for the damage done to the other, which attached at the time of the collision, and might be enforced in admiralty by proceedings in rem against the offending ship, even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser; and Chief Justice Jervis, in delivering judgment, said: "A maritime lien does not include or require possession. The word is used in maritime law, not in the strict legal sense in which we understand it in courts of common law, in which case there could be no lien where there was no possession, actual or constructive, but to express, as if by analogy, the nature of claims which neither presuppose nor originate in possession. . . . This claim or privilege travels with the thing, into whatsoever possession it may come. It is inchoate from the moment the claim or privilege attaches, and when carried into effect by legal process, by a proceeding in rem, relates back to the period when it first attached." And, after observing that this rule could not be better illustrated than by the circumstances of The Aline (1839), 1 W. Rob. 111,—in which Dr. Lushington had expressed the opinion that, in a proceeding in rem, the claim for damages must be preferred to a bottomry bond given before the collision, but was not entitled, as against the holder of a like bond given after the collision, to the increased value of the vessel by reason of repairs effected at his cost,—Chief Justice Jervis summed up the matter as follows: "The interest of the first bondholder taking effect from the period when his lien attached, he was, so to speak, a part owner in interest at 116] the date of the collision, *and the ship in which he and others were interested was liable to its value at that date for the injury done, without reference to his claim. So by the collision the interest of the claimant attached, and, dating from that event, the ship in which he was interested, having been repaired, was put in bottomry by the master acting for all parties, and he would be bound by that transaction. This rule, which is simple and intelligible, is, in our opinion, applicable to all cases." 7 Moore, P. C. C. 284, 285.

The decision in The Bold Buccleugh has never been departed from in England, but has been constantly recognized as sound law in the courts exercising admiralty jurisdiction. The Europa, Brown. & L. 89, 91, 97, 2 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 1, 20; The Charles Amelia, L. R. 2 Adm. & Eccl. 330, 333; The City of Mecca, L. R. 6 Prob. Div. 106, 113, 119; The Rio Tinto, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 356, 360; The Dictator [1892] P. 304, 320. And in a very recent case in the House of Lords that decision has been deliberately and finally declared to have established beyond dispute, in the maritime law of Great Britain, that a collision between two vessels by the fault of one of them creates a maritime lien on her for the damage done to the other. Currie v. M'Knight [1897] A. C. 97.

It has been generally laid down in the English text-books that a maritime lien for damages by a collision takes precedence of all earlier maritime liens founded in contract. Abbott, Shipping, Shee's ed. pt. 6, chap. 4, § 2; Coote, Admiralty Practice, 118; Maclachlan, Merchant Shipping, chap. 15; Foard, Merchant Shipping, 217; Marsden, Maritime Collisions, 3d ed. 82. And the English and Irish courts have ever held that a claim for damages from a collision by the negligence of a foreign ship creates a lien upon the whole value of the ship and freight, without deduction for seamen's wages, because, it has been said, the owner of the ship, being personally liable to the seamen for their wages, should not be permitted to deduct expenses for which he is liable, and thus benefit the wrongdoer at the expense of him to whom the wrong has been done. The Elin, L. R. 8 Prob. Div. 39, and 129, and cases there cited.

That a claim for supplies furnished to a vessel should be *preferred to a claim for dam-[117 ages for a subsequent collision appears never to have been even suggested in England, probably because, by the law of England, materialmen, without possession, have no maritime lien for supplies, even to a foreign ship, but a mere right to seize the ship by process in admiralty, in the nature of an attachment. The Rio Tinto, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 356; The Heinrich Bjorn, L. R. 10 Prob. Div. 44, and L. R. 11 App. Cas. 270. "Claims for necessaries," said Dr. Lushington, "do not possess ab origine, a lien; but carry only a statutory remedy against the res, which is essentially different." The Gustaf, 1 Lush. 506, 508.

There can be no doubt, therefore, that in the English admiralty courts the lien for damages by collision would take precedence of an earlier claim for supplies.

In this country, the principle applied in the case of The Bold Buccleugh to a claim for damages by collision, that a maritime lien is created as soon as the claim comes into being, has long been held to be equally applicable to all claims which can be enforced in admiralty against the ship, whether arising out of tort or of contract. General Mut. Packet Co. v. Rock Island R. Bridge], 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 213, 215 [18: 752, 754]; The China [The China v. Walsh], 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 53, 68 [19: 67, 73]; The Siren [The Siren v. United States,] 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 152, 155 [19: 129, 131]; The Lottawanna [Rodd v. Heartt], 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 558, 579 [22: 654, 663]; The J. E. Rumbell, 148 U. S. 1, 10, 11, 20 [37: 345, 347, 350]; The Glide, 167 U. S. 606 [42: 296].

Accordingly, in our own law, it is well established that a maritime lien of privilege, constituting a present right of property in the ship, jus in re, to be afterwards enforced in admiralty by process in rem, arises not only from a collision and for the damages caused thereby (General Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sherwood, The Rock Island Bridge, The Siren, and The China, above cited) but also for necessary supplies or repairs furnished to a vessel, whether under the general maritime law in a foreign port, or according to a local statute in her home port. The Young Mechanic, The Kiersage, The Lottawanna, The J. E. Rumbell, and The Glide, above cited.

*Some years before the decision in The[118 Bold Buccleugh, Mr. Justice Story had clearly recognized the existence of a maritime lien, as well for damages by collision (United States v. The Malek Adhel, 43 U. S. 2 How. 210, 234 [11: 239, 249]) as for supplies in a foreign port, regarding which he observed: "A materialman who furnishes supplies in a foreign port, or to a foreign ship, relies on the ship itself as his security. He may, if he pleases, insist upon a bottomry bond with maritime interest, as the security for his advances; in which case he gives credit exclusively to the ship, and must take upon himself the risk of a successful accomplishment of the voyage. But if he is content with receiving the amount of his advances and common interest, he may rely on that tacit lien or claim which the maritime law gives him upon the ship itself, in addition to the personal security of the owners. Wherever a lien or claim is given upon the thing by the maritime law, the admiralty will enforce it by a proceeding in rem; and, indeed, it is the only court competent to enforce it." The Nestor, 1 Sumn. 73, 78. And it is worthy of note that the last part of this observation was quoted and relied on in the judgment in The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moore, P. C. C. 284.

By our law, then, a claim for damages by collision, and a claim for supplies, are both maritime liens. The question of their comparative rank is now for the first time presented to this court for adjudication; and it has been the subject of conflicting decisions in other courts of the United States, and especially in those held within the state of New York.

In The America (1853) Judge Hall, in the northern district of New York, appears to have held liens for collisions and those for supplies to be of equal rank, without regard to the date when they attached to the ship. 16 Law Rep. 264. A claim for damages by collision has been postponed to an earlier claim for supplies by Judge Brown, in the southern district of New York, in The Amos D Carver, 35 Fed. Rep. 665; but has been preferred to such a claim by Judge Benedict, in the eastern district of New York, and by Mr. Justice Blatchford on appeal, in The R. S. Carter & The John G. Stevens, 38 Fed. Rep. 515, and 40 Fed. Rep. 331. 119]And, in an earlier *case, a claim for collision had been allowed by Judge Benedict a like preference over a previous bottomry bond. Force v. The Pride of the Ocean, 3 Fed. Rep. 162.

The preference due to the lien for damages from collision, over earlier claims founded on contract, has been carried so far as to allow the lien for damages to prevail over the claim of seamen for wages earned before the collision, by Judge Lowell, in the district of Massachusetts, in The Enterprise, 1 Low. Dec. 455; by Judge Nixon, in the district of New Jersey, in The Maria and Elizabeth, 12 Fed. Rep. 627; by Judges Gresham and Jenkins, in the circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit, in The F. H. Stanwood, 9 U. S. App. 15 [49 Fed. Rep. 577, 1 C. C. A. 379]; and by Judge Swan, in the eastern district of Michigan, in The Nettie Woodward, 50 Fed. Rep. 224. The opposite view has been maintained, in the southern district of New York, by Judge Choate, in The Orient, 10 Ben. 620, as well as by Judge Brown, in The Amos D. Carver, 35 Fed. Rep. 665, above cited; and in the eastern district of New York, by Judge Benedict, in The Samuel J. Christian, 16 Fed. Rep. 796; and in the western district of Michigan, by Judge Severens, in The Daisy Day, 40 Fed. Rep. 538.

The case at bar, however, presents no question of the comparative rank of seamen's wages, which may depend upon peculiar considerations, and which, according to the favorite saying of Lord Stowell and of Mr. Justice Story, are sacred liens, and, as long as a plank of the ship remains, the sailor is entitled against all other persons, to the proceeds as a security for his wages. The Madonna D'Idra, 1 Dodson, Adm. Rep. 37, 40; The Sydney Cove, 2 Dodson, Adm. Rep. 11, 13; The Neptune, 1 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 227, 239; Sheppard v. Taylor, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 675, 710 [8: 269, 282]; Brown v. Lull, 2 Sumn. 443, 452; Pitman v. Hooper, 3 Sumn. 50, 58; Abbott, Shipping, pt. 4, chap. 4, § 8; 3 Kent, Com. 197. Yet see Norwich Co. [Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co.] v. Wright, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 104, 122 [20: 585, 591].

Nor does this case present any question as between successive liens for repairs or supplies, the general rule as to which is that they are to be paid in inverse order, because it is for the benefit of all the interests in the ship that she should be kept in condition to be navigated. *Abbott, Shipping, pt. 2, chap. 3, § 32; [120 The St. Jago de Cuba, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 409, 416 [6: 122, 124]; The J. E. Rumbell, 148 U. S. 1, 9 [37: 345, 346]; The Fanny, 2 Low. Dec. 508, 510.

Nor does it present a question of precedence between two claims for distinct and successive collisions, as to which there has been a difference of opinion in the southern district of New York; Judge Choate, in the district court, giving the preference to the later claim upon the ground that the interest created in the vessel by the first collision was subject, like all other proprietary interests in her, to the ordinary marine perils, including the second collision; and Mr. Justice Blatchford, in the circuit court, reversing the decree, because the vessel libeled had not been benefited, but had been injured, by the second collision. The Frank G. Fowler, 8 Fed. Rep. 331, and 17 Fed. Rep. 653.

Nor yet does it present the question whether a lien for repairs made after the collision, so far as they increase the value of the vessel, may be preferred to the lien for the damages by the collision, in accordance with the English cases of The Aline and The Bold Buccleugh, cited at the beginning of this opinion.

But the question we have to deal with is whether the lien for damages by the collision is to be preferred to the lien for supplies furnished before the collision.

The foundation of the rule that collision gives to the party injured a jus in re in the offending ship is the principle of the maritime law that the ship, by whomsoever owned or navigated, is considered as herself the wrongdoer, liable for the tort, and subject to a maritime lien for the damages. This principle, as has been observed by careful text-writers on both sides of the Atlantic, has been more clearly established, and more fully carried out, in this country than in England. Henry, Admiralty, § 75, note; Marsden, Maritime Collisions, 3d ed. 93.

The act of Congress of December 22, 1807, chap. 5, laid an embargo on all ships and vessels within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, bound to any foreign port or place; and the supplemental act of January 9, 1808, chap. 8, § 3, provided that any ship or vessel proceeding, contrary to the provisions of the *act, to a foreign port or place, should be[121 forfeited. 2 Stat. at L. 451, 453. Upon the trial of a libel in the circuit court of the United States to enforce the forfeiture of a vessel under those acts, Chief Justice Marshall said: "This is not a proceeding against the owner; it is a proceeding against the vessel, for an offense committed by the vessel, which is not less an offense, and does not the less subject her to forfeiture, because it was committed without the authority and against the will of the owner." United States v. The Little Charles, 1 Brock. 347, 354.

Upon a libel of information for the condemnation of a piratical vessel, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1819, chap. 77, continued in force by the act of May 15, 1820, chap. 113 (3 Stat. at L. 510, 600), Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion of this court, and referring to seizures in revenue causes, said: "The thing is here primarily considered as the offender, or rather the offense is attached primarily to the thing; and this, whether the offense be malum prohibitum or malum in se. The same principle applies to proceedings in rem, on seizures in the admiralty." The Palmyra, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 1, 14 [6: 531, 535].

In United States v. The Malek Adhel, 43 U. S. 2 How. 210, 233, 234 [11: 239, 249], Mr. Justice Story, in delivering judgment, stated the principle more fully, saying: "It is not an uncommon course in the admiralty, acting under the law of nations, to treat the vessel in which or by which, or by the master or crew thereof, a wrong or offense has been done as the offender, without any regard whatsoever to the personal misconduct or responsibility of the owner thereof. And this is done from the necessity of the case, as the only adequate means of suppressing the offense or wrong, or insuring an indemnity to the injured party." And, after quoting the passages above cited from the opinions in The Little Charles and in The Palmyra, he added: "The ship is also by the general maritime law held responsible for the torts and misconduct of the master and crew thereof, whether arising from negligence or a wilful disregard of duty; as, for example, in cases of collision or other wrongs done upon the high seas, or elsewhere within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, upon the general policy of that law, which looks to the instrument itself, 122]used as the means *of the mischief, as the best and surest pledge for the compensation and indemnity to the injured party."

In The China [The China v. Walsh], 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 53, 68 [19: 67, 73], by the application of the same principle, a ship was held liable for damages by collision through the negligence of a pilot whom she had been compelled by law to take on board; and Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering judgment, said: "The maritime law as to the position and powers of the master, and the responsibility of the vessel, is not derived from the civil law of master and servant, nor from the common law. It had its source in the commercial usages and jurisprudence of the middle ages. Originally, the primary liability was upon the vessel, and that of the owner was not personal, but merely incidental to his ownership, from which he was discharged either by the loss of the vessel or by abandoning it to the creditors. But while the law limited the creditor to this part of the owner's property, it gave him a lien or privilege against it in preference to other creditors. . . . According to the admiralty law, the collision impresses upon the wrongdoing vessel a maritime lien. This the vessel carries with it into whosesoever hands it may come. It is inchoate at the moment of the wrong, and must be perfected by subsequent proceedings."

The same principle has been recognized in other cases. The Jas. Gray v. The John Fraser, 62 U. S. 21 How. 184, 194 [16: 106, 110]; The Merrimac [Creery v. The Eclipse Tow Boat Co.], 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 199 [20: 873]; The Clarita and The Clara [The Clara Clarita v. Cox], 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 1 [23: 146]; Ralli v. Troop, 157 U. S. 386, 402, 403 [39: 742, 750].

That the maritime lien upon a vessel for damages caused by her fault to another vessel takes precedence of a maritime lien for supplies previously furnished to the offending vessel, is a reasonable inference, if not a necessary conclusion, from the decisions of this court, above referred to, the effect of which may be summed up as follows:

The collision, as soon as it takes place, creates, as security for the damages, a maritime lien or privilege, jus in re, a proprietary interest in the offending ship, and which, when enforced by admiralty process in rem, relates back to the time of the collision. The offending ship is considered as herself the wrongdoer, and as herself bound to make compensation for *the wrong done. The owner of the in [123 jured vessel is entitled to proceed in rem against the offender, without regard to the question who may be her owners, or to the division, the nature, or the extent of their interests in her. With the relations of the owners of those interests, as among themselves, the owner of the injured vessel has no concern. All the interests existing at the time of the collision in the offending vessel, whether by way of part-ownership, of mortgage, of bottomry bond, or of other maritime liens for repairs or supplies, arising out of contract with the owners or agents of the vessel, are parts of the vessel herself, and as such are bound by and responsible for her wrongful acts. Anyone who had furnished necessary supplies to the vessel before the collision, and had thereby acquired, under our law, a maritime lien or privilege in the vessel herself, was, as was said in The Bold Buccleugh, before cited, of the holder of an earlier bottomry bond, under the law of England, "so to speak, a part owner in interest at the date of the collision and the ship in which he and others were interested was liable to its value at that date for the injury done, without reference to his claim." 7 Moore, P. C. C. 285.

We are then brought to the question whether a claim by a tow against her tug for damages from coming into collision with a third vessel because of negligent towage is a claim in tort, standing upon the same ground as a claim of the third vessel for damages against the tug.

Upon this question, again, there have been conflicting opinions in the district courts of the United States.

On the one hand, it has been held by Judge Benedict, in the eastern district of New York, in several cases, including the case at bar, that a claim by a tow against her tug for damages caused by the negligence of the latter is founded on a voluntary contract between the owner of the tow and the owner of the tug, and should be postponed to a claim against the tug for necessary supplies or repairs furnished before the contract of towage was made. The Samuel J. Christian, 16 Fed. Rep. 796; The John G. Stevens, 58 Fed. Rep. 792; The Glen Iris, 78 Fed. Rep. 511. The same conclusion has been 124]reached *by Judge Brown, in the southern district of New York, proceeding upon the hypothesis that the security for the maritime obligation created by the contract of towage is subject to all liens already existing upon the vessel, and upon the theory that by the general maritime law liens ex delicto, including all liens for damage by collision, are inferior in the rank of privilege to liens ex contractu. The Grapeshot, 22 Fed. Rep. 123; The Young America, 30 Fed. Rep. 789; The Gratitude, 42 Fed. Rep. 299.

On the other hand, the claim by a tow against her tug for damages caused by negligent towage has been held to be founded in tort, arising out of the duty imposed by law, and independent of any contract made, or consideration paid or to be paid, for the towage, by Mr. Justice Blatchford, when district judge, in The Brooklyn, 2 Ben. 547, and in The Deer, 4 Ben. 352; by Judge Lowell, in The Arturo, 6 Fed. Rep. 308; and by Judge Swing, in the southern district of Ohio, in The Liberty, No. 4, 7 Fed. Rep. 226, 230. In The Arturo, Judge Lowell said: "These cases of tow against tug are, in form and fact, very like collision cases. The contract gives rise to duties very closely resembling those which one vessel owes to others which it may meet. There is, therefore, an analogy between the two classes of cases so close that the tow may sue, in one proceeding for damage, her own tug and a strange vessel with which there has been a collision." 6 Fed. Rep. 312. And it has accordingly been held, by Judge Nixon, and by Judge Severens, that such a claim by a tow against her tug is entitled to priority of payment over liens on the tug for previous repairs or supplies. The M. Vandercook, 24 Fed. Rep. 472, 478; The Daisy Day, 40 Fed. Rep. 538.

The decisions of this court are in accordance with the latter view, and are inconsistent with any other.

It was argued that the liability of a tug for the loss of her tow was analogous to the liability of a common carrier for the loss of the goods carried. But even an action by a passenger, or by an owner of goods, against a carrier, for neglect to carry and deliver in safety, is an action for the breach of a duty imposed 125] *by law, independently of contract or of consideration, and is therefore founded in tort. Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. v. Derby, 55 U. S. 14 How. 468, 485 [14: 502, 509]; Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Co. v. Laird, 164 U. S. 393 [41: 485].

In Norwich Co. [Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co.] v. Wright, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 104, 122 [20: 585, 591], Mr. Justice Bradley, referring to Maclachlan on Shipping, 1st ed. 598, laid down these general propositions: "Liens for reparation for wrong done are superior to any prior liens for money borrowed, wages, pilotage, etc. But they stand on an equality with regard to each other if they arise from the same cause." Although these propositions went beyond what was required for the decision of that case, which was one of a collision between two vessels, owing to the fault of one of them, causing the loss of her cargo, as well as of the other vessel and her cargo, yet the very point adjudged was that the lien on the offending vessel for the loss of her own cargo was a lien for reparation of damage, and therefore was upon an equality with the lien upon her for the loss of the other vessel and her cargo.

This court, more than once, has directly affirmed that a suit by the owner of a tow against her tug, to recover for an injury to the tow by negligence on the part of the tug, is a suit ex delicto and not ex contractu.

In The Quickstep [The Quickstep v. Byrne], 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 665, 670 [19: 767, 769], a libel by the owner of a tow against her tug set forth a contract with the tug, for a stipulated price, to tow directly, and a deviation and unreasonable delay in its performance, and that the tug negligently backed into the tow and injured her. An objection that the libel could not be maintained, because the contract alleged was not proved, was overruled by this court. Mr. Justice Davis, in delivering judgment, said: "The libel was not filed to recover damages for the breach of a contract, as is contended, but to obtain compensation for the commission of a tort. It is true it asserts a contract of towage, but this is done by way of inducement to the real grievance complained of, which is the wrong suffered by the libellant in the destruction of his boat by the carelessness and mismanagement of the captain of the Quickstep."

*Again, in The Syracuse [The Syracuse 126 v. Langley], 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 167, 171 [20: 382, 384], which was a libel by a tug against her tow for negligently bringing her into collision with a vessel at anchor, the court, speaking by the same justice, said: "It is unnecessary to consider the evidence relating to the contract of towage, because, if it be true, as the appellant says, that, by special agreement, the canal boat was being towed at her own risk, nevertheless the steamer is liable, if, through the negligence of those in charge of her, the canal boat has suffered loss. Although the policy of the law has not imposed on the towing boat the obligation resting on a common carrier, it does require, on the part of the persous engaged in her management, the exercise of reasonable care, caution, and maritime skill, and if these are neglected, and disaster occurs, the towing boat must be visited with the consequences." And see The J. P. Donaldson, 167 U. S. 599, 603 [42: 292, 295].

The essential likeness between the ordinary case of a collision between two ships and the liability of a tug to her tow for damages caused to the latter by a collision with a third vessel, is exemplified by the familiar practice in admiralty (followed in the very proceeding in which the question now before us arose), which allows the owner of a tow, injured by a collision caused by the conduct of her tug and of another vessel, to sue both in one libel, and to recover against either or both, according to the proof at the hearing. The Alabama and The Gamecock [The Alabama v. De Las

Casas], 92 U. S. 695 [23:763]; The Atlas [The Phœnix Ins. Co. v. The Atlas], 93 U. S. 302 [23:863]; The L. P. Dayton [McNally v. The L. P. Dayton], 120 U. S. 337 [30:669]; The R. S. Carter & The John G. Stevens, 38 Fed. Rep. 515, and 40 Fed. Rep. 331.

The result of applying to the case at bar the principles of the maritime law of the United States, as heretofore declared by this court, is that the lien for the damages occasioned by negligent towage must be preferred to the previous lien for supplies.

In the argument of this case, copious references were made to foreign codes and commentaries, which we have not thought it important to consider, because they differ among themselves as to the comparative rank of various maritime liens, and because the general maritime law is in force in this country, 127] *or in any other, so far only as administered in its courts or adopted by its own laws and usages. The Lottawanna [Rodd v. Heartt], 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 558, 572 [22:654, 661]; The Belgenland [The Belgenland v. Jensen], 114 U. S. 355, 369 [29:152, 157]; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 444 [32:788, 792]; Ralli v. Troop, 157 U. S. 386, 407 [39:742, 751].

Question certified answered in the affirmative.

LOUISVILLE WATER COMPANY, Plff. in Err., v. COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 127-133.)

Exemption from taxation.

The exemption from taxation acquired by the Louisville Water Company under the Kentucky law of 1882, which required it to furnish water to the city of Louisville for fire protection free of charge, although withdrawn by the law of 1886, continued as to taxes which were assessed and became due prior to the time when the act of 1886 took effect.

Argued January 11, 1898. Decided April 11, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Jefferson Circuit Court in favor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, plaintiff, against the Louisville Water Company, for the recovery of a lien for taxes amounting to $12,875. Reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

See same case below, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 620.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. L. Burnett, for plaintiff in error, cited the following authorities:

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the commonwealth of Kentucky to enforce a lien in its favor upon certain real and personal property of the Louisville Water Company, a Kentucky corporation, which lien, it was alleged, was for taxes amounting to $12,875 for the year 1886, The property upon which the state claimed this lien included the pipes, mains, buildings, reservoirs, engines, pumping stations, etc., belonging to the Water Company.

The company denied its liability to state taxation for the year 1886 or for any year subsequent to the 22d day of April, 1882, *the[128 date of the passage of an act to which we will presently refer.

In the court of original jurisdiction a judgment was rendered for the commonwealth, and that judgment was affirmed in the court of appeals of Kentucky.

The history of the legislation in Kentucky in reference to this company appears in Louisville Water Company v. Clark, 143 U. S. 1 [36:55],—a suit involving the question of the liability of the company for state and county taxes for the year 1887.

The Water Company was incorporated in 1854 without any exemption of its property from taxation. But, as stated in that case, it

By an act approved February 14, 1856, it was provided that "all charters and grants of or to corporations, or amendments thereof, and all other statutes, shall be subject to amendment or repeal at the will of the legislature, unless a contrary intent be therein plainly expressed: Provided, that whilst privileges and franchises so granted may be changed or repealed, no amendment or repeal shall impair other rights previously vested." 2 Rev. Stat. Ky. 121.

Subsequently, by an act approved April 22, 1882, which took effect from its passage, it was made "the duty of the Louisville Water Company to furnish water to the public fire cisterns and public fire plugs or hydrants of the city of Louisville for fire protection, free of charge." But the same act provided: "The sinking fund of the city of Louisville being the owner of the stock of the Louisville Water Company, and said Water Company by virtue thereof is the property of the city of Louisville, therefore the Louisville Water Company is hereby exempt from the payment of taxes of [129] all kinds, of *whatever character, state, municipal, or special." Sess. Acts 1882, vol. 1, p. 915.

On the 17th of May, 1886, the general assembly of Kentucky passed a general revenue statute—commonly known as the Hewitt statute—which did not take effect until September 14, 1886, after taxes were assessed for 1886. It was conceded in the case of Louisville Water Company v. Clark, above cited, that the property of the Water Company was subject to taxation under that statute, unless it was exempted from taxation by the above act of April 22, 1882.

The contention of the Water Company was that the exemption from taxation given by the act of 1882 could not be withdrawn by subsequent legislation without violating the contract clause of the Constitution of the United States. This contention made it necessary to inquire whether that exemption was in fact withdrawn, and if so, whether the statute withdrawing it impaired the obligation of any contract the company had with the state by the act of 1882.

This court held that the exemption allowed by the act of 1882 was withdrawn by the revenue statute of 1886; and that, as the Water Company's exemption was acquired in 1882 subject to the power of amendment or repeal reserved by the above act of 1856—which saved, whenever that power was exerted, all rights previously vested—the state could, as it did by the revenue statute of 1886, withdraw the exemption given in 1882.

But the question remained whether the withdrawal of the exemption could take effect while the company was under an obligation imposed upon it by the act of 1882, to furnish water to the public fire cisterns and public fire plugs or hydrants of the city of Louisville for fire protection, "free of charge." The court was of opinion that the contention of the Water Company, that the general statute of 1886 impaired the obligation of its alleged contract, could not be fully disposed of without determining the question just stated. It therefore said:

"It is, however, contended that the exemption from taxation could not be withdrawn while the Water Company *remained under the [130] obligation imposed by the 1st section of the act of 1882 to furnish water to the city for fire protection, free of charge. But no such obligation remained after the passage of the act of 1886, which, as we have seen, had the effect to withdraw the immunity from taxation granted by the second section of the act of 1882. In determining the object and scope of the act of 1882 we must look at all of its provisions. The Water Company was under a duty by its charter, passed before the act of 1856, to furnish water for the extinguishment of fires and the cleansing of streets, not free of charge, but upon such terms as might be agreed upon by it and the city. And the legislature certainly did not assume to impose upon it the obligation to furnish water, for fire protection, free of charge, except in connection with the grant to it of immunity from taxation. Accepting, however, the benefits of this exemption from taxation, it became bound to supply water for public purposes free of charge. But that obligation remained only so long as the exemption continued in force. The act of 1882 is to be regarded as an entirety, and meant nothing more than that the company should furnish water for fire protection, free of charge, so long as the immunity from taxation continued. This view is in harmony with the act of 1856, which expressly declares that whilst privileges and franchises granted to corporations, after its passage, could be changed or repealed, no amendment or repeal should impair other rights previously vested. The effect of the withdrawal of the immunity from taxation was, therefore, to leave the Water Company in the position it was before the passage of the act of 1882 in respect to its right to charge for water furnished for public fire cisterns, fire plugs, or hydrants." 143 U. S. 15, 17 [36:59,60].

It was thus adjudged that the statute of 1886 did not affect the company's exemption from taxation so long as the act of 1882 was in operation; in other words, the exemption, by force of the act of 1882, continued until the statute of 1886 took effect, but no longer. Under this view, the company was held liable to pay taxes assessed for 1887, although not liable for taxes accruing before the statute of 1886 took effect.

*But it is contended that this court [131] should accept the views expressed by the court of appeals of Kentucky in the former case as to the scope and effect of the act of 1882. Clark v. Louisville Water Co. 90 Ky. 515, 519. In that case two questions were raised in the state court; first, that if it were true that the legislature was moved to the passage of the act of 1882 upon the idea of the rendition of a public service, the company rendered no such public service as the Constitution of Kentucky contemplated, when it declared, in its Bill of Rights, that "no man or set of men are entitled exclusive, separate, public emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services;" second, that this was not the reason for the passage of that act, and that the exemption from taxation was unsupported by any valid consideration, or such as the Constitution recognized. The court waived any consideration of the first question,—stating that there was a difference of opinion upon it,—and held that the sole consideration which moved the legislature to pass the act of 1882 was the fact that the city of Louisville owned the stock of the Water Company. Touching that question the court of appeals of Kentucky said in the former case: "The fact that the furnishing of the water may incidentally protect from fire the public buildings of the state will not support the exemption The privilege was not conferred, as the legislature declared, and as we have otherwise shown, for governmental purposes, but merely for a reason which will not support it. It arose out of considerations relating to the private and pecuniary advantage of the city, and in which the state at large had no interest." Again: "If it be said that the exemption should be upheld if it be, in fact, supported by any valid consideration, although the recited one be invalid, we reply that the real consideration, and the one which moved the parties to the transaction is to be regarded. The one acted upon by the legislature, and expressed in the act, and which must have been understood by the city, was the simple fact that it owned the stock in the Water Company. This was not a valid consideration, and we have already seen that mere incidental protection of the public buildings [132] does not aid the matter. The so-called contract was therefore void at its inception. Instead of being impaired in any way forbidden by law, it never had any existence; and it seems to us well that we feel at liberty to so declare, because we have a general law taxing water companies, and if one company be exempt, that of any other city has an equal right to ask the same privilege. A statute exempting one is certainly open to the objection of impolicy, if, indeed, it be not such unequal and partial legislation as is forbidden by law."

The grounds upon which the state court overruled the contention of the Water Company in the former case were not overlooked And it was, in effect, there adjudged, as the above extract from the opinion of this court shows, that the exemption given by the act of 1882 was partly, at least, in consideration of the agreement of the company to furnish water to the public fire cisterns, plugs, and hydrants "free of charge," and not, as provided in the company's charters, upon such terms as might be agreed upon between it and the city; that this obligation of the company continued while its exemption from taxation continued; and consequently, that such exemption, being a vested right under the act of 1882, to be withdrawn only by statute having a prospective operation, could not be withdrawn except as to taxes accruing after the statute of 1886 took effect.

It is to be observed that the court of appeals in its opinion in the present case states that the authority for reporting to the county court clerk the tax list for 1886 of property omitted to be listed with the auditor, was to be found in the Hewitt bill, which was passed, as we have seen, after the enactment of the act of 1882.

The argument in behalf of the commonwealth in the present case, in effect, calls for a reconsideration of what was said in the former case. We do not regard such reconsideration as necessary; and upon the authority of the decision in the former case, we adjudge that the exemption from taxation acquired by the Water Company under the act of 1882 was not withdrawn except from the day on which the statute of 1886 took effect. It results that the company cannot be held for taxes which [133] were assessed and became due prior to September 14, 1886, when the Hewitt act took effect. The petition of the commonwealth of Kentucky should have been dismissed.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

AMERICAN SURETY COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Plff. in Err.,

v.

FREDERICK N. PAULY, as Receiver of the California National Bank of San Diego, California. (No. 1.)

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 133-160.)

Construction of bond—notice to the obligor—cashier of bank—constructive notice—knowledge of principal—acts of agent—false representations—ledger, when evidence—teller's book—proofs of loss.

1. A bond made by a surety company insuring a bank against any fraud or dishonesty of its cashier, if susceptible of two constructions, one favorable to the bank and the other favorable to the surety company, will be given the former construction, when it was drawn by the attorneys, officers, or agents of the surety company.
2. A provision of such bond requiring written notice to the obligor of any act of the cashier involving loss to the bank, to be given as soon as practicable after the bank has knowledge of such act, does not require notice upon mere suspicion, but only after the bank has knowledge of such facts as would justify the charge of fraud and dishonesty against the cashier.
3. A cashier of a national bank is not retired from its service by its closing its doors, and the entry of the bank examiner upon an investigation of its affairs, so as to fix the time for notice of a claim under a bond guaranteeing the bank against the cashier's fraud or dishonesty, but he remains in its service until the appointment and qualification of a receiver.

4. A bank cannot be deemed to have had constructive notice that its president gave a certificate to enable its cashier to procure a bond insuring his fidelity, where it was not the duty or business of the president, and there was no usage of the bank allowing him to give the certificate.

5. The presumption that the agent informed his principal of that which his duty and the interests of his principal required him to communicate does not arise where the agent acts or makes declarations, not in execution of any duty that he owes to the principal, nor within any authority possessed by him, but to subserve simply his own personal ends or to commit some fraud against the principal.

6. In such cases the principal is not bound by the acts or declarations of the agent unless it be proved that he had at the time actual notice of them, or, having received notice of them, failed to disavow what was assumed to be said and done in his behalf.

7. False representations as to the honesty of a cashier who applies to a surety company for a bond, made by the president of the bank, not in the course of the business of the bank nor within any authority which he possessed, but in pursuance of a scheme between him and the cashier to defraud the bank,—will not be chargeable to the bank or defeat the liability on the bond.

8. The ledger account of the president of the bank and the teller's book are admissible in evidence when duly authenticated, in an action against the surety company on its bond guaranteeing the bank against the fraud or dishonesty of the cashier.

9. Proofs mailed by the receiver of a national bank on June 24, of a loss by fraud of the cashier discovered the latter part of May, are made "as soon as practicable," within the meaning of the cashier's bond, where notice in writing was given to the surety company as soon as the loss was discovered, with a request for blanks to make proofs of loss upon, and such blanks were mailed by the surety company on May 31.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, in favor of the plaintiff, Frederick N. Pauly, as receiver of the California National Bank, against the American Surety Company of New York, defendant, for the amount of a bond given by defendant insuring the bank against the fraud or dishonesty of its cashier. Judgments of Circuit Court and Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed.

See same case below, 38 U. S. App. 254, 72 Fed. Rep. 470.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walter D. Davidge, Henry C. Willcox, and W. D. Davidge, Jr., for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Edward Winslow Paige for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error as receiver of the California National Bank of San Diego, California, brought this action against the plaintiff in error, a corporation of New York, upon a bond of the latter for $15,000 guaranteeing or insuring the bank, subject to certain conditions, against any act of fraud or dishonesty committed by George N. O'Brien in his position as cashier of that institution.

This bond was based upon an application by O'Brien to the Surety Company accompanied by written declarations and *answers to [135 questions relating to his age, history, habits, financial condition, etc. He presented with the application the following certificate, signed by J. W. Collins as president of the bank: "I have read the foregoing declarations and answers made by George N. O'Brien, and believe them to be true. He has been in the employ of this bank during three years; and to the best of my knowledge has always performed his duties in a faithful and satisfactory manner. His accounts were last examined on the 28th day of March, 1891, and found correct in every respect. He is not, to my knowledge, at present, in arrears or in default. I know nothing of his habits or antecedents affecting his title to general confidence, or why the bond he applies for should not be granted to him."

The bond was executed July 1, 1891. After reciting that the employee, O'Brien, had been appointed in the service of the employer the bank, had been assigned to the office or position of cashier, and had applied to the American Surety Company of New York for a bond, it provided:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the sum of seventy-five dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, in hand paid to the company, as a premium for the term of twelve months ending on the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, at 12 o'clock noon, it is hereby declared and agreed that, subject to the provision herein contained, the company shall, within three months next after notice, accompanied by satisfactory proof, of a loss, as hereinafter mentioned, has been given to the company, make good and reimburse to the employer all and any pecuniary l ss sustained by the employer, of moneys, securities, or other personal property in the possession of the employee, or for the possession of which he is responsible, by any act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of the employee, in connection with the duties of the office or position hereinbefore referred to, or the duties to which in the employer's service he may be subsequently appointed, and occurring during the continuance of this bond, and discovered during said continuance, or within six months thereafter, and within six months from the death or dismissal or retirement of the employee from the service of *the employer. It being understood that[136 a written statement of such loss, certified by the duly authorized officer or representative of the employer, and based upon the accounts of the employer, shall be prima facie evidence thereof. Provided always, that the company shall not be liable, by virtue of this bond, for any mere error of judgment or injudicious exercise of discretion on the part of the employee, in and about all or any matters, wherein he shall have been vested with discretion, either by instruction, or rules and regulations of the employer. And it is expressly understood and agreed that the company shall in no way be held liable hereunder to make good any loss which may accrue to the employer by reason of any act or thing done, or left undone, by the employee, in obedience to, or in pursuance of, any direction, instruction, or authorization conveyed to and received by him from the employer or its duly authorized officer in that behalf; and it is expressly understood and agreed that the company shall in no way be held liable hereunder to make good any loss, by robbery or otherwise, that the employer may sustain, except by the direct act or connivance of the employee.

"The following provisions are to be observed and binding as a part of this bond:

"That the company shall be notified in writing, at its office in the city of New York, of any act on the part of the employee, which may involve a loss for which the company is responsible hereunder, as soon as practicable after the occurrence of such act shall have come to the knowledge of the employer. That any claim made in respect of this bond shall be in writing, addressed to the company, as aforesaid, as soon as practicable after the discovery of any loss for which the company is responsible hereunder, and within six months after the expiration or cancelation of this bond as aforesaid. And upon the making of such claim, this bond shall wholly cease and determine as regards any liability for any act or omission of the employee committed subsequent to the making of such claim, and shall be surrendered to the company on payment of such claim."

137] *"That if the company shall so elect, this bond may be canceled at any time by giving one month's notice to the employer, and refunding the premium paid, less a pro rata part thereof for the time said bond shall have been in force, remaining liable for all or any default covered by this bond, which may have been committed by the employee, up to the date of such determination, and discovered and notified to the company within the limit of time hereinbefore provided for.

"That the employer shall, if required by the company, and as soon thereafter as it can reasonably be done, give all such aid and information as may be possible (at the cost and expense of the company), for the purpose of prosecuting and bringing the employee to justice, or for aiding the company in suing for and making effort to obtain reimbursement by the employee or his estate, of any moneys which the company shall have paid or become liable to pay by virtue of this bond.

"That no suit or proceeding at law or in equity shall be brought to recover any sum hereby insured, unless the same is commenced within one year from the time of the making of any claim on the company."

"It is further agreed that this bond may at the option of the employer be continued in force from year to year at the same premium rate as long as the company shall consent to receive the same, in which case the company shall remain liable for any dishonest act of the employee occurring between the original date of this bond and the time to which it shall have been continued."

On the application of Collins a bond, with like conditions, was made the same day by the Surety Company in the penalty of $25,000 guaranteeing the bank against loss by any act of fraud or dishonesty on his part as its President.

The complaint set out certain acts of fraud and dishonesty by O'Brien in his office of cashier whereby, it was alleged, the bank lost an amount in excess of that named in the bond. All the material allegations of the complaint were denied by the answer. The result of the trial was a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $16,847.50, which was the amount of the *bond with interest; also for [138 $385.73 costs and $202.16 interest on the verdict; in all, $17,435.39. That judgment was affirmed in the circuit court of appeals. 38 U. S. App. 254.

Upon certain issues in the case there was a decided conflict in the evidence, particularly as to the time when the receiver first discovered that O'Brien as cashier had commited an act that might involve a loss for which the Surety Company would be liable and of which it was entitled to be notified in writing as soon as practicable after the occurrence of such act came to the knowledge of the bank.

In view, however, of the verdict, and assuming that the jury had due regard to the instructions of the court, the following facts may be regarded as established by the evidence:

On the 13th and 14th days of October, 1891, O'Brien, being cashier, fraudulently and dishonestly placed to the credit of Collins, the president of the bank, two sums, $20,000 and $24,500.

The bank suspended business on the 12th day of November, 1891, at which time Collins had to his credit on its books only $11,420.90. Of the above sums aggregating $44,500 falsely credited to him, he drew out, on his own checks, $33,029.10, which was wholly lost to the bank.

Immediately upon the suspension of the bank an examiner appointed by the comptroller of the currency (Rev. Stat. § 5240) entered upon an investigation of its affairs.

On the 18th day of December, 1891, Pauly was appointed receiver (Rev. Stat. §§ 5205, 5234), and, having qualified as such, took possession on the 29th day of December, 1891, of the books, papers, and assets of the bank—continuing its employees in his service for a short time.

O'Brien remained in service under the receiver until about March 2, 1892, when he left because the receiver declined to pay his salary—the latter saying that he would regard it as credited or paid on any indebtedness of O'Brien's to the bank.

During January, February, and March, 1892, there was a general examination of the books of the bank under the direction of the receiver. And about April 1, 1892, one Bloodgood, an expert bookkeeper, in connection with another *bookkeeper, entered upon a par [139 ticular examination of such books, with a view of ascertaining the transactions of Collins while he was president. Collins died March 3, 1892. Towards the end of May these experts made certain discoveries involving the fidelity and integrity of O'Brien as cashier, of which Bloodgood gave notice to the receiver. The fact thus discovered related to the false credits which, as above stated, O'Brien as cashier had given to Collins on the books of the bank.

It is to be taken upon this record, after the verdict of the jury, that although the general examination of the bank's books in January, February, and March, 1892, indicated that there were probably irregularities in the conduct of the bank's business, the receiver was not aware of "the amounts and special conditions" of such irregularities nor of any specific act of fraud or dishonesty upon the part of the cashier, until the expert bookkeepers had completed their examination of the books of the bank about May 23, 1892, on which day the receiver wrote to the Surety Company, giving notice of the discovery of fraud that entitled him as receiver to look to that company upon its bonds for the fidelity and integrity of Collins and O'Brien. That letter was as follows: "I write to notify you that the California National Bank held a bond to the amount of $20,000 in its favor for the faithful performance of duties by J. W. Collins, its late president, also in favor for the faithful performance of duties by George N. O'Brien, its cashier, for $15,000. I therefore notify you that a discovery of fraud has been made of sufficient amount to require the payment of those indemnity bonds to the undersigned receiver of the California National Bank. I therefore ask that you forward us the necessary blanks to make the claim or claims in proper form."

This letter appears to be undated, but the time is shown by the following letter, dated May 31, and addressed by the vice president of the Surety Company to the receiver: "We are this morning in receipt of your letter of the 23d inst., stating that you have discovered fraud on the part of J. W. Collins, late president of the California National Bank, and on the 140]*part of George N. O'Brien, late cashier of said bank, sufficient to require payment by this company under bonds heretofore issued upon the parties named in favor of the said California National Bank. I transmit herewith two claim blanks with three continuation sheets with each, upon which please itemize any claim you may have to present under the bond of J. W. Collins; also upon the bonds of George N. O'Brien, showing the precise dates of alleged embezzlements on the part of said John W. Collins and said George N. O'Brien, and the amounts thereof; after which please attest the same under oath and transmit to this office, furnishing to our inspector, Mr. Bradbury Williams, who will call upon you, a duplicate statement of the items, with the dates thereto attached, so that he may be able to verify the account. Will you also please inform me where George N. O'Brien is at present, and whether you have made a formal demand upon him for the amount alleged to be due, and whether he has refused to pay the same; also the date of said demand; and if made in writing will you please send us a copy of said demand and furnish a copy to our inspector, Mr. Bradbury Williams. We desire to have you perfect your claims with the utmost expedition, and when received they will be duly considered."

Under date of June 24, 1892, the receiver wrote to the vice president of the Surety Company: "In reply to yours of the 31st ult., I hand you herewith two affidavits in regard to the embezzlement of the late J. W. Collins and George N. O'Brien, furnished after consultation with my legal adviser, as giving information fuller than I otherwise could do by using the blank sent me in your favor of above date. Mr. G. N. O'Brien is still living in San Diego city. A formal demand was made upon him in writing for the amounts embezzled by his aid and assistance from the California National Bank, to which he has as yet made no reply. The affidavit herein relative to J. W. Collins includes an item of $10,000 discovered after making the affidavit sent you before. Duplicate affidavits and copy of the demand made upon G. N. O'Brien will be furnished your Mr. Bradbury Williams when he calls. *Trusting you will find this [141 statement explicit enough for your purpose, and that we may in the near future receive payment as required under the bonds that should guarantee the California National Bank against loss on the part of the hereinbefore-mentioned J. W. Collins and George N. O'Brien."

The questions of law presented for consideration will be better understood if the following additional facts be stated:

With the above letter of June 24, 1892, was an affidavit of the receiver called in the record "Proof of claim." That document stated among other things that on the 13th and 14th days of October, 1891, O'Brien, as cashier, made entries of the deposit tags, and caused to be entered in the books of the bank credits in favor of Collins amounting to $45,000 without Collins paying any consideration therefor, and without being entitled thereto, as O'Brien well knew; that the nature, extent, amount, and circumstances connected with these wrongful acts of O'Brien had come to the knowledge of the receiver and of the bank since the 1st day of February, 1892; that O'Brien was not entitled to any credits, and the bank was not indebted to him in any sum; that at the date of the suspension of the bank his account was overdrawn, and he was at that date indebted to the bank; that the above statements as to his wrongful, unlawful, and fraudulent acts as cashier of the bank between the 1st of July, 1891, and the 12th of November, 1891, the last date being the date of the suspension of the bank, included all the money misappropriated, wrongful and improper entries and fraudulent and wrongful conduct upon the part of O'Brien that had come to the knowledge of the receiver, and constituted a true and correct statement of the account between him and the bank.

On the same day, June 24, 1892, the receiver mailed to the Surety Company a written notice containing substantially the same statements as were contained in the above affidavit, and concluding: "That in pursuance of a certain bond numbered 85,565, heretofore issued by your company in which you agree to make good and reimburse the said California National Bank of San Diego all and any pecuniary loss 142] sustained during the *continuance of the bond on account of the fraud or dishonesty of the said G. N. O'Brien, after a written statement of said loss is presented, this notice is given by the undersigned, Frederick N. Pauly, receiver of the California National Bank of San Diego, appointed such receiver December 18, 1891, by the controller of the currency of the United States, and attached hereto is a statement of the loss, duly certified by the said receiver, now representative of said employer named in said bond; that said George N. O'Brien is insolvent; that demand in writing has been made upon him that he reimburse and repay to said bank the amounts hereinbefore dishonestly and fraudulently obtained of said bank, which he has refused to do. This notice is given you as soon as practicable after the occurrence of the wrongful acts hereinbefore referred to and demand is hereby made upon you by the undersigned, as representative of said bank and as such receiver, for the sum of fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000), the amount in said bond stipulated."

On the 8th day of July, 1892, the Surety Company addressed to the receiver the following letter: "We are in receipt of your two letters of the 24th ultimo, transmitting two affidavits relative to the claim under the bonds of this company to the California National Bank for J. W. Collins and George N. O'Brien in the respective positions of president and cashier of said bank. We have respectfully to request that you will make a statement of each on the claim forms which we use for that purpose, two of which are herewith inclosed. We desire full information in regard to the shortages and credits, of every kind whatever, whether on account of salary due, money paid, or assignments made by either of said persons to the California National Bank. If there has been any action brought against Mr. George N. O'Brien, or any correspondence between the bank or you with either of the persons in regard to the matter, we should be pleased to have copies thereof."

To this letter the receiver, under date of July 18, 1892, made the following reply: "In reply to yours of the 8th instant relative to my claim under the bonds of your company to the 143]*California National Bank for J. W. Collins and G. N. O'Brien, I beg to herewith send you a statement of account of J. W. Collins, showing the amount of his deficiency to be $374,978.22. A list of the property assigned by J. W. Collins to the California National Bank with the estimation of the value thereof. J. W. Collins under the name of Dare & Collins is a defaulter to the bank in the sum of $348,703.52 in addition to the amount above stated. An itemized statement of the account can also be forwarded you if desired. With regard to G. N. O'Brien, no action has been brought against him, because he is execution proof. In reply to my demand for payment for the amounts embezzled by J. W. Collins during the term covered by these bonds, he replied as per copy of his letter herewith inclosed. In compliance with the request of the U. S. Attorney I appeared before the grand jury and testified as to the state of facts that existed implicating G. N. O'Brien in the defalcations with J. W. Collins. What action the grand jury will take has not yet transpired. Trusting that these statements will meet your requirements, I am, etc."

Other letters passed between the receiver and the company, in respect to which it is only necessary to observe that the company retained the proofs of loss sent to it without objecting that they did not sufficiently indicate the nature and extent of the claim made by the receiver. Finally, the receiver, writing to the vice president of the company, under date of September 21, 1892, said: "There has been so much delay in this matter that I have placed it, under the direction of the controller, in the hands of the U. S. Attorney in New York, Edward Mitchell, Esq., with instructions to collect the same." The company in reply expressed their gratification that when taking up the matter finally it could deal with the United States in New York on the merits of the case.

In the light of the facts, as above stated, we come to the consideration of the controlling questions of law presented for determination. These questions depend largely upon the interpretation to be given to the provisions of the bond in suit.

*If, looking at all its provisions, the [144 bond is fairly and reasonably susceptible of two constructions, one favorable to the bank and the other favorable to the Surety Company, the former, if consistent with the objects for which the bond was given, must be adopted, and this for the reason that the instrument which the court is invited to interpret was drawn by the attorneys, officers, or agents of the Surety Company. This is a well established rule in the law of insurance. First National Bank v. Hartford F. Insurance Co. 95 U. S. 673 [24: 563]; Western Ins. Co. v. Cropper, 32 Pa. 351, 355; Reynolds v. Commerce Fire Ins. Co. 47 N. Y. 597, 604; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 666 [32: 308, 311]; Fowkes v. Manchester Life Assur. & Loan Asso. 3 Best & S. 917, 925. As said by Lord St. Leonards in Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 4 H. L. Cas. 483, 507, "It [a life policy] is of course prepared by the company, and if therefore there should be any ambiguity in it, must be taken, according to law, most strongly against the person who prepared it." There is no sound reason why this rule should not be applied in the present case. The object of the bond in suit was to indemnify or insure the bank against loss arising from any act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of O'Brien in connection with his duties as cashier, or with the duties to which in the employer's service he might be subsequently appointed. That object should not be defeated by any narrow interpretation of its provisions, nor by adopting a construction favorable to the company if there be another construction equally admissible under the terms of the instrument executed for the protection of the bank.

It was contended in the court below, as it is here, that the receiver did not comply with that provision of the bond requiring written notice to be given to the company, at its office in New York, of any act on the part of O'Brien

"which may involve a loss for which the company is responsible hereunder, as soon as practicable after the occurrence of such act shall have come to the knowledge of the employer." The company insists that the receiver in January, February, March, and April, 1892, had such information in respect of the acts of O'Brien as cashier as made it his duty long be-145]fore *his letter of May 23, 1892, to give the required notice to the company. Upon this part of the case Judge Wallace, referring to the clause of the policy requiring notice of acts that might involve loss to the defendant, said to the jury: "Under that condition of the policy the defendant was entitled to notice in writing of any act of the cashier which came to the knowledge of the plaintiff of a fraudulent or a dishonest character as soon as practicable after the plaintiff acquired knowledge. It is not sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's right of action upon the policy that it be shown that the plaintiff may have had suspicions of dishonest conduct of the cashier; but it was plaintiff's duty under the policy, when it came to his knowledge, when he was satisfied that the cashier had committed acts of dishonesty or fraud likely to involve loss to the defendant under the bond, as soon as was practicable thereafter to give written notice to the defendant. Now, the written notice, the first written notice, was given on the 23d day of May, 1892. And in considering this issue you are to inquire, first, when it was that the plaintiff became satisfied that the cashier had committed dishonest or fraudulent acts which might render the defendant liable under this policy. He may have had suspicions of irregularities; he may have had suspicions of fraud, but he was not bound to act until he had acquired knowledge of some specific fraudulent or dishonest act which might involve the defendant in liability for the misconduct. Now, when was it he acquired such knowledge? A good deal of testimony had been introduced here upon that issue. After acquiring it, it was his duty, not as soon as possible, to transmit information of it to the defendant, but to do it with reasonable promptness. He was not bound the first day or the next, necessarily, to give notice, but he was to give notice within a reasonable time; and it is for you to say, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, whether he did, within a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge, send the letter of May 23d. It might be reasonable under one state of facts; it might be unreasonable under another. What might be very great diligence under one set of circum-
146]stances might be very dilatory *under another. Now, first, you are to determine when he really acquired the knowledge. I am not going to recapitulate the testimony. It is claimed upon his part that he did not acquire the knowledge until the close of the examination by the expert, and that was only within a day or two of the time of mailing the notice; and so testimony has been given to show that such examination commenced on the 1st of April and was continued until the latter part of May. On the other hand, it is claimed that he must have acquired knowledge much earlier than this. Now, there is a circumstance of some significance. It is hardly to be supposed that this receiver, holding an official trust, would retain in his employ a cashier after he had become satisfied that by the dishonesty or the fraud of that cashier the bank had sustained serious loss. He did retain him until the 2d day of March. And it may be that while he and those associated with him were entirely satisfied that there had been irregularities, and even perhaps that there had been frauds on the part of the president, they were not aware of any specific acts which could be designated as fraudulent or dishonest on the part of the cashier until the investigation had progressed for a considerable length of time. On the other hand, you have heard the plaintiff's testimony as given in depositions taken in the west. Various extracts have been read, and it is insisted upon the part of the defendant that he must have known of these acts as early as the early part of February, 1892. Now, I charge you, as a matter of law, that if the facts were as they were assumed to be at the outset of the trial,—that is, that the discovery was made early in February and notice was not given until July,—that was not notice with reasonable promptness. And I do not know but that I should charge you, as a matter of law, that if the fact were discovered in the early part of February, and notice was not given until the latter part of May, that was not notice given with reasonable promptness. But if you come to the conclusion that the discovery was not made until the middle or latter part of May, then, in view of the situation of the plaintiff, you may reasonably come to the conclusion that he exercised proper diligence in sending the notice."

*We preceive no error in these instruc-[147
tions. They are entirely consistent with the terms of the contract. Much stress was laid, in argument, upon the words "which may involve loss" in the above extract from the bond. But when those words are taken with the words in the same sentence, "as soon as practicable after such act shall have come to the knowledge of the employer," it may well be held that the Surety Company did not intend to require written notice of any act upon the part of the cashier that might involve loss, unless the bank had knowledge, not simply suspicion, of the existence of such facts as would justify a careful and prudent man in charging another with fraud or dishonesty. If the company intended that the bank should inform it of mere rumors or suspicions affecting the integrity of O'Brien, such intention ought to have been clearly expressed in the bond. It was left to the jury to determine when the receiver first acquired knowledge of acts indicating fraud or dishonesty on O'Brien's part, and they found, in effect, that he had no knowledge of any such act until after the report by the expert bookkeepers made about or a few days before May 23, 1892. The trial court went far enough when it said, in response to an inquiry by a juror, that notice given May 23, 1892, of a fraud by the cashier discovered as early as March 2—the day on which O'Brien left the receiver—was not as soon as practicable after the receiver acquired knowledge of the facts.

We have seen that by the terms of the bond in suit the company agreed to make good and reimburse a loss to the bank caused by any act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of O'Brien in connection, not only with his duties as cashier, but in connection with "the duties to which in the employer's service he may be subsequently appointed, and occurring during the continuance of this bond, and discovered during such continuance or within six months thereafter and within six months from the death or dismissal or retirement of the employee from the service of the employer."

The frauds to which the verdict of the jury referred occurred in October, 1891, during the 148]continuance of the bond. *The bank suspended November 12, 1891. The company insists that, within the meaning of the bond, O'Brien's "retirement" occurred when the bank ceased to do business and closed its doors and the bank examiner entered upon an investigation of its affairs; consequently, it was argued, the discovery of the fraud was not within six months from the "retirement of the employee from the service of the employer."

Undoubtedly the company did not agree to be liable for any fraudulent or dishonest act of the cashier not discovered until after six months from his retirement from the service of the bank. But is it true that, within the meaning of the bond, O'Brien retired from the service of the bank when it suspended business on November 12, 1891? We think not. The bank was in existence under its articles of association while the examiner, under the order of the controller of the currency, was engaged in the investigation of its affairs. Such investigation did not of itself have the effect to discharge O'Brien from its service. It is true that when the bank suspended business, and the investigation by the examiner commenced, O'Brien ceased to perform the ordinary duties of a cashier. But within the meaning of the bond O'Brien did not retire from, but remained in, the service of the employer during at least the investigation of the bank's affairs and the custody of its assets by the national bank examiner, which lasted until the appointment of a receiver and his qualification on the 29th day of December, 1891. Certainly, the six months from "the death or dismissal or retirement of the employee from the service of the employer," within which his fraud or dishonesty must have been discovered in order to hold the company liable, did not commence to run prior to the date last named. The bond prescribed at least three limitations of time: First, the company was entitled to written notice of any act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of the employee which might involve loss to it, as soon as practicable after the occurrence of such act should come to the knowledge of the employer; second, it was to be liable only for an act of fraud or dishonesty 149] *occurring and discovered during the continuance of the bond and within six months thereafter; third, it was not liable, in any event, for any act of fraud or dishonesty, even if committed during the continuance of the bond, unless it was discovered within six months from the death, dismissal, or retirement of the employee from the service of the employer. Of course, O'Brien's death would have terminated his employment as cashier. But he was never dismissed, for his dismissal could only have occurred by the act of the bank or of someone who represented it before or after it suspended business. His "retirement," which would arise from his voluntary act, occurred either when he took service under the receiver, or when he voluntarily left that service on the 2d day of March, 1893. Whether within the meaning of the bond O'Brien was in "the service of the employer" while he was in the service of the receiver, we need not say. It is sufficient for this case to hold that he was in the service of the employer at least up to the time of the receiver's appointment and qualification, which occurred within six months prior to the discovery of his fraud and dishonesty and the giving of notice thereof. We therefore hold that the acts of fraud or dishonesty here involved were discovered during the continuance of the bond and within six months after the retirement of the employee from the service of the employer.

In its charge to the jury the trial court called attention to another defense made by the company, namely, that the bond was void by reason of fraudulent misrepresentations and concealments of Collins acting as the president of the bank. The court said: "It is said that this bond of indemnity was obtained upon an application which was certified to by the bank itself, and that in the application facts were misrepresented and facts were concealed with fraudulent intent on the part of the bank; therefore that the bond is void. The application was accompanied by a certificate of Collins, the president of the bank. The only knowledge of any facts which ought to have been communicated, or were misrepresented, the only knowledge which the bank possessed at the time that application was made, was the knowledge of Collins *himself. Ordina-[150 rily a corporation, like any other principal, is chargeable with the knowledge of any facts which are known to its agents; but in this case all these transactions, if there were any transactions of a fraudulent and dishonest character on the part of the cashier, were transactions for the benefit of Collins and he was a participator in the fraud, and under those circumstances the law does not infer that the agent or the officer will communicate the fact to his principal, the corporation, and under such circumstances the corporation is not bound by his knowledge. So this defense melts away and there is nothing of it whatever."

The company insists that in obtaining the bond in suit Collins acted for the bank, and as a corporation can only speak by agents, the bank is responsible for any false or fraudulent statements in the certificate given by Collins to the Surety Company, and which he signed as president of the bank.

In support of its contention the company cites Franklin Bank v. Cooper, 36 Me. 179, 197; Graves v. Lebanon Nat. Bank, 10 Bush, 23, 29 [19 Am. Rep. 50]; Veazie v. Williams, 49 U. S. 8 How. 134, 157 [12: 1018, 1028]; Bennett v. Judson, 21 N. Y. 238; National L. Ins. Co. v. Minch, 53 N. Y. 144, 149; Holden v. New York & Erie Bank, 72 N. Y. 286, 292; Elwell v. Chamberlin, 31 N. Y. 611, 619. What were those cases?

Franklin Bank v. Cooper was the case of a suit against the executor of one of the sureties in a cashier's bond. Prior to the acceptance of the bond by the directors of the bank a deficiency or defalcation existed in the cashier's accounts, of which the president and some of the directors had knowledge when the bond was taken, but which fact was not communicated to the surety. After observing that knowledge by the surety of the existing deficiency in the cashier's accounts might have had an important influence on his conduct, the court said: "One who becomes surety for another must ordinarily be presumed to do so upon the belief that the transaction between the principal parties is one occurring in the usual course of business of that description, subjecting him only to the ordinary risks attending it; and the 151] party to whom he *becomes a surety must be presumed to know that such will be his understanding and that he will act upon it, unless he is informed that there are some extraordinary circumstances affecting the risk. To receive a surety known to be acting upon the belief that there are no unusual circumstances by which his risk will be materially increased, well knowing that there are such circumstances and having a suitable opportunity to make them known, and withholding them, must be regarded as a legal fraud by which the surety will be relieved from his contract."

Graves v. Lebanon Nat. Bank was a suit upon the bond of a cashier of the bank. The court stated the case to be one in which the directors of a bank "held out" to others as a trustworthy officer a man who had been guilty of repeated embezzlements and frauds, all of which might have been discovered by the exercise of slight diligence by the directors. The grounds upon which the surety was held discharged were thus stated by the court: "There is no principle of law better settled than that persons proposing to become sureties to a corporation for the good conduct and fidelity of an officer to whose custody its moneys, notes, bills, and other valuables are intrusted have the right to be treated with perfect good faith. If the directors are aware of secret facts materially affecting and increasing the obligation of the sureties, the latter are entitled to have these facts disclosed to them, a proper opportunity being presented."

Veazie v. Williams was the case of a purchaser at an auction sale, seeking to be relieved from his purchase because of fraud practised at the sale by the auctioneer, who was the general agent of the owners, and the benefits of which sale the owners received. After a reference to many authorities, the court placed the liability of the owners upon these grounds: "What the vendor may not do in person, or may not employ others to do in his absence—that is, make by-bids to enhance the price—his agent, the auctioneer, cannot rightfully do. But they are held liable on a ground beyond and apart from all this, and as well settled in England as here, that if a principal ratify a sale by his agent, and take the benefit of it, and 152] it *afterwards turns out that fraud or mistake existed in the sale, the latter may be annulled, and the parties placed in statu quo; or they may, where the case and wrong are divisible, be at times relieved to the extent of the injury. . . . But the test here is, Was the purchaser deceived, and has the vendor adopted the sale made by deception, and received the benefits of it? For, if so, he takes the sale with all its burdens. Wilson v. Fuller, 3 Q. B. 68. The sale thus made here was adopted and carried into effect by the respondents; and hence, on account of the fraud involved in it, they should either restore the consideration, and take back the mills, or indemnify the purchaser to the extent of his suffering."

In Bennett v. Judson—which was the case of an agent of the vendor of land who made material misrepresentations as to its location and qualities, assuming to have knowledge of the facts, but without express authority from his principal—the court said: "There is no evidence that the defendant authorized or knew of the alleged fraud committed by his agent Davis in negotiating the exchange of lands. Nevertheless, he cannot enjoy the fruits of the bargain without adopting all the instrumentalities employed by the agent in bringing it to a consummation. If an agent defraud the person with whom he is dealing, the principal, not having authorized or participated in the wrong, may no doubt rescind, when he discovers the fraud, on the terms of making complete restitution. But so long as he retains the benefits of the dealing he cannot claim immunity on the ground that the fraud was committed by his agent and not by himself. This is elementary doctrine, and it disposes of one of the questions raised at the trial."

In National Life Ins. Co. v. Minch—which was an action to recover back money paid on a policy fraudulently obtained by a husband on the life of his wife, the fraud not having been discovered until after the money was paid—the court said: "Again, if the husband, as the agent of the wife, procured the policy by fraud, she cannot retain the benefit of it and be relieved from the consequences of the fraudulent means by *which it was obtained.[153 It is established that an innocent principal cannot take an advantage resulting from the fraud of an agent, without rendering himself civilly liable to the injured party. [Cobb v Dows] 10 N. Y. 344; Graves v. Spier, 58 Barb. 349. If the husband obtained the policy by a fraud, acting as the agent of his wife, he occupies the position of claiming to keep money, as her legal representative, which he fraudulently obtained as her agent. He is defeuding this action upon her title to the policy, which, if procured by his fraud, is invalid."

Holden v. New York & Erie Bank was an action grounded on the fraud of a cashier in certain matters with which he was connected, not only as cashier, but individually and as executor of an estate. The court said: "As matter of fact, whatever knowledge, information, or notice he had in either of these capacities he carried with him into his exercise of the other. As agent of the bank he owed it a duty in every transaction in which the bank took a part, under his observation. Hence, as matter of law, whatever notice of facts he had in any capacity, which were material in the performance by him of the part of the bank in any transaction, became notice to the bank, his principal; as it was his duty to give it notice thereof in that matter. It is the rule that the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of his principal, and notice to the agent of the existence of material facts is notice thereof to the principal, who is taken to know everything about a transaction which his agent in it knows. This rule is sometimes stated, so as to limit it to notice arising from, or at the time connected with, the subject-matter of his agency. Such notice must have come to the agent, it is said, while he is concerned for the principal, and in the course of the very transaction, or so near before it that the agent must be presumed to recollect it. This limitation, however, applies more particularly to the case of an agent whose employment is short lived, so that the principal shall not be affected by knowledge that came to the agent before his employment began, nor after it was terminated. But where the agency is continuous, and concerned with a business made up of a long series 154]*of transactions of a like nature, of the same general character, it will be held that knowledge acquired as agent in that business in any one or more of the transactions, making up from time to time the whole business of the principal, is notice to the agent and to the principal, which will affect the latter in any other of those transactions in which that agent is engaged, in which that knowledge is material. . . . That Ganson held triple relations to the matter did not alter his relation to the bank, his principal, nor did it hinder his knowledge acquired as an agent from affecting his principal in the part he took as an agent. The subject-matter of his agency was the conduct and direction of the affairs of this bank. He represented the bank in all these transactions. He was every time of them engaged in the business of the bank. Notice to him while so engaged, though not otherwise received than by the possession of knowledge acquired by him while acting in another capacity, was notice to the bank. That is a necessary result of his triple character."

Elwell v. Chamberlin related to the exchange of a note, in respect of which fraud was charged. The court said: "It is not material that the plaintiffs authorized or knew of the alleged fraud committed by their agent Mills in negotiating the sale of the note. They cannot be permitted to enjoy the fruits of the bargain without adopting all the instrumentalities employed by the agent in bringing it to a consummation. They have ratified the sale by seeking to enforce payment of the check given for the thing sold. If an agent defrauds the person with whom he is dealing, the principal, not having authorized or participated in the wrong, may, no doubt, rescind, when he discovers the fraud, on the terms of making complete restitution. But so long as he retains the benefits of the dealing, he cannot claim immunity on the ground that the fraud was committed by his agent and not by himself."

These cases, so far as they relate to sureties, rest upon the principle that, "if a party taking a guaranty from a surety, conceals from him facts which go to increase his risk, and suffers him to enter into the contract under false impressions as to the real state of the facts, such a conceal- 155] ment will amount to *a fraud, because the party is bound to make the disclosure, and the omission to make it, under such circumstances, is equivalent to an affirmation that the facts do not exist." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 215. And the cases of Veazie v. Williams, Bennett v. Judson, National Life Ins. Co. v. Minch, Holden v. New York and Erie Bank, and Elwell v. Chamberlin, rest upon the presumption, which the law indulges, that an agent will inform his principal of what it is his duty to communicate to the latter. The Distilled Spirits [Harrington v. United States], 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 356, 367 [20: 167, 171]; Davis Improved Wrought Iron Wagon Wheel Co. v. Davis Wrought Iron Wagon Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 699, 701. This rule is fully stated in Story on Agency, § 140, in which the author says that "notice of facts to an agent is constructive notice thereof to the principal himself, where it arises from, or is at the time connected with, the subject-matter of his agency; for, upon general principles of public policy, it is presumed that the agent has communicated such facts to the principal; and if he has not, still, the principal having intrusted the agent with the particular business, the other party has a right to deem his acts and knowledge obligatory upon the principal; otherwise, the neglect of the agent, whether designed or undesigned, might operate most injuriously to the rights and interest of such party."

Without stopping to consider whether each of the above cases was correctly decided, it may be observed that those relating to sureties in bonds given to corporations arose directly between the sureties and corporations represented by their boards of directors or by some of their officers acting within the authority conferred upon them; and that those relating to the liability of a principal by reason of the acts or representations of his agent arose out of the agent's acts or declarations in the course of the business intrusted to him.

None of the cases cited embrace the present one. In the first place, the procuring of a bond for O'Brien, in order that he might become qualified to act as cashier, was no part of the business of the bank nor within the scope of any duty imposed upon Collins as president of the bank. It was the *business of [156 O'Brien to obtain and present an acceptable bond. And it was for the bank, by its constituted authorities, to accept or reject the bond so presented. The bank did not authorize Collins to give, nor was it aware that he gave, nor was he entitled by virtue of his office as president to sign, any certificate as to the efficiency, fidelity, or integrity of O'Brien. No relations existed between the bank and the Surety Company until O'Brien presented to the former the bond in suit. What therefore Collins assumed in his capacity as president to certify as to O'Brien's fidelity or integrity, was not in the course of the business of the bank nor within any authority he possessed. He could not create such authority by simply assuming to have it. The circuit court of appeals, speaking by Judge Lacombe, well said that there were many acts which the president of a bank may do without express authority of the board of directors, in some cases because the usage of the particular bank impliedly authorized them, in other cases because such acts were fairly within the ordinary routine of his business as president; but that the making of a statement as to the honesty and fidelity of an employee for the benefit of the employee, and to enable the latter to obtain a bond insuring his fidelity, was no part of the ordinary routine business of a bank president, and there was nothing to show that by any usage of this particular bank such function was committed to its president.

It must therefore be taken, as between the bank and the company, that the former cannot be deemed, merely by reason of Collins's relation to it, to have had constructive notice that he as president gave the certificate in question.

The presumption that the agent informed his principal of that which his duty and the interests of his principal required him to communicate does not arise where the agent acts or makes declarations not in execution of any duty that he owes to the principal, nor within any authority possessed by him, but to subserve simply his own personal ends or to commit some fraud against the principal. In such cases the principal is not bound by the acts or declarations of the agent unless it be proved that he had at the time actual notice of them, 157]or,*having received notice of them, failed to disavow what was assumed to be said and done in his behalf.

In Henry v. Allen, 151 N. Y. 1, 10 [36 L. R. A. 658], the court recognized the general rule. But after observing that it rested upon the agent's duty to disclose such facts to his principal, it held that one of the exceptions was that where the agent was "engaged in a scheme to defraud his principal, the presumption does not prevail, because he cannot in reason be presumed to have disclosed that which it was his duty to keep secret, or that which would expose and defeat his fraudulent purpose."

To the same effect are Benedict v. Arnoux, 154 N. Y. 715, and Kettlewell v. Watson, L. R. 21 Ch. Div. 685, 707. In the latter case it was said that the presumption arising from the duty of the agent to communicate what he knows to his principal "may be repelled by showing that, whilst he was acting as agent, he was also acting in another character, viz., as a party to a scheme or design of fraud, and that the knowledge which he attained was attained by him in the latter character, and that therefore there is no ground on which you can presume that the duty of an agent was performed by the person who filled that double character."

In Commercial Bank v. Cunningham, 24 Pick. 270, 276 [35 Am. Dec. 322], which involved the question whether certain notes held by a bank were to be deemed to have been made for the accommodation of a firm, one member of which was a director of the bank at the time the notes were taken, it was held that the knowledge of the latter, although a director, was no proof of notice to the corporation, "especially as he was a party to all these contracts, whose interest might be opposed to that of the corporation." This principle is reaffirmed in Innerarity v. Merchants' National Bank, 139 Mass. 332, 333 [52 Am. Rep. 710], in which the court said: "While the knowledge of an agent is ordinarily to be imputed to the principal, it would appear now to be well established that there is an exception to the construction or imputation of notice from the agent to the principal in case of such conduct by the agent as raises a clear presumption that he would not communicate the fact in controversy, as where the communication of such a fact would *necessarily [158 prevent the consummation of a fraudulent scheme which the agent was engaged in perpetrating,"—citing Kennedy v. Green, 3 Myl. & K. 699; Cave v. Cave, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 639; Re European Bank, L. R. 5 Ch. 358; Re Marseilles Extension Railway & L. Co. L. R. 7 Ch. 161; Atlantic National Bank v. Harris, 118 Mass. 147; Loring v. Brodie, 134 Mass. 453.

In Terrell v. Branch Bank at Mobile, 12 Ala. 502, 507, the question was as to the liability of the maker of a note executed in blank and delivered by him to a director of a bank to be filled up with a certain sum and to be used in the renewal of a note of the maker already held by the bank. The director (Scott) filled up the note for a larger amount and had it discounted for his own use, he acting as one of the directors when the discount occurred, but concealing the facts from the other directors. It was contended that the knowledge of Scott as director of the circumstances under which the note was made and offered for discount, his connection with the directory, and his presence when it was discounted by the bank, were in law notice to the other directors of the facts. The supreme court of Alabama said: "It cannot be admitted that in receiving the blank of the defendant to be used for his benefit, Scott acted as the agent of the bank; and certainly he did not thus act in abusing the authority conferred on him by the defendant. But in filling up the blank for a larger amount than his authority required, and then offering the note for discount, he was in reality the representative of his own interest. Pro re nata, his powers as a director were suspended—he was contracting with the bank through his associates in the directory—he was borrowing, not lending, its money—though a member of the board and present too, it cannot be supposed that he co-operated with them in purchasing paper of which he was the avowed proprietor; and whether he did or not, it cannot be presumed that he made any disclosure which would prejudice his application for a loan."

In his treatise on Equity Jurisprudence, Pomeroy says: "It is now settled by a series of decisions possessing the highest *authority, [159 that when an agent or attorney has, in the course of his employment, been guilty of an actual fraud contrived and carried out for his own benefit, by which he intended to defraud and did defraud his own principal or client, as well as, perhaps, the other party, and the very perpetration of such fraud involved the necessity of his concealing the facts from his own client, then, under such circumstances, the principal is not charged with constructive notice of facts known by the attorney and thus fraudulently concealed." Vol. 2, § 675.

Further citation of authorities would seem to be unnecessary to support the proposition that if Collins gave the certificate that he might, with the aid of O'Brien as cashier, carry out his purpose to defraud the bank for his personal benefit, the law will not presume that he communicated to the bank what he had done in order to promote the scheme devised by him in hostility to its interests. In our judgment the circuit court of appeals [38 U. S. App. 279, 72 Fed. Rep. 483, 18 C. C. A. 656], correctly held that plaintiff's right of action on the bond was not lost because its president, Collins, made to the defendants false representations as to the cashier's honesty; and that when two officers of a corporation have entered into a scheme to purloin its money for the benefit of one of them, "in pursuance of which scheme it becomes necessary to make false representations to a third person, ostensibly for the bank, but in reality to consummate said scheme, and for the benefit of the conspirators, and not in the line of ordinary routine business of such officers, and without express authority—the corporation being ignorant of the fraud—the officers are not, in thus consummating such theft, the agents of the corporation."

It is contended that admitting in evidence Collins's ledger account and the letter [teller's] book was error to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the defendant. We cannot assent to this view, and as the matter was satisfactorily disposed of by the circuit court of appeals, it is sufficient to refer to the opinion of that court for our views on this point.

It is said that the claim or proof of loss mailed to the company on June 24, 1892, and the receipt of which was acknowledged July 8, 1892, was not served as soon as practicable after 160] *the discovery of a loss for which the company was liable, nor within six months after the expiration or cancelation of the bond. We cannot assent to these propositions. It must be assumed from the verdict that, within the meaning of the bond, the loss was discovered the latter part of May, and that written notice of it was given as soon thereafter as was practicable. As, for the reasons heretofore stated, O'Brien did not retire from the service of the bank prior at least to December 29, 1891, it is clear that the objection under consideration is not well taken. Under the facts found it must be held that proper notice of the loss was given as soon as practicable after the discovery of the fraud of O'Brien and within six months after his retirement from the service of his employer, and that the claim was made in such form as to reasonably inform the company of its nature. When received, no objection was made that notice of it was not served in time, nor that it was not sufficiently full to indicate the grounds upon which the receiver would proceed against the company upon its bond.

Having considered all the questions which, in our judgment, need to be examined, and perceiving no error of law in the record to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the Surety Company, the judgments of the Circuit Court and Circuit Court of Appeals are affirmed.

AMERICAN SURETY COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Plff. in Err.,

v.

FREDERICK N. PAULY, as Receiver of the California National Bank of San Diego, California (No. 2.)

Bond indemnifying bank—question for jury—written statement of loss—construction of Contract—suspension of bank.

1. In an action by a national bank against a surety company on a bond given by it to the bank to indemnify it against loss by fraud or dishonesty of its president, which required notice to the company of any act of the president involving loss to the bank, to be given as soon as practicable after the bank has knowledge of such act, such notice need not be given on mere suspicion, but only when the bank is satisfied of some act of fraud or dishonesty committed by its president likely to involve loss to it.
2. It was not error to leave it to the jury to say whether, under the proof and circumstances, a notice given May 23d of a loss discovered after May 1st was given with reasonable promptness.
3. A provision of the bond that a written statement of such loss certified by the duly authorized officer or representative of the employer, and based upon the accounts of the employee, shall be prima facie evidence thereof, makes such statement such evidence of such loss in a suit brought for the recovery thereof.

NOTE.—As to powers of president of a corporation, see note to Walt v. Nashua Armory Asso. (N. H.) 14 L. R. A. 356.

As to liability of surety or guarantor, see note to Best v. Johnson (Cal.) 3 L. R. A. 168.

Bonds of indemnity; liability of sureties thereon; bonds of public officers and of officers of corporations; interest, when may be added to penalty.

Sureties on the bond of a county clerk are liable for the amounts of county orders issued by the clerk and paid to himself in excess of the amounts allowed him by the county board of supervisors. Spindler v. People, Ford County, 154 Ill. 637.

The sureties on a county clerk's bond are not released from liability for money fraudulently obtained by the principal upon county orders, by reason of the negligence or misfeasance of the county treasurer in failing to examine the records of the county board, and ascertain that orders were warranted thereby before countersigning the same. Campbell v. People, Ford County, 154 Ill. 595.

The bond of a city clerk creates no liability for his failure to pay over money which under laws and ordinances he had no right to receive, but which was required to be paid into the city treasury. Orton v. Lincoln, 156 Ill. 499, 602.

A judgment showing the existence of a just demand and cause for attachment must be alleged and proved in an action against a constable and his sureties on his official bond for damages for failure to levy an attachment on property pointed out to him. Shanklin, Wetzler, v. Francis, 59 Mo. App. 178.

Sureties on the bond of a master commissioner to sell land and collect the money are liable thereon, although the money was collected before the execution of the bond, where it was not misappropriated until afterwards. Dowell v. Woodsides, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 325.

4. When a contract is so drawn as to leave room for two constructions of its provisions, it must be interpreted most strongly against the party who prepared it and delivered it to the other party for his protection.

5. The mere suspension of a national bank, followed by an investigation of its affairs by a bank examiner, does not have the effect to retire its president from his position, but he remains in its service until the receiver takes possession.

Argued January 7, 1898. Decided April 18, 1898.

IN ERROR to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a judgment of that court affirming the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York in favor of the plaintiff Frederick N. Pauly, as receiver of the California National Bank, against the American Surety Company of New York, defendant, for the recovery of the amount of a bond given by defendant to indemnify the said National Bank against loss by the fraud or dishonesty of its president. Judgments of Circuit Court and Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed.

See same case below, 38 U. S. App. 280, 72 Fed. Rep. 484.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walter D. Davidge, Henry C. Willcox, and W. D. Davidge, Jr., for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Edward Winslow Paige for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the receiver of the California National Bank of San Diego, California, upon a bond given July 1, 1891, by the American Surety Company of New York, to indemnify that banking association against

The failure of a county treasurer to pay orders drawn upon him is not made a breach of a prior bond, instead of his current bond, by the fact that the moneys were deposited by him while the prior bond was in force, in a bank which was insolvent at the time, as the breach of the bond is the failure to pay the money, and not its deposit in the bank, and the custody of the money by the bank is that of the treasurer by his agent. People, Menard County, v. Oeltjen, 56 Ill. App. 138.

That commissioners were allowed by the court, under a mistake of law, to a county collector of revenue in excess of the amount he was lawfully entitled to, does not render him and his sureties liable upon his official bond, in the absence of fraud, collusion, or mistake of fact in making such settlement. State, Lawrence County, v. Shipman, 125 Mo. 436.

The sureties on a tax collector's bond are not entitled to a credit for moneys appropriated by the collector to the payment of a balance remaining from a previous term, where it is impossible to determine whether any of the money collected during the term for which they are sureties was used for such purpose. Com., Sharon School Dist., v. Stambaugh, 164 Pa. 437.

The sureties upon a bond to the United States conditioned that a superintendent of Indian affairs shall carefully discharge the public duties of his office, and honestly account for all moneys and property which shall or may come into his hands, are liable for moneys collected by the principal during a term preceding that for which the bond was given, which were in his hands when it was given and were misappropriated after that date. United States v. Dudley, 21 D. C. 337.

An action on the bond of a trustee of a township, under Ind. act March 5, 1883, giving the benefit of the bond to the holder of any contract or other evidence of indebtedness contracted in the name or on behalf of the township, without an order authorizing it, cannot be maintained without showing that the certificates were issued for a valid debt. Indiana, Stanton, v. Glover, 155 U. S. 513, 39 L. ed. 243.

The obligation of an official bond is not extended by the re-election of the officers where he gives a second bond. Trustees of Schools v. Arnold, 58 Ill. App. 103.

The responsibility of sureties on the bond of an officer elected for a year is not extended by the fact that upon his re-election no bond was given for the new term. Board of Administrators v. McKowen, 48 La. Ann. 251.

Sureties on the bond of an officer elected for a year are not liable for any default of the principal occurring after the expiration of a reasonable time from the end of such term for the appointment and qualification of his successor. Board of Administrators v. McKowen, 48 La. Ann. 251.

Sureties on the official bond of a clerk conditioned upon his faithfully performing all duties required of him by law, and paying over all moneys which come into his hands by virtue of his office, are liable on his failure to pay over, at the expiration of his term, fees earned by the sheriff and collected by the clerk, to which the sheriff was not entitled because of a full settlement of his affairs with the county. Weisenborn v. People, 58 Ill. App. 114, 116.

The principal sureties on a bond conditioned that a village collector will faithfully execute the duties of his office and pay over all moneys as provided by law are liable for the amount lost by reason of the insolvency of a bank in which the money was deposited in good faith. Oneida v. Thompson, 92 Hun, 16.

Obligors on an official bond of a superintendent of a mint binding him to receive and safely keep all moneys or bullion are substantially insurers that he will thus keep and deliver the property, and not merely that he shall exercise ordinary care as a bailee. United States v. Bosbysbell, 73 Fed. Rep. 616.

The sureties upon the bond of the treasurer of a benevolent society, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duty, are not liable for a portion of the funds of the society borrowed by him from it before the day of the bond, and retained by him during its whole term, although he becomes insolvent and fails to pay the amount to his successor. Rowe v. Davenport, 8 Kulp, 81.

A bond to secure the fidelity of an insurance agent in a certain employment "during his employment by said company in whatever capacity he may be engaged, the duties and emoluments of which may be changed from time to time by the company without notice to the sureties," does not cover his employment in a wholly different position with increased responsibilities and under an entirely different contract. Iliff v. Western-Southern L. Ins. Co. 11 Ohio C. C. 426.

Sureties on the bond of a given bank, conditioned that if it is designated as a county depositary, pursuant to the statute, it will pay on demand all the funds deposited with it pursuant to such designation, are not released from liability where such funds are deposited in such bank, by the fact that it was not designated as depositary by the proper officer, or that the sureties did loss by any act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of John W. Collins in connection with the duties of the office or position as president of the above bank, or the duties to which in the employer's (the bank's) service he might be subsequently appointed, and occurring during the continuance of the bond, "and discovered dur-162]ing *said continuance or within 6 months thereafter and within 6 months from the death or dismissal or retirement of the employee [Collins] from the service of the employer."

The bond in this case is similar to the bond of the Surety Company, of like date, insuring the fidelity and integrity of George N. O'Brien, as cashier of the bank, and which was involved in the preceding case of American Surety Co. v. Pauly (No. 1.) With a few exceptions the questions of law raised by the assignments of error in the present case are concluded by what was determined in that case.

1. It is contended that the receiver did not comply with the provision in the bond requiring written notice to the company "of any act on the part of the employee, which may involve a loss for which the company is responsible hereunder, as soon as practicable after the occurrence of such act shall have come to the knowledge of the employer." The import of this provision was considered in the former case. The material inquiry here is whether notice was given to the company of the acts of fraud and dishonesty on the part of Collins of which complaint is made as soon as practicable after the occurrence of such acts came to the knowledge of the receiver.

The evidence was very conflicting as to the time when the receiver first became aware of the fraudulent acts of Collins as president of the bank. The first written notice by the receiver to the company of any claim under Collins's bond arising out of fraudulent or dishonest acts on his part was given May 23, 1892. The terms of that notice appear in the opinion in the former case. There was evidence tend-not know that the bond had been approved or funds deposited with the bank in reliance thereon. Hennepin County Comrs. v. State Bank, 64 Minn. 180.

A bond unlimited as to time, conditioned that an officer of a private corporation will faithfully perform his duties as such, does not, unless renewed, cover breaches occurring during a subsequent term. Grand Lodge, O. D. H. S. v. Freifeld, 20 Misc. 276.

Liability on bond of officer of corporation for breach after expiration of term of office. Elam v. Commercial Bank, 86 Va. 92; Phillips v. Bossard, 35 Fed. Rep. 99; St. Louis Union Soc. v. Mitchell, 26 Mo. App. 206; Black v. Oblender, 135 Pa. 526; Kaw Life Asso. v. Lemke, 40 Kan. 661.

A surety on the bond of the treasurer of a corporation elected for one year, conditioned that such treasurer will pay over to his successor any balance in his hands, and honestly and faithfully serve the corporation during his continuance in office, is not liable for defaults of the treasurer during subsequent years for which he was elected. Ulster County Sav. Inst. v. Ostrander, 15 App. Div. 173.

A surety on the bond of the assistant treasurer of a bank, conditioned that he will duly account for all money or other property which comes into his hands as such treasurer, which bond is to be binding for all the time he holds such office, even though he hold under "successive appointments," is liable for defalcation of such treasurer while holding over without appointment after several successive appointments. Ulster County Sav. Inst. v. Young, 15 App. Div. 181.

Sureties on the bond of a bank cashier, which in its condition is general and unlimited as to the time it shall remain in force, are liable for any defaults occurring by him while cashier, where his original appointment was for an indefinite period and the by laws of the bank provided that his appointment should be during the pleasure of the board of directors, and the statute under which the appointment was made authorized an appointment until dismissal at the pleasure of the board, notwithstanding his formal re election annually thereafter at the time of fixing his salary for the ensuing year. Stevens v. Orton, 18 Misc. 538.

The bond of a cashier of a national bank conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties "for and during all the time he shall hold the said office" covers defaults in years subsequent to that in which it is given, notwithstanding the by-laws of the bank provide that the cashier shall be elected annually and a resolution appointing him to the office was passed in each year. Westervelt v. Mohrenstecher, 40 U. S. App. 221, 76 Fed. Rep. 118, 22 C. C. A. 93, 34 L. R. A. 477.

A statute requiring a treasurer to keep safely and pay over the money received by him in his official capacity merely states his common-law duties, and does not enlarge his responsibility as bailee, or that of his sureties. Healdsburg v. Mulligan, 113 Cal. 205, 33 L. R. A. 461.

An officer is not an insurer of the safety of public funds in his hands, on a bond faithfully to perform his duties and to collect and pay over moneys, but is responsible only for the exercise of good faith, diligence, prudence, caution, and a disinterested effort to keep and preserve the fund for those entitled. State, Overton County, v. Copeland, 96 Tenn. 296, 31 L. R. A. 844.

The forcible taking by robbers of money in the custody of a city treasurer is a defense to an action upon his bond providing that he shall "well and faithfully perform all official duties," where by the Constitution and laws of the state the receipt of the money makes him a bailee, and not a debtor. Healdsburg v. Mulligan, 113 Cal. 205, 33 L. R. A. 461.

The loss of public money by a bank failure will not prevent liability of the county treasurer upon his bond to pay the money as the commissioners shall direct, although he was not negligent in selecting the bank and the county has not provided a suitable and safe place in which to deposit the money. Fairchild v. Hedges, 14 Wash. 117, 31 L. R. A. 851.

Payment of money to the clerk of the court in vacation is not equivalent to the payment of money into court as provided by statute; and the sureties on the clerk's bond cannot be held responsible for its loss, if he fails to return into court. State, Blake, v. Enslow, 41 W. Va. 744.

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff are not liable to the penalty in treble damages and a fine for which the sheriff is made liable by Mills's Colo. Anno. Stat. § 805, for demanding or receiving greater fees than are allowed by law. State Bank v. Brennan, 7 Colo. App. 427.

The omission from the official bond of a prosecuting attorney of the condition of Ohio Rev. Stat. § 1269, that he shall pay over according to law all moneys by him received in his official capacity, is not a fatal defect. State, Ausberry, v. Slough, 12 Ohio, C. C. 105.

A bond given by a deputy to a sheriff, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his office and for the payment to the sheriff of all moneys coming into the deputy's hands by virtue thereof, is not a mere bond of indemnity; and

ing to show that although the receiver had reason, in the months of January, February, March, or April, 1892, to believe that there were irregularities on the part of Collins, as president of the bank, he did not become aware of any specific acts of fraud or dishonesty by him until the expert bookkeeper employed to examine the bank's books informed him a few days prior to May 23, 1892, that he had discovered false entries showing fraud and dishonesty on the part of both Collins and 163] *O'Brien. The conflict in the evidence upon the issue as to the time when the receiver first acquired knowledge of the frauds in question was submitted to the jury under instructions to which in our judgment no objection can properly be made. The court instructed the jury that it was incumbent upon the receiver to satisfy them by a fair preponderance of evidence that he notified the company of any act on the part of Collins "likely to involve a loss for which the company might become responsible as soon as practicable after the act came to his knowledge." It said: "Now, it was not incumbent upon the plaintiff to give notice as soon as practicable after he may have had suspicions of dishonest conduct on the part of the president, but it was his duty when he became satisfied that the president had committed some specific act of fraud or dishonesty which was likely to involve the defendant in loss to give notice in writing. This provision does not require that the notice shall be given immediately, but it requires that it shall be given with reasonable promptness after the discovery, and it is a question of fact for the jury to a plea of non damnificatus is not applicable to an action thereon. Poling v. Maddox, 41 W. Va. 779.

A bond conditioned for the faithful performance by the cashier of a bank of all his duties "so long as he shall continue in that capacity" will be held to create a liability continuing after the expiration of the term of office to which he was originally elected, if such was the intention of the parties. Fink v. Farmers' Bank, 178 Pa. 154.

Neither the principal nor sureties on a cashier's bond conditioned against loss from the negligence of the cashier in the discharge of his duties are liable for loss through the discount of paper by the cashier under direction of the president who had authority to control discounts, in the absence of fraud or collusion or of notice in the cashier that the paper was unsafe. Pryse v. Farmers Bank, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1056.

Sureties on the bond of an insurance agent conditioned that he will pay over to the company all moneys received by him from time to time are not relieved from liability by the company's failure to state to them that such agent had formerly been indebted to the company, where no inquiry was made on such point by the sureties. Palatine Ins. Co. v. Crittenden, 18 Mont. 413.

Sureties on constable's bond are liable for an illegal arrest made by him while acting as constable and under color of his office, under N. C. Code, § 1883, providing that constables and the sureties on their bonds shall be liable to a person injured for all acts done by them by virtue and under color of their office. State, Warren, v. Boyd, 120 N. C. 56.

Liability on official bond for illegal arrest: Yount v. Carney, 91 Iowa, 559; Kendall v. Aleshire, 28 Neb. 707. Not liable: see Marquis v. Willard, 12 Wash. 528; Allison v. People, Prisk, 6 Colo. App. 80.

A postmaster is liable on his official bond containing no exception from absolute liability, for money-order funds of which he had the possession, which have been embezzled by a clerk, although such clerk held his office as such under the civil-service laws. United States v. Bryan, 84 Fed. Rep. 290.

Sureties on the bond of an attorney of a building and loan association conditioned for the payment of any default by him during his continuance in office, are liable for any default that may occur during his continuance as such attorney, where he holds his appointment at the pleasure of the board, as his term continues so long as the members are pleased. New German Loan & Bldg. Co. v. Kuehnert, 6 Ohio Dec. 502, citing Anderson v. Longden, 1 Wheat. 85 (4: 42;) Dedham Bank v. Chickering, 3 Pick. 335; Hughes v. Smith, 5 Johns. 168; distinguishing Welch v. Seymour, 28 Conn. 387. Period covered by bond of one employed during pleasure of employee, see Stevens v. Orton, 18 Misc. 538; Phillips v. Bossard, 35 Fed. Rep. 99; Com. v. Reading Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 73; Westervelt v. Mohrenstecher, 40 U. S. App. 221, 76 Fed. Rep. 118, 22 C. C. A. 93, 34 L. R. A. 477; Hall v. Brackett, 62 N. H. 509.

Bond of cashier of a bank conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties as cashier forever, so long as he shall occupy the position extends but for one year, where his first election was for the ensuing year, and he was thereafter re-elected annually, and a by-law of the company provided that he should be appointed to hold his office during the pleasure of the board. First Nat. Bank v. Briggs, 69 Vt. 12, 37 L. R. A. 845.

A bond for performance of the duties of an insurance agent is satisfied to the extent of an amount paid by the surety for a defalcation so that, upon a subsequent defalcation, only the difference between the amount paid and that of the bond can be recovered. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Driess (Pa.) 6 Northampton Co. Rep. 67.

Obligors in joint and several bond by an employee conditioned for the transaction of such business as may be intrusted to the employee, and that he will faithfully perform his duties by virtue of his said employment or otherwise, and whether under or in the absence of "any present or future contract, either with or without notice" to the obligors, other than the employee, are not relieved from liability because of a new contract entered into with the employee, without notice, substantially increasing the risk. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Reynolds, 168 Mass. 588.

Deposit by state treasurer, of public funds in a bank chosen as a state depositary in excess of half the amount of the penalty of the bond given by such bank, in violation of the Nebraska statute, will not release either the bank or the sureties on the bond from their obligation to repay the moneys deposited, to half the amount of the bond and the accretions thereof. Bartley v. Meseroe, 51 Neb. 116, 36 L. R. A. 746.

Sureties on a bond by a firm of insurance agents to secure the company from liability for failure of the firm to pay over all money and other securities received by them as such agents are not liable for failure of a continuing member of the firm to pay over money collected by him after the dissolution of the firm. London & L. F. Ins. Co. v. Holt, 10 S. D. 171, citing Standard Oil Co. v. Arnestad, 6 N. D. 255, 34 L. R. A. 861; Burch v. De Rivera, 53 Hun, 367; Crane Co. v. Specht, 39 Neb. 123; Barnett v. The fact that the directors of a bank neglected their duty in not discovering what the sureties on a bond of the cashier covenanted that he would reveal, also did not volunteer information of the fact that the cashier was a director, was held no ground of defense in an action for a breach. Frelinghuysen v. Baldwin, 16 Fed. Rep. 452.

say upon the evidence, in view of the particular circumstances of the case, whether such a notice has been given with reasonable promptness. The notice in this case was given on the 23d day of May, 1892, and it will become necessary for you to inquire and determine when it was that knowledge came to the plaintiff, when he became chargeable with knowledge that the president had committed some specific act of fraud or dishonesty likely to render the defendant liable upon its bond."

Again: "The testimony of Mr. Bloodgood, you will recall, which, if I remember it correctly, is to the effect that he entered upon the investigation of the facts in reference to the president's accounts and the misapplication of funds by him about the 1st of April, and completed that investigation some time in May, and as soon as he completed it he then informed the plaintiff of the result. Now, I will charge you, as matter of law in this case, that if the plaintiff had made discovery of any specific act which he believed might render the defendant liable for loss prior to the 1st day of May, 1892, *the notice was not given[164 with reasonable promptness; but if a discovery was not made until after that time, then you can say and decide, as a question of fact, whether or not it was given with reasonable promptness having been given on the 23d day of May."

Where a bond was given, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of the office of deputy collector of direct taxes for eight certain townships, and the instrument of the appointment, referred to in the bond, was afterwards altered, so as to extend to another township, without the consent of the sureties,—held, that the surety was discharged from his responsibility for moneys subsequently collected by his principal. A surety for the agent of an insurance company, not authorized to engage in banking, is not liable for an embezzlement by the agent, committed while conducting the banking operations of the corporation Blair v. Perpetual Ins. Co. 10 Mo. 559, 47 Am. Rep. 129.

L. executed a bond faithfully to do duty as ticket agent at a certain station, but, the railroad being overflowed, the receiver discontinued his salary, and sent him to another parish to superintend a skiff line. Held, that L.'s sureties were not liable for a loss caused by L.'s misconduct in the last position. Green v. Locke, 31 La. Ann. 656.

In Grocer's Bank v. Kingman, 16 Gray, 474, it was held that the sureties on a cashier's bond, in which they undertake to save the bank harmless from every loss that may arise from the cashier's mistakes, as well as from the losses arising from his fraud, inattention, or negligence in the performance of his duties, are exonerated by an increase of the capital stock of the bank after the making of the bond, from liability for acts of the cashier after the additional capital has been paid it. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Van Vorst, 21 N. J. L. 100.

In New York v. Kelly, 98 N. Y. 467, an action was brought against a surety of the bookkeeper in the department of docks in the city of New York. The bookkeeper was required, in addition to his work at the books, to assist the treasurer in receiving and depositing the funds of the department. He embezzled by means of false entries or omissions to make entries. It appeared that the additional duties required of him did not hinder his faithful performance of the duties of bookkeeper. The court held that the question of damages was for the jury.

on the same point in the suit on the bond guaranteeing the fidelity and integrity of the cashier of the bank.

In our judgment, for the reasons stated in the opinion in the former case, it was proper to instruct the jury that the receiver need not have given the required notice on mere suspicion as to acts by Collins involving fraud and dishonesty on his part as president of the bank, but was bound to do so only when satisfied that he had committed some specific act of fraud or dishonesty likely to involve loss to the company. Nor was it error to leave it to the jury to say whether under the proof, and looking at all the circumstances, a notice given May 23 of a loss discovered after May 1 was given with reasonable promptness.

2. It is insisted that the instructions of the trial court in reference to the effect to be given to the written statement of loss made by the receiver were erroneous. The provision in the bond upon which this contention rests is in these words: "Now therefore, in consideration, etc., . . . It is hereby declared and agreed that, subject to the provision herein contained, the company shall, within three months next after notice, accompanied by satisfactory proof, of a loss, as hereinafter mentioned, has been given to the company, make good and reimburse to the employer all and any pecuniary loss sustained by the employer, of moneys, securities, or other personal property in the possession of the employee, or for the possession of which he is responsible, by any act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of the employee, in connection with the duties of the office or position hereinbefore referred to, or the duties to which in the employer's service he may be subsequently appointed, and occurring during the continuance of this bond, and discovered 165] during said continuance, *or within six months thereafter, and within six months from the death or dismissal or retirement of the employee from the service of the employer. It being understood that a written statement of such loss, certified by the duly authorized officer or representative of the employer, and based upon the account of the employer, shall be prima facie evidence thereof."

The court said to the jury: "Now, there is a provision in the policy to the effect that a written statement of loss, certified by the duly authorized officer or representative of the employer (receiver of the bank in this case) and based upon the accounts of the employer, shall be prima facie evidence thereof. In view of that condition of the policy, I instruct you that the plaintiff has established a prima facie case against the defendant, because he gave the written statement of loss, and subsequently transmitted to the defendant a copy of the account upon which it was based. Nevertheless, the plaintiff has offered additional evidence. He might have rested his case upon the proof that he had complied with this condition of the policy which I have read to you and insisted then that it was incumbent upon the defendant to show that the bank had not sustained a loss within the terms of the policy. But the plaintiff has seen fit to produce further evidence. I am not going to call your attention to that evidence in any detail. Suffice it to say that it tends to prove that on or about the 18th of October the president of the bank procured a discount of certain notes of the bank with the customers' notes belonging to the bank as collateral, to the amount altogether of about $45,000; that about that time he sent telegrams in cipher to the cashier of the bank at San Diego; that about that time the cashier caused a credit to be given in the president's personal account for items amounting to about $45,000; that when the bank failed the apparent balance to the credit of the president in his private account was about $11,000, showing that he had drawn out about $34,000 of the $45,000 which had been placed to his credit on the 13th or 14th of October. It is insisted that this evidence authorizes and requires you to find that the president obtained *an im-[166 proper credit, and by means thereof appropriated more than $25,000 of the funds of the bank.

"I shall not allude to the evidence which has been given of other improper credits which it is alleged were given to the president in his personal account with the bank. They are only important as tending to characterize the nature of the transactions of October 13th and 14th, and as tending to show the total loss sustained by the bank through its president. But the question for you to determine is whether by reason of these improper credits of the 13th and 14th of October the defendant became liable for a loss within the meaning of the terms of the policy. Was that a fraudulent or dishonest transaction on the part of the president? If it was not, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. If it was a mere irregularity on his part, an honest irregularity, or if he was not aware of the fact that these credit items were passed to his account, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. You must find that when he drew his money out he knew or had reason to believe, that these items had been credited to his account; and you must find that in drawing out the money on those credits he was actuated by a fraudulent or dishonest mind. If, upon the evidence in this case, you can come to the conclusion that he believed that if the directors of the bank had known of these transactions they would have acquiesced and regarded them as entirely satisfactory, why, then, it is your duty to find that he was not actuated by a dishonest motive, and therefore his acts in appropriating this money were not fraudulent or dishonest. The burden is upon the plaintiff to satisfy you by a fair preponderance of evidence of the truth of this issue. Fraud is not to be legally presumed, and the law presumes that every man acts honestly until the contrary is shown. On the other hand, fraud or dishonesty is a condition of the mind. It is incapable of direct evidence. It must always be found from circumstance. There is no way in which the plaintiff could show in what state of mind Mr. Collins was while these transactions were taking place, unless he could produce him as a witness on the stand to elicit the truth.

*"Well, as I have said before, the plain-[167 tiff has made a prima facie case upon this issue because he has complied with that condition of the policy which prescribes that the written statement of claim shall be prima facie evidence of a loss within the terms of the policy.

Now, it is for you to say, upon the other evidence in the case, which has been elicited principally upon the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, whether the defendant has overcome that case. If you conclude that the defendant has overcome that presumption, and, upon all the evidence before you, that the transactions in controversy are as consistent with the theory of honesty on the part of the president as of his dishonesty or fraud, then the defendant will be entitled to your verdict."

The Surety Company insists that the provisions of the bond referring to the written statement of loss relate exclusively to the presentation of the claim to the company and its acceptance or rejection thereof, and not to the use of such statement as independent evidence in any suit brought for the recovery of such loss; in other words, it is argued, the company was willing in its consideration of the claim of loss to accept as prima facie proof of the claim the statement of loss, duly certified and based upon the accounts of the employer, but did not waive its right, if sued, to demand such proof as was necessary in law to sustain it. The bond may be susceptible of this construction. But is it not also susceptible of the construction placed upon it by the trial court? If the Surety Company intended that the written statement of loss certified by the duly authorized officer or representative of the employer, and based upon the accounts of the employer, should be prima facie evidence only of the right of the employer to bring suit on the bond, if its claim of loss was not paid, it should have so expressly declared. But that was not done. The company agreed to pay any loss covered by the bond within three months next after notice, accompanied by "satisfactory proof of a loss." But that no doubt might arise as to what was satisfactory proof of loss, and that the obligee might be assured of the prompt settlement of any claim it might make under the bond, if accompanied by proper [168] proof of loss, *care was taken to express the understanding that a written statement of such loss, duly certified, "and based upon the accounts of the employer," should be prima facie evidence "thereof," that is, evidence of "such loss." In our judgment, the circuit court of appeals correctly held that the interpretation placed upon the bond by the trial court was the natural one. The company might well have agreed that, in the event of suit, a written statement of loss arising from the fraud or dishonesty of the employee, and "based upon the accounts of the employer," should be sufficient, nothing appearing to the contrary, to establish the loss; and this for the reason that such accounts, if the claim was disputed and made the subject of suit, would be open to examination by the company. The employer could not base its statement of loss on its own accounts, and then withhold such accounts from inspection by the obligor on the bond.

If the latter construction of the bond be not clearly right, it cannot be said to be inconsistent with its provisions. And it would be going very far to say that the construction given to it by the company was so clearly right that a different construction would be unreasonable or entirely inadmissible. We have then a contract so drawn as to leave room for two constructions of its provisions, either of which, it may be conceded, is reasonable, one favorable to the company, and the other favorable to the bank and most likely to subserve the purposes for which the bond was given. In such a case the terms used must be interpreted most strongly against the party who prepared the bond and delivered it to the party for whose protection it was executed. It has been so held in the case just decided.

8. We have seen that the company agreed to reimburse the bank for loss "by any act of fraud or dishonesty" on the part of Collins as president of the bank in connection with the duties of his office, occurring during the continuance of the bond, and discovered during said continuance or within six months thereafter, and within six months from the death or dismissal or retirement of the employee from the service of the employer.

*As evidence of the dismissal or retire- [169
ment of Collins from his position as president of the bank, the company refers to paragraph 6 of the original bill of particulars filed by the receiver:

"6. The following is the date of the dismissal and retirement of said John W. Collins and of the discovery of the acts of fraud or dishonesty referred to as alleged in the ninth paragraph of said complaint:

"'The said J. W. Collins ceased to act as president of the said California National Bank upon the same going into insolvency and coming into the possession of the controller of the currency of the United States, which took place December 12, 1891; that on the 29th day of December, 1891, Frederick N. Pauly, the plaintiff herein, qualified as the receiver of said bank, and took full possession of its assets under his trust, and that the acts of fraud and dishonesty referred to in paragraph 9 of said complaint were discovered during the months of February and March, 1892.'"

Paragraphs 9, 10, and 11 of the complaint were as follows: "IX. That on or about June 18, 1892, and as soon as practicable after the occurrence of the aforesaid wrongful acts of the said Collins, this plaintiff duly mailed at San Diego, California, in an envelope addressed to the said defendant at its office in the city of New York, a notice, in writing, of the acts of fraud and dishonesty of said Collins, and a written statement of the loss sustained by said bank by reason of the acts of fraud and dishonesty of said Collins, certified by the plaintiff and based upon the accounts of said Collins, and presented satisfactory proofs of the loss sustained by said bank by reason of the acts of said Collins during the continuance of said bond, and duly demanded from this defendant that this defendant make good and reimburse to this plaintiff the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, the amount of pecuniary loss sustained by said bank by reason of the acts of fraud and dishonesty of said Collins, being the amount conditioned to be paid by the terms of the said guarantee bond heretofore mentioned. X. That the said defendant received each and all of the papers mentioned in paragraph 9 of this complaint within at least *ten days after the date of mail- [170 ing thereof, as alleged in paragraph nine of this complaint. XI. That the said defendant has retained in its possession each and all of the papers mentioned in paragraph 9 of this complaint since the receipt thereof by said defendant, and has never up to the time of the commencement of this action objected thereto, either to this plaintiff or to said bank, as not being sufficient as a notice or statement of loss or proofs of loss, as provided by the said bond heretofore mentioned, nor has said defendant raised any objection of any kind or nature whatsoever thereto, either to this plaintiff or to the said bank." The following entry appears in the record: "Plaintiff amends his bill of particulars by omitting all of sixth after first paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof, that the date of the dismissal or retirement was the 1st of March, 1892; that the acts of fraud and dishonesty referred to in paragraph 9 of said complaint were discovered between the 1st and 23d of May, 1892; and amends his complaint by striking out paragraphs 10 and 11 and inserting in lieu thereof, that between the 22d day of May, 1892, and the 18th of June, 1892, and again on the 24th of June, 1892, and as soon as practicable after the discovery of the aforesaid wrongful acts of the said Collins, this plaintiff duly notified the defendant in writing at his office at the city of New York, and on the 24th of June, 1892, and, as soon as practicable after the discovery of said acts, presented to the defendant a claim in writing for the losses occasioned by such acts of the said J. W. Collins. And the plaintiff has duly performed all the acts and things which the employer in and by said bond was obligated to do; all of which notices and claims were received and accepted by the defendant as in all things sufficient and in time. Plaintiff thereupon duly demanded from defendant that it make good and reimburse to plaintiff the sum of $25,000 and interest towards the amount of pecuniary loss sustained by said plaintiff by said acts."

Independently of the statement in the receiver's original bill of particulars (which, after being filed, was modified as just stated), there is no direct evidence in the record that Collins ceased to be president of the bank by 171] any formal act *on his part. He died March 3, 1892. It is true that he does not appear to have performed, or that he attempted to perform, any distinct act as president after the suspension of the bank on November 12, 1891. We have held, in the other case, that the mere suspension of the bank on November 12, 1891, followed by an investigation of its affair by a national bank examiner, did not have the effect to retire O'Brien from his position as cashier. The same rule must be applied in the case of the president of the bank, whose functions were only suspended while the affairs of the bank were being investigated by a national bank examiner. The circuit court of appeals well said, in support of this view, that if at any time before the receiver took possession on the 29th of December, 1891, the parties interested in the bank had made good its deficit and the bank examiner had restored its assets, no new appointment as president would have been necessary. In the former case there was evidence showing that O'Brien was, in fact, continued in the service of the receiver until about March 2, 1892, and that he claimed compensation for his services. On the day last named he left or retired from that service. There is no evidence in this case that Collins was formally retained by the receiver in his service. But even if, for that reason, it were held that he retired from the service of the employer, when the receiver qualified on December 29, 1892, still the six months from the "retirement of the employee from the service of the employer" would not have expired until June 29, 1892. It is sufficient in this case to adjudge that Collins, within the meaning of the bond, was in the service of the bank up at least to the date on which the receiver took possession, and that his fraudulent acts were discovered and notice thereof given within six months after that date. The acts of fraud and dishonesty complained of were discovered a few days prior to May 23, 1892, and notice thereof to the company was given on that day, and was followed by a claim or proof of loss mailed June 24, 1892, and received by the company July 1, 1892. Such are the facts which the verdict of the jury must be taken to have established. And if it be further true, as the verdict imports, that *the notice of May 23, 1892, was given as [172 soon as practicable after the occurrence of the alleged fraudulent acts came to the knowledge of the receiver, then the loss was discovered during the continuance of the bond and "within six months from the . . . retirement of the employee from the service of the employer." And if the bond is to be regarded as having expired upon the death of Collins, it also results that the claim of loss was made within the time required.

The objection that error was committed in admitting in evidence Collins's ledger account and proof of alleged prior frauds, as well as evidence showing the extent of Collins's indebtedness to the bank, is not well taken. The case was fairly tried, and there is no ground for supposing that any error of law was committed by the trial court.

The judgments of the Circuit Court and of the Circuit Court of Appeals are affirmed.

Mr. Justice White, with whom concurs Mr. Justice Shiras and Mr. Justice Peckham, dissenting:

The plaintiff in error was surety on a bond guaranteeing the faithful discharge by Collins of his duties as president of the bank. The object of the suit is to enforce the penalty of the bond, on the ground that the president, whose conduct it guaranteed, had been unfaithful, and hence that the surety had become liable.

On the trial of the cause the court instructed the jury that by the terms of the bond the burden of proof was shifted from the plaintiff (the receiver of the bank) to the defendant (the Surety Company), and that the former was entitled to recover against the latter without making any proof whatever of its claim if it had been shown that a proof of loss made in accordance with certain requisites specified in the bond had been transmitted to the Surety Company; that is to say, the jury were instructed that in case a proof of loss in a particular form had been made, its legal effect was to create a rule of evidence to govern in 173] any litigation *as to the bond which might thereafter arise between the parties. The result of this conclusion was to hold that the normal rule by which, in judicial proceedings, the burden is cast on a plaintiff to establish his case, was dispensed with, and therefore that the Surety Company, when sued under the contract, was called upon to establish the negative fact that it did not owe, and if it did not do so, a verdict was to be rendered against it. These conclusions of the trial court were affirmed by the court of appeals, and upon their correctness the validity of the judgment rendered below necessarily depends.

That there may be no mistake as to what was held by the trial court in its charge to the jury and what was decided by the court of appeals in affirming that charge, I excerpt passages from the charge of the trial court and the opinion of the appellate court.

In its charge to the jury the trial court said:

"Now, there is a provision in the policy to the effect that a written statement of loss, certified by the duly authorized officer or representative of the employer (receiver of the bank in this case) and based upon the accounts of the employer, shall be prima facie evidence thereof. In view of that condition of the policy, I instruct you that the plaintiff has established a prima facie case against the defendant, because he gave the written statement of loss, and subsequently transmitted to the defendant a copy of the account upon which it was based.

"Well, as I have said before, the plaintiff has made a prima facie case upon this issue because he has complied with that condition of the policy which prescribes that the written statement of claim shall be prima facie evidence of a loss within the terms of the policy. Now, it is for you to say, upon the other evidence in the case, which has been elicited principally upon the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, whether the defendant has overcome that case. If you conclude that the defendant has overcome that presumption, and, upon all the evidence before you, that the transactions in controversy are as consistent with the theory of honesty on the part of the 174] *president as of his dishonesty or fraud, then the defendant will be entitled to your verdict."

The reasoning of the court of appeals [38 U. S. App. 287, 72 Fed. Rep. 487, 18 C. C. A. 651] in affirming these instructions, was as follows:

"III. The court charged the jury that the 'plaintiff has established a prima facie case against the defendant, because he gave the written statement of loss, and subsequently transmitted to the defendant a copy of the account upon which it was based.' To this and to its repetition, in other words, defendant duly excepted.

"This part of the charge was based upon a provision of the bond which reads as follows: 'It being understood that a written statement of such loss, certified by the duly authorized officer or representative of the employer, and based upon the accounts of the employer, shall be prima facie evidence thereof.'

"It is contended that this does not mean that such statement shall be prima facie evidence in an action upon the bond; that 'no such contingency was in the minds of the parties;' that it only refers to a consideration by the company of the question whether it will pay without suit; that it only indicates in what way the preliminary proof of a loss shall be made to the company. But neither the phraseology of the clause, nor its collocation with the rest of the bond, thus restricts its meaning. It is certainly open to the construction put upon it by the trial judge; such construction is a most natural one; nor is there anything extraordinary or startling in an agreement by the company that it pay upon proof in a prescribed form being made to it, nor in its agreeing to accept such proof as prima facie sufficient to entitle the insured to a recovery in case of default. Conceding that it is also open to a construction which would confine it as plaintiff in error contends, it would be at least ambiguous, and it is elementary law that all obscurities and ambiguities in a policy of insurance are to be resolved against the underwriter, who has himself drafted the instrument. There was no error, therefore, in the charge in the particular complained of."

The opinion of this court just announced affirms the correctness *of the foregoing [175 propositions, and, because it does so, I am unable to give my assent to it.

The necessary effect of the construction given to the contract is to decide that by its terms the receiver of the bank was entitled to recover on the contract of suretyship for an alleged default of the president, whose fidelity the contract guaranteed, without making any legal proof whatever of the fact of a loss. This consequence inevitably results from holding that on its being made to appear that the bank had furnished a formal proof of loss under the contract, it was consequently entitled to recover without any proof of its right to do so. The contract did not require the bank in making the particular form of proof referred to in the bond as acceptable for the consideration of the Surety Company to verify it under oath, nor did it exact that it should be supported by any legal evidence whatever. Hence, by the contract, the bank could fulfil all the requirements referred to in that instrument as to the particular formal proof alluded to by simply making an unsworn statement to the guaranty company of what it claimed to be due, accompanying that statement with excerpts from the books of the bank. But as this mere unsworn statement of claim is now held by the court to constitute, in an action which might thereafter be brought to recover upon the bond, affirmative evidence of the liability of the Surety Company, which casts upon the latter the burden of showing that it did not owe, I submit that the ruling now made is exactly what I understand it to be—that is, a decision that under this contract the regular course of judicial proceedings between parties litigant is overthrown and a new rule is introduced, by which, when demand is made against the Surety Company, the person making the demand is relieved from proving the justice of his claim; and, on the contrary, the person against whom it is made, though called in as a defendant, is compelled as such to affirmatively establish the negative fact that it is not liable. So novel, so extreme, and, as it seems to me, so unjust a result, should not, in my opinion, be maintained unless the terms of the contract unmistakably make that con-

176] struction necessary. Instead of *this being the case, I think that not only the letter but the manifest purpose of the contract, as shown by its context, refutes the extreme construction now affixed to it. The provisions of the bond, which are pertinent to the question under consideration, are as follows:

After reciting the parties to the contract, that is, the American Surety Company of New York as party of the first part, Collins, as president of the bank, as party of the second part, and the bank as party of the third part, the bond states the employment of Collins in the capacity of president of the bank, and the application made to the Surety Company to guarantee the faithful performance of his duties. The bond then stipulates as follows:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the sum of one hundred and twenty-five dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, in hand paid to the company, as a premium for the term of twelve months ending on the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, at 12 o'clock noon, it is hereby declared and agreed that, subject to the provision herein contained, the company shall, within three months next after notice, accompanied by satisfactory proof, of a loss, as hereinafter mentioned, has been given to the company, make good and reimburse to the employer all and any pecuniary loss sustained by the employer of moneys, securities, or other personal property in the possession of the employee or for the possession of which he is responsible, by any act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of the employee, in connection with the duties of the office or position hereinbefore referred to, or the duties to which in the employer's service he may be subsequently appointed, and occurring during the continuance of this bond, and discovered during said continuance, or within six months thereafter, and within six months from the death or dismissal or retirement of the employee from the service of the employer. It being understood that a written statement of such loss, certified by the duly authorized officer or representative of the employer, and based upon the accounts of the employer, shall be prima facie evidence thereof."

177] *It is, I submit, plainly shown by the foregoing language, that the Surety Company reserved the right to decline to admit the validity of and to pay without suit any claim made upon the bond, unless notice of the loss was given accompanied by "satisfactory proof" thereof. The words, "satisfactory proof," must have some meaning. But, in reason, the only effect now given to them is that the proof of loss must have been satisfactory to the one who made it; that is, that the parties to the contract meant to say, that whenever the bank was satisfied it had a claim, the fact of its being so satisfied was sufficient to relieve it of all obligation to prove such claim, and to cast upon the Surety Company the duty of showing that the bank was not warranted in asserting a right to recover. The deduction to which the construction thus referred to leads is a conclusive demonstration of its unsoundness. Indeed, if it were the true one, the words "satisfactory proof" have no place in the contract, for it follows that, if the bank preferred a claim under the bond, it would do so because it was satisfied it had a claim, and, therefore, satisfactory proof of a loss under the construction given to it, if it means anything, means only this, that the bank was to be the sole judge of whether a claim existed in its favor, and that this judgment of the bank in advance in its own favor was to be the determinative rule controlling, not only the mind of the guaranty company, but regulating any judicial proceeding which might thereafter arise concerning the obligations created by the contract. But, manifestly, the words, "after notice, accompanied by satisfactory proof of loss," referred, not to the bank by whom the claim was to be made as the person to whom the proof should be satisfactory, but the Surety Company against whom the claim might be asserted. In other words, the contract plainly declares that the Surety Company only agrees to pay within three months next after notice accompanied by satisfactory proof of loss, that is, by a proof of loss with which it was satisfied. But it is said that, whatever may be the meaning of the particular clause in the contract to which I have just referred, it is controlled by the concluding sentence found in the excerpt which has been made *from the bond. Between the sen-
178] tences relating to the satisfactory proof of a loss and that relied upon the contract contains an enumeration of the character of acts which the bond is intended to guarantee against, and affixes certain limitations of time within which the acts therein referred to must have been discovered. These stipulations intervening between the one as to satisfactory proof and the one relied upon as modifying or controlling the former, bear no relation to the matter under consideration, and, therefore, may be omitted from view for the purpose of the question in hand. To test, then, the correctness of the construction now upheld I eliminate these intervening stipulations and bring into juxtaposition the provision as to satisfactory proof and the subsequent language which it is claimed destroys the legal effect of the prior clause. The contract thus arranged would then read as follows:

"The company shall within three months next after notice, accompanied by satisfactory proof of a loss, as hereinafter mentioned, has been given to the company, make good and reimburse to the employer all and any pecuniary loss sustained by the employer. . . . It being understood that written statement of such loss certified by the duly authorized officer or representative of the employer and based upon the accounts of the employer shall be prima facie evidence thereof."

Construing the whole of this clause, it strikes me that its purport is free from real difficulty. The first provision reserves a full right to the company to reject a claim, provided the proof is not satisfactory to it, of the fact of the loss; the second provision stipulates that the company is bound to treat a statement made in a particular form as being presumptive evidence which must be considered by it in arriving at a conclusion as to whether the loss itself was established to its satisfaction. In other words, the one provision, that of satisfactory proof of a loss, refers to the state of mind of the corporation which is to result from the proof in order that it may admit the validity of the claim without suit; the second relates merely to the form in which a claim may be preferred, and provides that if it is preferred in that form

179] the company *shall be put to a decision as to whether its substantive effect as evidence is satisfactory to it. Consider also the object of the stipulation. The ninety days for voluntary payment of the claim could only begin to run after the furnishing of the proof of loss. The company, however, had a right to pass upon the sufficiency of such proof, not merely as to form, but as to its probative effect, whether it constituted satisfactory evidence of the liability of the Surety Company or not; and in order to exclude all questions as to the period when this time should commence a stipulation was inserted that proof presented in a particular form would be accepted as prima facie or presumptive evidence of the fact of a loss. The stipulation, therefore, that a particular form of proof when furnished to the company should be prima facie evidence, did not amount to a declaration by the company that it would also be "satisfactory proof" within the meaning of the previous clause. To say that it did would be to give to the words "prima facie" the meaning of "conclusive." Can it be doubted that under the contract the company would have had a right to call upon the bank to make a sworn statement or comply with other reasonable requirements, although the bank had made the formal statement referred to? Clearly not, I submit. In other words, then, the Surety Company, despite the receipt of the written statement referred to, retained the right to determine whether it satisfactorily proved or established the fact of a loss. The difference between the two clauses is that which must ever exist between form and substance, and the failure to appreciate this fact is exemplified in the reasoning of the court of appeals, where it was declared that the provision as to "satisfactory proof" amounted to an agreement by the Surety Company that it would pay "upon proof in a prescribed form being made to it," and that the stipulation as to the furnishing of a written statement based upon the accounts of the bank was an agreement "to accept such proof as prima facie sufficient to entitle the insured to a recovery in case of default." And the necessary consequence of this ruling was to hold that the right to judge whether there had been a loss
180] under the contract was taken *away from the company, and that it was bound to make a voluntary payment upon the mere unsworn statement of the party making the claim based upon the accounts of the bank, even though, upon investigation, it developed that the accounts of the bank were utterly unreliable and manifestly insufficient as the foundation of a claim.

It being in reason unquestionable that the company only agreed to pay without suit in case the evidence presented to it was satisfactory as proof, can it be held that its agreement that a certain form of proof should be treated by it in its consideration of the claim as prima facie evidence of the loss, constituted a contract to accept the designated form as proof, having the effect to overthrow the previous express stipulation and as denying the right of the Surety Company to decline to pay without suit if the proof in its opinion did not satisfactorily establish the loss? In other words, that the implied stipulation, that a certain class of proof had been tendered to the company for the exercise of its judgment should be treated as sufficient in form, should be construed as meaning that it should be regarded as adequate in substance, and as establishing a right to payment of the loss.

As I have said, it seems to me the two provisions of the bond are harmonious, and are susceptible of a construction which will give a fair and reasonable effect to both. They ought not, therefore, to be so construed as not only to make the one destroy the other, but so as to give a significance to the contract never intended by the parties, and thereby to overthrow the elementary rule governing all judicial proceedings, that is, that upon the one who makes a claim there rests the burden of establishing it.

That the parties did not intend by the contract to create a rule of evidence to govern any suit which might arise on the bond is in addition shown by another and subsequent provision of the contract, wherein it is stated that an action or suit to recover upon the bond shall be barred if not brought within a year from the presentation of the claim. If the purpose of the contracting parties had been to regulate and control subsequent proceedings in the courts growing out of the *coutract, the [181] natural place to have expressed that purpose would have been in the clause of the contract treating of actions upon the bond. But no such stipulation is therein found.

It is, of course, unquestioned that many authorities hold that where there is an ambiguity in a contract of insurance a reasonable doubt as to its construction will be resolved in favor of the insured, because the policy is presumed to have been drawn by the officers or agents of the insurer. But granting arguendo that this rule applies to a contract of suretyship of the character of that under consideration, I know of no case which pushes the principle to the extent of holding that the express provisions of a contract must be destroyed and thereby a liability be enforced against the insurer, not in harmony with the contract, in conflict with its spirit, in violation of the manifest intention of the parties, and productive of great injustice. In other words, that where by the express terms of a contract the insurer agrees to pay without litigation only where the proof of the validity of the claim is satisfactory to him, that it is to be held that because he has declared that in making up his judgment as to whether the evidence is satisfactory he will treat a statement of the loss certified by the claimant as prima facie evidence, he thereby renounces his right to form a judgment as to the satisfactory nature of that evidence. Indeed, the doctrine goes not only to the extent of depriving the insurer of his right to pass judgment upon the evidence submitted, but it causes the contract to operate beyond the minds of the contracting parties and to control the judgment of any judicial tribunal subsequently called to pass upon any controversy arising upon the bond. Does not this follow from the fact that it is declared that the stipulation that a statement made by the claimant in a peculiar form shall be prima facie evidence, not only nullifies the provision that the whole proof must be satisfactory to the person against whom the claim is made, but also compels a court to say that although no legal proof whatever under the rules of evidence has been offered at the trial on behalf of the claimant, yet that the liability 182] of *the defendant has been established, and there must be a judgment against him, unless he conclusively shows that no loss had been sustained by the plaintiffs?

Federal question—motion for leave to answer—motion to quash proceedings.

1. An averment in a suit in a state court, that a state statute is unconstitutional and void, is not sufficient to raise a Federal question, but is to be taken as applying to the Constitution of the state, and not to the Constitution of the United States.
2. Federal questions which would have been raised if an answer had been amended as proposed cannot be considered upon their merits on writ of error to a state court, merely because a motion for leave to amend the answer was made without showing any reasons therefor, but was overruled and no exception taken to the ruling.
3. The denial of a motion to discharge a rule requiring an answer to a petition, and to quash all proceedings taken under an alleged unconstitutional statute, does not bring any Federal question into the record, as the denial may have been made upon the ground that the questions might more properly arise upon demurrer, plea, or answer.

Submitted March 14, 1898. Decided April 18, 1898.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois to review a judgment of that court that a mandamus issue commanding the superintendent of police of Chicago, Joseph Kipley, to notify the civil service commissioners of vacancies in certain offices and the civil service commissioners to submit to him as such superintendent the names of applicants for promotion. There are two writs of error. The cases were consolidated in this court. On motion to dismiss each writ of error for want of jurisdiction. Dismissed.

NOTE.—As to adoption by Federal courts of remedies created by state statutes; preservation of equity jurisdiction; enlargement of equitable remedies; limitation or enlargement of equity powers; extending legal remedies; limiting equitable jurisdiction,—see note to Leighton v. Young (C. C. A. 8th C.) 18 L. R. A. 266.

As to effect of decisions of state courts in Federal courts; rule of property; questions of general or commercial law; effect of state decisions in other states; Federal questions,—see note to Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (Pa.) 5 L. R. A. 508.

Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States to review state judgments; Federal question.

The decision in the state court which involved no question of Federal law is not reviewable here. Santa Cruz County Supers. v. Santa Cruz R. Co. 111 U. S. 361 (28: 456); Christ Church v. Philadelphia County, 20 How. 26 (15: 802).

This court will not entertain jurisdiction of state judgments where, besides the Federal question decided by the state court, there is another and distinct ground on which the judgment can be sustained. Kennebec & P. R. Co. v. Portland & K. R. Co. 14 Wall. 23 (20: 850); Rector v. Ashley, 6 Wall. 142 (18: 753); Gibson v. Chouteau, 8 Wall. 314 (19: 317); Klinger v. Missouri, 13 Wall. 257 (20: 635).

To give this court jurisdiction it must appear affirmatively on the face of the record, not only that a Federal question was raised, but that it was decided, or that its decision was necessary to the judgment or decree rendered in the case. Detroit City R. Co. v. Guthard, 114 U. S. 133 (29: 118).

It is not enough to give this court jurisdiction over the judgment of a state court, for the record to show that a Federal question was argued or presented to that court for decision. It must appear that its decision was necessary to the determination of the cause, and that it was actually decided, or that the judgment could not have been given without deciding it. Moore v. Mississippi, 21 Wall. 638 (22: 653); Bolling v. Lersner, 91 U. S. 594 (23: 366); Brown v. Atwell, 92 U. S. 327 (23: 511); Citizens Bank v. Louisiana Bd. of Liquidation, 98 U. S. 140 (25: 114).

To give this court jurisdiction to revise the judgment of the state court, it must appear that the point on which plaintiff relies was made in the state court and decided against him, and that the section of the Constitution of the United States relied on was brought to the notice of the state court, and the right which he now claims here claimed under it. Poydras de la Lande v. Louisiana, 18 How. 192 (15: 350); Maxwell v. Newbold, 18 How. 511 (15: 506); Hoyt v. Thompson, 1 Black, 518 (17: 65); Farney v. Towle, 1 Black, 350 (17: 216); Taylor v. Morton, 2 Black, 481 (17: 277); The Victory v. Boylan, 6 Wall. 382 (18: 848); Worthy v. The Commissioners, 9 Wall. 611 (19: 565); Messenger v. Mason, 10 Wall. 507 (19: 1028); Cockroft v. Vose, 14 Wall. 5 (20: 875); Caperton v. Bowyer, 14 Wall. 216 (20: 882); Susquehanna Boom Co. v. West Branch Boom Co. 110 U. S. 57 (28: 69); Santa Cruz County Supers. v. Santa Cruz R. Co. 111 U. S. 361 (28: 456).

The final judgment or decree of the highest court of a state in which a decision could be had may be re-examined by the Supreme Court of the United States only where the decision involved a Federal question and was adverse to the right claimed under it. The form of the decision is immaterial. Gordon v. Caldcleugh, 3 Cranch, 268 (2: 436); Montgomery v. Hernandez, 12 Wheat. 129 (6: 575); Williams v. Morris, 12 Wheat. 117 (6: 571); Menard v. Aspasia, 5 Pet. 505 (8: 207); Fulton v. M'Affee, 16 Pet. 149 (10: 918); Strader v. Baldwin, 9 How. 261 (13: 130); Calcote v. Stanton, 18 How. 243 (15: 348); Burke v. Gaines, 19 How. 388 (15: 655); Verden v. Coleman, 1 Black, 472 (17: 161); Roosevelt v. Meyer, 1 Wall. 512 (17: 500); Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall.

eral of Illinois, George W. Smith, Frank P. Blair, and Murry Nelson, Jr., for defendant in error, in favor of motion to dismiss.

Mr. Charles S. Thornton for plaintiff in error, in opposition to motion.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The attorney general of Illinois filed in the supreme court of Illinois, at its June term, 1897, an original petition against Joseph Kipley, superintendent of police of the city of Chicago, and Adolph Kraus, Dudley Winston, and Hempstead Washburne, commissioners appointed under the act of the legislature of Illinois in force on and after March 20, 1895, entitled "An Act to Regulate the Civil Service of Cities."

183] *The application for leave to file the petition was accompanied by a suggestion upon the part of the attorney general that the case involved an interpretation of the above act.

The prayer of the petition was that a writ of mandamus issue commanding Kipley, as superintendent of police of Chicago, to notify the civil service commissioners of all vacancies existing in the positions of assistant superintendent of police, inspectors of police and captains of police in the city of Chicago, and commanding the civil service commissioners to submit to Kipley, as superintendent of police, the names of not more than three applicants for promotion for each vacancy from the grade next below that in which such vacancy or vacancies exist, and that the petitioner have such other or further relief as the nature of the case required.

Kipley filed a separate answer, in which he insisted that he had acted, in all respects, in conformity with law. He also averred that although the act regulating the civil service of cities was passed and approved substantially as stated in the petition, and was afterwards submitted to a vote of the electors of Chicago and adopted by a large majority of votes, it was "unconstitutional and void," in that it purported to confer judicial powers and authority to make and enforce judgments and decisions of a nonjudicial body, described and set forth in the act as the civil service commission.

Subsequently, June 28, 1897, the city council of Chicago passed an ordinance designating certain public officers who should be selected by the mayor with the concurrence of the council. Kipley, July 10, 1897, filed a plea, setting forth this ordinance, and alleging, in relation, the appointment by the civil service commissioners of certain subordinate police officers of the city, that they "have been, if they ever were within the same, wholly taken away from and removed out of the control, jurisdiction, and power of the said civil service commissioners, so that such matters are now expressly excepted by its very terms from the force and effect of said civil service act.

On the 7th day of October, 1897, Kipley asked leave of the *court to withdraw his plea, [184 and also to amend his answer so as to embody therein averments to the effect that the relator was not entitled to a writ of mandamus and that the court had no jurisdiction or power to grant the same, because the said civil service act of March 20, 1895, was null and void and Charleston, 96 U. S. 432 (24: 760); Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 248 (26: 135); Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415 (26: 187); Hartman v. Greenhow, 102 U. S. 672 (26: 271).

A judgment by the supreme court of the state of Washington, on denial of a rehearing for which an application made to the supreme court of the territory was pending at the admission of the state, is not a judgment of a territorial court, but of a state court, which can be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States only on the ground of a Federal question. Northern P. R. Co. v. Holmes, 155 U. S. 137 (39: 99); Northern P. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 155 U. S. 141 (39: 100).

An affirmance by a state court of a decision dismissing a suit for want of equity cannot be brought to the Supreme Court of the United States. Winter v. Montgomery, 156 U. S. 385 (39: 460).

The denial by a state court of an application to amend a petition for removal is not the denial of any right secured by the Constitution of the United States, and is not the subject of review in the Supreme Court of the United States. Stevens v. Nichols, 157 U. S. 370 (39: 736).

Rulings on evidence made by state courts cannot give jurisdiction for a writ of error from the United States Supreme Court on the ground that constitutional rights were denied. Sayward v. Denny, 158 U. S. 180 (39: 941).

A claim that the appointment of a receiver is an unconstitutional deprivation of property does not raise a real, as distinguished from a fictitious, Federal question, which will sustain a writ of error to a state court from the Supreme Court of the United States. St. Louis, G. & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Missouri, Merriam, 156 U. S. 478 (39: 502).

The claim that due process of law was denied by a state court cannot be made for the first time in the Supreme Court of the United States to sustain a writ of error to the state court. Re Robertson, 156 U. S. 183 (39: 389).

A claim that a state court did not give full faith and credit to a statute of another state and judicial decisions thereon does not make a Federal question, where such statute and decisions were not proved. Lloyd v. Matthews, 155 U. S. 222 (39: 128).

A definite issue as to the validity of a statute or the possession of a right must be distinctly deducible from the record before a state court can be held to have disposed of a Federal question, by its decision. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Louisville, 166 U. S. 709 (41: 113).

An allegation that a statute as construed by the court is in violation of the Constitution of the state and of the United States, made in a motion to set aside a judgment on an agreed case which presents no issue as to the validity of the statute, is not sufficient to present a Federal question. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Louisville, 166 U. S. 709 (41: 1173).

A Federal question is sufficiently set up and denied when distinctly asserted by the defendant in a written motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial in a condemnation case in which no provision is made for filing an answer, but is denied by the overruling of the motion, and is again asserted in an assignment of errors filed in the supreme court, but necessarily denied by that court in its decision, although the opinion does not expressly refer to the Federal question. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 258 (41: 979, 992).

A decision by a state court as to the power of a contrary to the Constitution of the state of Illinois and the Constitution of the United States in that—

"1. It abridges the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States, because it operates to exclude from the classified service of such city as therein specified all such citizens as do not apply for office or for place of employment.

"2. The said act of March 20, 1895, deprives a duly elected and qualified officer of the right to select his subordinates and provide the requisite agencies for performing his official duties, thus abridging the rights, privileges, and immunities belonging and guaranteed by the said Constitutions, respectively, to every citizen thereof.

"3. The said act of March 20, 1895, provides for the invasion of the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures.

"4. The said act of March 20, 1895, purports to prescribe for the criminal trial of public officers for nonfeasance, for misfeasance, for malfeasance in office, and for the infliction of penalties therefor, of deprivation of office, of fine, of imprisonment, and incapacity to hold office thereafter by a nonjudicial body, and in such manner that the accused shall not enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state or district wherein the crime shall have been committed; and without informing the accused of the nature and cause of the accusation, and without confronting the accused with the witnesses against him, and without permitting the accused to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for the defense.

"5. That the said act denies to the citizens the freedom of political action, making it highly penal for the citizen to take part in party politics.

"6. That said act of March 20, 1895, [185 provides for the creation and maintenance of an office-holding class, at the expense of the people who are excluded therefrom by the operation of the said act.

"7. And generally said act of March 20, 1895, is directly in contravention of the right of that clause of the United States Constitution which prescribes that 'all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws.'

"8. And further, the said act of March 20, 1895, generally denominated the civil service act, is absolutely null and void because the same purports to require the civil officers of the city of Chicago to undergo tests as to qualification for office and public employment in addition to the requirement of section 25 of article 5 of said Constitution of the state of Illinois, and because it provides for a political test for the said commissioners respectively therein named, and because, further, the same national bank to become a stockholder in a savings bank presents a Federal question. California Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362 (ante, 198).

A decision by the highest court of a state against the validity of a lease made by a national banking association which is not yet authorized to commence business, but which has made and filed its articles of association, is subject to review by writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States, when the lessor specially set up and claimed a right to recover on the lease under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5136, on the ground that the lease was within the exception of incidental and preliminary business and also that the prohibition of business by that section did not make prohibited contracts invalid as between the parties. McCormick v. Market Nat. Bank, 165 U. S. 538 (41: 817).

The alleged unconstitutionality of a state statute will not sustain a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to a state court, where the plaintiff in error in the state court alleged its repugnancy merely to the Constitution of the state, and did not claim that it was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Levy v. San Francisco Super. Ct. 167 U. S. 175 (ante, 126).

The validity of subscriptions by a county court to the stock of a railroad company, and of a conveyance to that company, and the matter of fraud in a decree, are questions of local law or practice on which the judgment of a state court cannot be reexamined by the Supreme Court of the United States. Oxley Stave Co. v. Butler County, 166 U. S. 648 (41: 1149).

The general allegation or claim that a decree was passed against some persons who were at the time dead, and against others who were necessary parties, but who had no notice of the proceedings, does not set up a right or immunity under the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Oxley Stave Co. v. Butler County, 166 U. S. 648 (41: 1149).

A claim for the rescission of a contract for the exchange of an inveution for a stock of merchandise, which is denied by a state court, does not present any ground for a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to a state court. Wade v. Lawder, 165 U. S. 624 (41: 851).

An appeal in a suit in which it is claimed in good faith that a state statute is in contravention of the Federal Constitution is within the appellate jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court. Hastings v. Ames, 32 U. S. App. 485, 68 Fed. Rep. 726, 15 C. C. A. 628.

A decision that one was not in possession of land involves no Federal question which can be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error to a state court. Turner v. New York, 168 U. S. 90 (ante, 392).

A claim that a statute is unconstitutional and denies "inherent indefeasible rights" and a "remedy by the due course of law" (using the words of a state Constitution), is presumed to refer to the state Constitution only, and is insufficient to raise a Federal question. Miller v. Cornwall R. Co. 168 U. S. 131 (ante, 409).

A Federal question not specially set up or claimed prior to the decision in the supreme court of a state will not sustain a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to the state court. Winona & St. P. Land Co. v. Minnesota, 159 U. S. 540 (40: 252).

The fact that a state court, while declaring a statute to be in violation of the Federal Constitution, yet by its judgment gave effect to it, does not make a case for a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States, when the decision of the Fed-is in contravention of section 22 of article 4 of said Constitution as well as many other provisions of said state Constitution."

Kipley also asked leave to file "a supplemental answer," averring that since the filing of his original answer the city council had passed the above ordinance of June 28, 1897.

The motions for leave to withdraw the plea, to amend the answer, and to file a supplemental answer were severally denied.

On a subsequent day of the term Kipley entered a motion to discharge the rule requiring the respondents to answer the petition, and to quash all proceedings that had been taken, assigning as reason therefor that the civil service act of March 20, 1895, was contrary to the Constitution of Illinois and the Constitution of the United States upon certain specified grounds. They were the same as those specified 186] in the *above motion for leave to amend the answer. That motion was also denied.

On the 22d day of December, 1897, the supreme court of Illinois rendered its final judgment, granting the relief asked in the petition for mandamus.

The final order of the court was that a writ of mandamus issue, commanding Kipley, superintendent of police of Chicago, to notify the civil service commissioners of all vacancies existing in the positions of assistant superintendent of police, inspectors of police and captains of police in that city, and the civil service commissioners to submit to him, as such superintendent of police, the names of not more than three applicants for promotion for each vacancy from the next grade below that in which such vacancy or vacancies existed.

Kipley, having given previous notice thereof, filed a petition for rehearing on the 8th day of January, 1898, but before that petition was disposed of he sued out a writ of error to this court. That constitutes case No. 586. The rehearing having been denied, he sued out another writ of error, and that constitutes case No. 601. The citation in each case was signed by the chief justice of the state court. The cases on motion were consolidated in this court, and are before us on motion to dismiss each writ of error for want of jurisdiction.

We are of the opinion that this court is without jurisdiction to review the final judgment of the supreme court of Illinois in these cases. The answer makes no reference whatever to the Constitution or laws of the United States. It is true that it avers that the Illinois civil service act was "unconstitutional and void." But when the jurisdiction of this court is invoked for the protection, against the final judgment of the highest court of a state, of some title, right, privilege, or immunity secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States, it must appear expressly or by necessary intendment, from the record, that such right, title, privilege, or immunity was "specially set up or claimed" under such Constitution or laws. Rev. Stat. 709. Our jurisdiction cannot arise in such case from inference, but only from averments so distinct and positive as to place it beyond question that the party bringing *the case up intended to assert a Federal [187 right. F. G. Oxley Stave Co. v. Butler County, 166 U. S. 648 [41:1149]; Levy v. San Francisco Superior Court, 167 U. S. 175, 177 [42:126]. The averment in the answer, that the statute of Illinois was unconstitutional and void, must be taken as intended to apply to the Constitu-eral question was not an essential element in determining the right adjudicated. Ruthland R. Co. v. Central Vermont R. Co. 159 U. S. 630 (40: 284).

A Federal question involved in a decision of a state court will not be looked into by the Supreme Court of the United States if there is another independent ground of the decision by the state court upon which its judgment can rest. Bacon v. Texas, 163 U. S. 207 (41: 132); Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 160 U. S. 556 (40: 536); Chemical Nat. Bank v. City Bank, 160 U. S. 646 (40: 568).

A decision which does not deny the validity of an act of Congress or deny any right claimed under it does not present a Federal question merely because the rights of the parties were in some respects based upon an act of Congress. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 160 U. S. 556 (40: 536).

Jurisdiction having been acquired on the ground that the constitutionality of a law of the United States is drawn in question, the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error to a district court has power to dispose of the entire case, including all questions whether of jurisdiction or of merits. Chappell v. United States, 160 U. S. 499 (40: 510).

An assignment of errors cannot be availed of to import into a cause questions which the record does not show were raised in the court below and rulings asked thereon, so as to give jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of the United States under the act of Congress of March 3, 1891, § 5. Cornell v. Green, 163 U. S. 75 (41: 76).

A writ of error to a state court will not lie from the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that the obligation of a contract is impaired by a decision construing a valid statute. Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103 (40: 91).

The erroneous decision of a Federal question by a state court will not give jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of the United States, if questions of fact adequate to determine the controversy and broad enough to maintain the judgment independent of any Federal question were decided. Egan v. Hart, 165 U. S. 188 (41: 680).

A denial by a state court of the effect claimed for an equitable title apparently conveyed by proceedings in the United States land office presents a Federal question. Hussman v. Durham, 165 U. S. 144 (41: 664).

A Federal question presented by an unsuccessful claim of title under a congressional land grant is not made ineffectual as the basis of a writ of error by the fact that the answer also sets up certain proceedings in the land department, the decision of which was adverse and has not been set aside. Northern P. R. Co. v. Colburn, 164 U. S. 383 (41: 479).

An alleged conflict between proceedings confirmed by a state court and rights claimed unsuccessfully under the Constitution of the United States, including the contention that a party is deprived of property without due process of law, presents a Federal question. Tregea v. Modesto Irrig. Dist. 164 U. S. 179 (41: 395).

The question whether private property has been taken for any other than a public use is a Federal question. Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112 (41: 369).

A decision sustaining plaintiff's claim in ejectment based upon a patent of the United States for a mining claim does not present any Federal question, when the defenses were based solely upon an estoppel in pais and a statute of limitations. Carothers v. Mayer, 164 U. S. 325 (41: 453).

tion of that state, and not to the Constitution of the United States. In Miller v. Cornwall R. R. Co. 168 U. S. 131, 134 [42: 409, 410], this court, speaking by the chief justice, said: "We have no jurisdiction on a writ of error to a state court to declare a state law void on account of its collision with a state Constitution, and it was long ago held that where it was objected in the state courts that an act of the state was 'unconstitutional and void,' the objection was properly construed in those courts as raising the question whether the state legislature had the power under the state Constitution to pass the act, and not as having reference to any repugnance to the Constitution of the United States. Porter v. Foley, 65 U. S. 24 How. 415 [16: 740].

It is manifest that, when the answer was drawn, neither the defendant Kipley nor the learned counsel representing him intended to raise any question of a Federal nature. We cannot suppose that it occurred to either of them at that time that the civil service act of Illinois was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

Nor was any question of a Federal character raised or intended to be raised by the plea which brought before the court the city ordinance of June 28, 1897.

It is, however, said that the motion for leave to amend the answer did specially set up and claim that the Illinois civil service act violated certain rights, privileges, and immunities belonging to the plaintiff in error under the Constitution of the United States. But as the supreme court of Illinois did not allow the proposed amendment of the answer the questions suggested by the amendment did not arise for determination. To the action of the court in disallowing the amendment, no exception was taken. The grounds upon which these motions were denied appear from the opinion of the court as follows: "By this motion respondent Kipley asks, first, for leave to withdraw his plea; second, to file an amended answer; and 188] *third, to file a supplemental answer. Nothing more is before us than the bare motion. No showing has been made nor reasons filed in support of the motion, and we are unable to say whether the motion should be allowed or not, and it must therefore be overruled." People, Akin, v. Kipley, 167 Ill 638. This action of the state court does not raise a Federal question which this court can examine. The suggestion that the Federal questions which would have been raised, if the answer had been amended as proposed, should be considered upon their merits precisely as they might have been if the motion to amend had been allowed, cannot be entertained for a moment. It was in the discretion of the court to deny the motion to amend, when no reasons were assigned for its allowance, and to hold the parties to the issues made by the original petition and answers; and there is nothing in the record justifying the couclusion that its discretion, in that regard, was exercised with the intent or so as to deprive the defendant either of any right or immunity to which he was entitled under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or of the privilege of setting up or claiming in due time and in proper form any such right or immunity.

It may be observed that the opinion of the state court delivered upon final hearing contains nothing to show that any Federal question was considered or determined. The general subject to which the attention of the court was directed is shown by the following extract from its opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Magruder: "The evils sought to be remedied by legislation of this character are well known and well understood. These evils are such as grow out of what is generally called the 'spoils system.' . . . The foundation principles of the act are, that appointments to municipal offices or employment must be made according to merit and fitness, to be ascertained by competitive examinations, free to all; and that promotions from lower to higher grades in the public service must be made upon the basis of merit." People, Akin, v. Kipley, 171 Ill. 44-93. The validity of the enactment in question was considered by that court with reference only to the state Constitution.

*In respect of the motion to discharge [189 the rule and all preceedings against the respondents it need only be said that it could have been denied upon the ground that the questions sought to be raised by it might more properly arise upon demurrer, plea, or answer. Its denial did not have the effect to bring any Federal question into the record to be determined. It may also be observed that no exception was taken to the action of the state court in relation to this motion.

This court having no jurisdiction to re examine the final judgments of the state court in these cases, the motion to dismiss the writs of error is sustained.

Dismissed.

Mr. Justice White dissents.

BENJAMIN HAWKER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 189-205.)

State law as to practice of medicine—evidence of character—conviction of crime—ex post facto law.

1. Legislation by the state which simply defines the qualifications of one who attempts to practise medicine is a proper exercise of its police power.
2. A state may require good character as a condition of the practice of medicine, and may rightfully determine what shall be the evidences of that character.

NOTE.—As to what is due process of law, see note to Pearson v. Yewdall, 24: 436.

As to retrospective statutes, when valid, see note to Otoe County v. Baldwin, 28: 331.

As to constitutionality of ex post facto laws, see notes to Calder v. Bull, 1: 648; and Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4: 529.

As to constitutionality of regulations as to practice of medicine, see note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 579, 581.

As to experience and skill required of physicians; liability for malpractice,—see note to Nelson v. Harrington (Wis.) 1 L. R. A. 719, 720.

3. The legislature of a state may enact that one who has been convicted of crime shall no longer engage in the practice of medicine.

4. Such legislation is not an additional punishment for past offenses or an ex post facto law, but prescribes the qualifications for the position and the appropriate evidence of such qualifications.

IN ERROR to the Court of General Sessions of the Peace for the City and County of New York, State of New York, to review a judgment of that court entered in pursuance of a decision of the Court of Appeals of that State convicting Benjamin Hawker of the crime of abortion. Affirmed.

See same case below, 152 N. Y. 234.

Statement by Mr. Justice Brewer:

In 1878 the plaintiff in error, defendant below, was tried and convicted in the court of sessions of Kings county, New York, of the crime of abortion, and sentenced to imprison-190] ment *in the penitentiary for the term of ten years. In 1893 the legislature of the state of New York passed an act entitled "The Public Health Law" (Laws 1893, chap 661), which, as amended by the Laws of 1895, chap. 398, provides, among other things, as follows:

"Sec. 153. Any person who, . . . after conviction of a felony, shall attempt to practise medicine, or shall so practise, . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than two hundred and fifty dollars, or imprisonment for six months for the first offense, and on conviction of any subsequent offense, by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, or imprisonment for not less than one year, or by both fine and imprisonment."

Under this statute defendant was indicted in April, 1896, in the court of general sessions of the peace for the city and county of New York. The indictment alleged the conviction in 1878, and charged that, having been so convicted of the crime and felony of abortion, defendant did, on the 22d day of February, 1896, in the city of New York, unlawfully practise medicine "by then and there unlawfully examining, treating, and prescribing for one Dora Henig." To this indictment he demurred. The demurrer was overruled, and, upon a plea of not guilty, he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of $250. That conviction having been sustained by the court of appeals of the state (152 N. Y. 234), and a remittitur sent down, a final judgment was entered in the court of general sessions, whereupon he sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Hugh O. Pentecost for plaintiff in error, on first argument.

Messrs. John D. Lindsay, Robert C. Taylor, and W. M. K. Olcott, for defendant in error, on first argument.

Mr. Hugh O. Pentecost, for plaintiff in error, on reargument:

In practising medicine, as alleged, after having been convicted of a felony, as alleged, defendant committed no crime.

The statute should be construed prospectively.

Amsbry v. Hinds, 48 N. Y. 57; Johnson v. Burrell, 2 Hill, 238; Fairbanks v. Wood, 17 Wend. 329; Wood v. Oakley, 11 Paige, 400; Quinn v. New York, 63 Barb. 595; Wilson v. Baptist Education Soc. 10 Barb. 308; Quackenbush v. Danks, 1 Denio, 128, 1 N. Y. 129.

If said law is construed retrospectively, then it is null and void, because it is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

The law in question in this case, if construed retrospectively, is ex post facto in that it aggravates a crime and makes it greater than it was when committed, and in that it changes the punishment and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed.

Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386 (1: 648); Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 321 (18: 362).

It deprives the defendant of liberty and property without due process of law.

Messrs. Asa Bird Gardiner and Robert C. Taylor, for defendant in error, on reargument:

The police power extends to the protection of the public health, and comprises the regulation of the practice of medicine.

In the proper exercise of this right the state has the power to exclude from practice any person whose character is admittedly or adjudicatedly bad.

Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277 (18: 356); Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333 (18: 366).

The character of a physician is an important element in determining whether he possesses the necessary qualifications for the practice of his profession.

State, Powell, v. State Medical Examining Bd. 32 Minn. 324.

The legislature has the same power to require, as a condition of the right to practice this profession, that the practitioner shall be possessed of the qualifications of honor and good moral character, as it has to require that he shall be learned in the profession.

Conviction of a felony is proof of bad moral character.

Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265 (27: 552).

If the legislation is calculated, intended, convenient, and appropriate to accomplish the good of protecting the public health and of serving the public comfort and safety, the exercise of the legislative discretion is not the subject of judicial review.

The necessity of arbitrary determination of the qualification of physicians has been fully recognized and sustained.

Ex parte Spinney, 10 Nev. 323; Hewitt v. Charier, 16 Pick. 353; People v. Phippin, 70 Mich. 6.

A physician's right to practice is a mere license; analogy of a druggist's, an attorney's, and a liquor license.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 745; State v. Proudfit, 3 Ohio, 63; Gray v. Connecticut, 159 U. S. 76 (40: 81); State v. Hibbard, 3 Ohio, 63. State v. Gazlay, 5 Ohio, 14; Metropolitan Bd. of Excise v. Barrie, 34 N. Y. 657

The exaction of a new requirement as to character in physicians deprives Hawker of no vested right.

Gray v. Connecticut, 159 U. S. 76, 77 (40: 81); Re Percy, 36 N. Y. 651; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 643 (31: 205); New York Health Department v. Trinity Church, 145 N. Y. 32, 27 L. R. The right of the state of New York to deny to Hawker a future privilege upon the ground that his unfitness has been proved by his past conduct is abundantly justified.

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question presented is as to the [191 consititutionality *of this statute when applied to one who had been convicted of a felony prior to its enactment. Its unconstitutionality is alleged on the ground of an alleged conflict with article 1, § 10, of the Constitution of the United States, which forbids a state to pass "any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts." The arguments for and against this contention may be thus briefly stated:

On the one hand, it is said that defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced for a criminal offense. He suffered the punishment pronounced. The legislature has no power to thereafter add to that punishment. The right to practise medicine is a valuable property right. To deprive a man of it is in the nature of punishment, and after the defendant has once fully atoned for his offense a statute imposing this additional penalty is one simply increasing the punishment for the offense, and is ex post facto.

On the other, it is insisted that within the acknowledged reach of the police power, a state may prescribe the qualifications of one engaged in any business so directly affecting the lives and health of the people as the practice of medicine. It may require both qualifications of learning and of good character, and, if it deems that one who has violated the criminal laws of the state is not possessed of sufficient good character, it can deny to such a one the right to practise medicine, and, further, it may make the record of a conviction conclusive evidence of the fact of the violation of the criminal law and of the absence of the requisite good character. In support of this latter argument counsel for the state, besides referring to the legislation of many states prescribing in a general way good character as one of the qualifications of a physician, has made a collection of special provisions as to the effect of a conviction of felony. In the footnote† will be found his collection.

*We are of opinion that this argument [192 is the more applicable and must control the answer to this question. No precise limits have been placed upon the police power of a state. *and yet it is clear that legislation which [193 simply defines the qualifications of one who attempts to practise medicine is a proper exercise of that power. Care for the public health is *something confessedly belonging to the [194 domain of that power. The physician is one whose relations to life and health are of the most intimate character. It is fitting, not merely that he should possess a knowledge of diseases and their remedies, but also that he should be one who may safely be trusted to apply those remedies. Character is as important a qualification as knowledge, and if the legislature may properly require a definite course of instruction, or †Colorado—The state board of medicine may refuse certificates to individuals who have been convicted of conduct of a criminal nature, and they may revoke certificates for like cause. (Mills, Anno. Stat. 1891, § 3556.)

Iowa—May revoke a certificate to a person who has been convicted of felony committed in the practice of his profession, or in connection therewith; or may revoke for like cause; . . . and such refusal or revocation prohibits such person from practising medicine, surgery, or obstetrics. (Laws 1888, chap. 104, § 7.)

Louisiana—The board is required to strike from the said list (of registered names) the names of persons convicted of any infamous crimes by any court . . . whether prior or posterior to registration. (Act 1882, No. 31, § 5.)

New Jersey—May refuse or revoke a license for chronic and permanent inebriety, the practice of criminal abortion, conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude, or for publicly advertising special ability to treat or cure disease which, in the opinion of the board, it is impossible to cure (after hearing). (Act 1890, chap. 190, § 5.)

North Dakota—Substantially the same. (Act 1890, chap. 93, § 3.)

Vermont—May revoke or annul a certificate if, in their judgment, the person holding it has obtained it fraudulently, or has forfeited his right to public confidence by conviction of crime. (Rev. Laws 1880, § 3915.)

Washington—The board will refuse or revoke a license for unprofessional or dishonorable conduct subject to the right of appeal. . . . "Unprofessional or dishonorable conduct" means procuring or aiding or abetting in a criminal abortion or employing what are popularly known as cappers or steerers; or obtaining any fee on the assurance that any manifestly incurable disease can be permanently cured; or wilfully betraying a professional secret; or advertisements of medical business in which untruthful or improbable statements are made; or advertising any medicine or means whereby the monthly periods of women can be reg-

a certain examination as to learning, it may with equal propriety prescribe what evidence of good character shall be furnished. These propositions have been often affirmed. In Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 122 [32: 623, 626], it was said in respect to the qualifications of a physician: "The power of the state to provide for the general welfare of its people authorizes it to prescribe all such regulations as, in its judgment, will secure or tend to secure them against the consequences of ignorance and incapacity as well as of deception and fraud."

We note also these further declarations from state courts. In State [Powell], v. State Medical Examining Board, 32 Minn. 324, 327, 50 Am. Rep. 575, it was said: "But the legislature has surely the same power to require, as a condition of the right to practise this profession, that the practitioner shall be possessed of the qualifications of honor and a good moral character, as it has to require that he shall be learned in the profession. It cannot be doubted that the legislature has authority, in the exercise of its general police power, to make such reasonable requirements as may be calculated to bar from admission to this profession dishonorable men, whose principles or practices are such as to render them unfit to be intrusted with the discharge of its duties." In Thompson v. Hazen, 25 Me. 104, 108: "Its authors were careful that human health and life should not be exposed without some restraint, by being committed to the charge of the unprincipled and vicious. . . . It could not have been intended that persons destitute of the moral qualification required should have full opportunity to enter professionally the families of the worthy, but unsuspecting, and be admitted to the secrets which the sick chamber must often intrust to them." In State v. Hathaway, 115 Mo. 36, 47: "The *legislature then in the interest of society [195 and to prevent the imposition of quacks, adventurers, and charlatans upon the ignorant and credulous, has the power to prescribe the qualifications of those whom the state permits to practise medicine. . . . And the objection now made that because this law vests in this board the power to examine, not only into the literary and technical acquirements of the applicant, but also into his moral character, it is a grant of judicial power, is without force." In Eastman v. State, 109 Ind. 278, 279 [58 Am. Rep. 400]: "It is, no one can doubt, of high importance to the community that health, limb, and life should not be left to the treatment of ignorant pretenders and charlatans. It is within the power of the legislature to enact such laws as will protect the people from ignorant pretenders, and secure them the services of reputable, skilled, and learned men." In State v. Call, 121 N. C. 646, 28 S. E. 517: "To require this is an exercise of the police power for the protection of the public against incompetents and imposters, and is in no sense the creation of a monopoly of special privileges. The door stands open to all who possess the requisite age and good character, and can stand the examination which is exacted of all applicants alike."

But if a state may require good character as a condition of the practice of medicine, it may rightfully determine what shall be the evidences of that character. We do not mean to say that it has an arbitrary power in the matter, or that it can make a conclusive test of that which has no relation to character, but it may take whatever, according to the experience of mankind, reasonably tends to ulated, or the menses re-established if suppressed: or the conviction of any offense involving moral turpitude, or habitual intemperance. (Act March 28, 1890, §§ 3, 4.)

Great Britain and Ireland.—If any registered medical practitioner shall be convicted in England or Ireland of any felony or misdemeanor, or in Scotland of any crime or offense, or shall be, after due inquiry, judged by the general council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional respect, the general council may, if they see fit, direct the register to erase the name of such medical practitioner from the register. (Acts 21 & 22 Vict. chap. 90, § 29.)

New Brunswick—Substantially same. (Act 1881, chap. 19, § 22.)

Northwest Territory—Substantially same. (Ord. 5, 1888, § 37, as substituted by Ord. 24, 1892, § 1.)

Nova Scotia—Substantially same. (Rev. Stat. 5th ser. chap. 24, § 19.)

Manitoba—Any registered medical practitioner convicted of felony or misdemeanor, before or after the passage of this act or his registration, forfeits his rights to registration, and by direction of the council his name shall be erased. If a person known to have been convicted of felony or misdemeanor presents himself for registration, the register may refuse registration. If any person registered be judged after due inquiry . . . to have been guilty of infamous or unprofessional conduct in any respect, the council may direct the register to erase his name. (Rev. Stat. of Manitoba 1891, chap. 98, § 40.)

British Columbia—Any registered practitioner convicted of any felony thereby forfeits his right to registration, and . . . his name is required to be erased from the register; or, in case a person known to be convicted of felony presents himself for registration, the register has the power to refuse such registration. (Cons. Act 1888, chap. 81, § 32; substantially same as to Quebec; Rev. Stat. 1888, § 3996.)

Ontario—A practitioner is liable to have his name erased from the register where he has been convicted, before or after registration, of an offense which, if committed in Canada, would be a felony or misdemeanor, or where he has been guilty of any infamous or disgraceful conduct in a professional respect. (Rev. Stat. 1887, chap. 148, § 34.)

Newfoundland—The . . . board may try and expel any member of the profession for acts of malpractice, misconduct, or immoral habits. . . . (Act 1893, chap. 12, § 32.)

Prince Edward's Island—A medical practitioner guilty of infamous or disgraceful conduct in a professional respect is liable to have his name erased, and, if he apply for registration, the council may refuse it. (Act 1892, chap. 42, § 22.)

New Zealand—If any registered person shall be or shall have been convicted of any felony or misdemeanor in Great Britain or Ireland, or in any of the British Dominions, the register general and register, respectively, shall erase the name of any such person from the register, and such erasure shall be notified by the register general in the New Zealand Gazette. (Medical Practitioner's Act 1869, No. 51.)

Hawaii—It shall not be lawful for any person to practise in this kingdom as a physician or surgeon for compensation or reward unless he shall have first presented to the board of health satisfactory evidence of his professional qualifications and good moral character. (Act 1876, chap. 11, § 3.)

St. Lucia—If any registered medical practitioner is convicted of any felony, the register shall erase the name of such practitioner from the medical register. If any registered medical practitioner is convicted of any misdemeanor, a report shall be submitted . . . to the governor in council, who . . . shall determine whether (he) has been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional or other respect, and may thereupon, if he sees fit, direct the register to erase the name. . . . prove the fact and make it a test. County-Seat of Linn County, 15 Kan. 500-528. Whatever is ordinarily connected with bad character or indicative of it, may be prescribed by the legislature as conclusive evidence thereof. It is not the province of the courts to say that other tests would be more satisfactory, or that the naming of other qualifications would be more conducive to the desired result. These are questions for the legislature to determine. "The nature and extent of the qualifications required must depend primarily upon the judgment of the state as to their necessity." Dent v. West Virginia, supra, p. 122 [32: 626].

196] *It is not open to doubt that the commission of crime, the violation of the penal laws of a state, has some relation to the question of character. It is not, as a rule, the good people who commit crime. When the legislature declares that whoever has violated the criminal laws of the state shall be deemed lacking in good moral character it is not laying down an arbitrary or fanciful rule,—one having no relation to the subject-matter,—but is only appealing to a well-recognized fact of human experience; and if it may make a violation of criminal law a test of bad character, what more conclusive evidence of the fact of such violation can there be than a conviction duly had in one of the courts of the state? The conviction is, as between the state and the defendant, an adjudication of the fact. So, if the legislature enacts that one who has been convicted of crime shall no longer engage in the practice of medicine, it is simply applying the doctrine of res judicata and invoking the conclusive adjudication of the fact that the man has violated the criminal law, and is presumptively, therefore, a man of such bad character as to render it unsafe to trust the lives and health of citizens to his care.

That the form in which this legislation is cast suggests the idea of the imposition of an additional punishment for past offenses is not conclusive. We must look at the substance, and not the form, and the statute should be regarded as though it in terms declared that one who had violated the criminal laws of the state should be deemed of such bad character as to be unfit to practise medicine, and that the record of a trial and conviction should be conclusive evidence of such violation. All that is embraced in these propositions is condensed into the single clause of the statute, and it means that and nothing more. The state is not seeking to further punish a criminal, but only to protect its citizens from physicians of bad character. The vital matter is not the conviction, but the violation, of law. The former is merely the prescribed evidence of the latter. Suppose the statute had contained only a clause declaring that no one should be permitted to act as a physician who had violated the criminal laws of the state, leaving the question of violation to be deter-197] mined according *to the ordinary rules of evidence, would it not seem strange to hold that that which conclusively established the fact effectually relieved from the consequences of such violation?

It is no answer to say that this test of character is not in all cases absolutely certain, and that sometimes it works harshly. Doubtless, one who has violated the criminal law may thereafter reform and become in fact possessed of a good moral character. But the legislature has power in cases of this kind to make a rule of universal application, and no inquiry is permissible back of the rule to ascertain whether the fact of which the rule is made the absolute test does or does not exist. Illustrations of this are abundant. At common law one convicted of crime was incompetent as a witness, and this rule was in no manner affected by the lapse of time since the commission of the offense, and could not be set aside by proof of a complete reformation. So in many states a convict is debarred the privileges of an elector, and an act so debarring was held applicable to one convicted before its passage. Washington v. The State, 75 Ala. 582 [51 Am. Rep. 479]. In Foster v. Police Commissioners, 102 Cal. 483, 492, the question was as to the validity of an ordinance revoking a license to sell liquor on the ground of misconduct prior to the issue of the license, and the ordinance was sustained. In commenting upon the terms of the ordinance the court said: "Though not an ex post facto law, it is retrospective in so far as it determines from the past conduct of the party his fitness for the proposed business. Felons are also excluded from obtaining such license, not as an additional punishment, but because the conviction of a felony is evidence of the unfitness of such persons as a class; nor can we perceive why such evidence should be more conclusive of unfitness were the act done after the passage of the ordinance than if done before." In a certain sense such a rule is arbitrary, but it is within the power of a legislature to prescribe a rule of general application based upon a state of things which is ordinarily evidence of the ultimate fact sought to be established. "It was obviously the province of the state legislature to provide the nature and extent of the legal presumption to be deduced from a given *state of facts, and the [198 creation by law of such presumptions is after all but an illustration of the power to classify." Jones v. Brim, 165 U. S. 180, 183 [41: 677, 679].

Defendant relies largely on Cummings v. The State of Missouri, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 277 [18: 356], and Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 333 [18: 366]. In the first of these cases a test oath, containing some thirty distinct affirmations respecting past conduct, extending even to words, desires, and sympathies, was prescribed by the state of Missouri upon all pursuing certain professions or avocations; and in the second a similar oath, though not so far reaching in its terms, was required by act of Congress of those who sought to appear as attorneys and counselors in the courts of the United States. It was held that, as many of the matters provided for in these oaths had no relation to the fitness or qualification of the two parties, the one to follow the profession of a minister of the gospel and the other to act as an attorney and counselor, the oaths should be considered, not legitimate tests of qualifications, but in the nature of penalties for past offenses. These cases were called to our attention in Dent v. West Virginia, supra, in which the validity of a statute of West Virginia imposing new qualifications upon one already engaged in the practice of medicine was preseuted for consideration. After pointing out the distinguishing features of those cases this court summed up the matter in these words (p. 128 [32:628]):

"There is nothing in these decisions which supports the positions for which the plaintiff in error contends. They only determine that one who is in the enjoyment of a right to preach and teach the Christian religion as a priest of a regular church, and one who has been admitted to practise the profession of the law, cannot be deprived of the right to continue in the exercise of their respective professions by the exaction from them of an oath as to their past conduct, respecting matters which have no connection with such professions. Between this doctrine and that for which the plaintiff in error contends there is no analogy or resemblance. The Constitution of Missouri and the act of Congress in question in those cases were designed to deprive parties 199] of their right *to continue in their professions for past acts or past expressions of desires and sympathies, many of which had no bearing upon their fitness to continue in their professions. The law of West Virginia was intended to secure such skill and learning in the profession of medicine that the community might trust with confidence those receiviug a license under authority of the state."

Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265 [27:552], is also worthy of notice. In that case the circuit court had stricken the petitioner's name from the roll of practising attorneys, on the ground that he had committed a crime, although not in the presence of the court, nor interfering with it in the discharge of its duties. The petitioner here insisted that the act which was charged against him was one for which he was, if guilty, liable to trial and conviction under the law of the state, and that the Federal court had no power on account of such act, one having no connection with his obligations to that court, to disbar him. In reply to this contention it was said (p. 273 [27:556]):

"It is laid down in all the books in which the subject is treated, that a court has power to exercise a summary jurisdiction over its attorneys to compel them to act honestly towards their clients, and to punish them by fine and imprisonment for misconduct and contempts, and, in gross cases of misconduct, to strike their names from the roll. If regularly convicted of a felony, an attorney will be struck off the roll as of course, whatever the felony may be, because he is rendered infamous. If convicted of a misdemeanor which imports fraud or dishonesty, the same course will be taken. He will also be struck off the roll for gross malpractice or dishonesty in his profession. . . . Where an attorney was convicted of theft, and the crime was condoned by burning in the hand, he was nevertheless struck from the roll. 'The question is,' said Lord Mansfield, 'whether, after the conduct of this man, it is proper that he should continue a member of a profession which should stand free from all suspicion. . . . It is not by way of punishment; but the courts in such cases exercise their discretion, whether a man 200] *whom they have formerly admitted is a proper person to be continued on the roll or not.'"

The thought which runs through these cases and others of similar import which might be cited, is that such legislation is not to be regarded as a mere imposition of additional penalty but as prescribing the qualifications for the duties to be discharged and the position to be filled, and naming what is deemed to be and what is in fact appropriate evidence of such qualifications.

In Gray v. Connecticut, 159 U. S. 74, 77 [40:80, 82], this court considered the effect of a statute prescribing additional qualifications for one acting as a pharmacist who already had a license from the state therefor, and said: "Whatever provisions were prescribed by the law previous to 1890, in the use of spirituous liquors in the medicinal preparations of pharmacists, they did not prevent the subsequent exaction of further conditions which the lawful authority might deem necessary or useful." See also Foster v. Police Commissioners, supra, and State [Chapman], v. State Bd. of Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 387.

We find no error in the record, and, therefore, the judgment of the state court is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Harlan dissenting:

By an indictment in the court of sessions of Kings county, New York, the present plaintiff in error was charged with the crime of abortion, committed September 1, 1877. He was found guilty and sentenced, March 6, 1878, to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of ten years.

Chapter 661 of the laws of New York of 1893, as amended by the laws of 1895 [chap. 398], provides that "any person who, after conviction of a felony, shall attempt to practise medicine, or shall so practise, . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," etc.

The present indictment charged the plaintiff in error with the commission of the offense last stated, in that having been convicted in 1878, of the above crime of abortion committed *in 1877, he unlawfully, on the 22d day [201 of February, 1896, in the city of New York—nearly twenty years after the commission of the crime of abortion—practised medicine by "then and there unlawfully medically examining, treating, and prescribing for Dora Hoenig."

If the statute in force when the offense of abortion was committed had provided that, in addition to imprisonment in the penitentiary, the accused, if convicted, should not thereafter practice medicine, no one, I take it, would doubt that such prohibition was a part of the punishment prescribed for the offense. And yet it would seem to be the necessary result of the opinion of the court in the present case, that a statute passed after the commission of the offense in 1877 and which, by its own force, made it a crime for the defendant to continue in the practice of medicine, is not an addition to the punishment inflicted upon him in 1878. I cannot assent to this view. It is, I think, inconsistent with the provision of the Constitution of the United States declaring that no state shall pass an ex post facto law.

The scope and meaning of the ex post facto clause of the Constitution was determined in Calder v. Bull, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 386 [1:648], the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Chase. The classification there made of cases embraced by that provision has been universally accepted in the courts of this country, although this court said in Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 228 [27: 506, 509], that it was not to be supposed that the opinion in Calder v. Bull undertook to define, by way of exclusion, all the cases to which the constitutional provision would be applicable. That classification was as follows: "1. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal, and punishes such action. 2. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was, when committed. 3. Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed. 4. Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense, in order to convict the offender."

202] *In United States v. Hall, 2 Wash. C. C. 366, Mr. Justice Washington said that "an ex post facto law is one which, in its operation, makes that criminal or penal which was not so at the time the action was performed; or which increases the punishment; or, in short, which, in relation to the offense, or its consequences, alters the situation of a party to his disadvantage." And so it was held in Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 228 [27: 506, 509]; and in Medley Petitioner, 134 U. S. 160, 171 [33: 835, 840].

If long after the commission of a crime, and long after the offender has suffered all the punishment prescribed at the time for its commission, a statute should, by its own force, and solely because of his conviction of that offense, take from him the right to further pursue his profession, would not such a statute inflict upon him a greater punishment than was annexed to the crime when committed, and alter the situation to his disadvantage, "in relation to the offense or its consequences?" In my opinion, this question should receive an affirmative answer.

It was said in argument that the judgment below was sustained by Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114 [32: 623]. That case presented no question under the ex post facto clause of the Constitution. It only involved the question whether anyone could, of right, pursue the practice of medicine without obtaining a license to do so, if the state required a license as a condition of exercising the privilege of pursuing that profession. This court held that such a statute was within the reserved police power of the state, and consistent with the due process of law enjoined by the 14th Amendment. It said: "The power of the state to provide for the general welfare of its people authorizes it to prescribe all such regulations as, in its judgment, will secure, or tend to secure, them against the consequences of ignorance and incapacity, as well as of deception and fraud." It was not the case of a state enactment which, by its own force, made it a crime for any person, lawfully engaged, when such act was passed, in the practice of the medical profession, to continue to do so, if he had at any time in his past life committed a felony, although he may have suffered all the punishment pre-203] scribed for such felony when it *was committed. If the statute of West Virginia had been of that character, the same question would have been presented that arises under the statute of New York.

In Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 277, 321 [18: 356, 362], this court said: "The theory upon which our political institutions rest is, that all men have certain inalienable rights—that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that in the pursuit of happiness all avocations, all honors, all positions, are alike open to everyone, and that in the protection of these rights all are equal before the law. Any deprivation or suspension of any of these rights for past conduct is punishment, and can be in no otherwise defined." The court now holds that a legislative enactment does not inflict punishment for past conduct when it makes it a crime for anyone lawfully engaged in the practice of medicine—as was the plaintiff in error—to continue in the pursuit of his chosen profession, if at any time in the past, and although a half century may have intervened, he was convicted of a felony of any character, notwithstanding he suffered the entire punishment prescribed for such felony when committed.

In Ex parte Garland, 77 U. S. 4 Wall. 333, 377 [18: 366, 370], which involved the validity of an act of Congress requiring, among other things, a certain oath to be taken as a condition of the right of one to appear and be heard as an attorney at law by virtue of any previous admission to the bar, this court, referring to certain clauses of the act relating to past conduct, said: "The statute is directed against parties who have offended in any of the particulars embraced by these clauses. And its object is to exclude them from the profession of the law, or at least from its practice in the courts of the United States. As the oath prescribed cannot be taken by these parties, the act as against them operates as a legislative decree of perpetual exclusion. And exclusion from any of the professions or any of the ordinary avocations of life for past conduct can be regarded in no other light than as punishment for past conduct. The exaction of the oath is the mode of providing for ascertaining the parties upon whom the act is intended to operate, and, instead of lessening, increases its objectionable character. All enactments *of this kind partake of the nature [204 of bills of pains and penalties, and are subject to the constitutional inhibition against the passage of bills of attainder, under which general designation they are included. In the exclusion which the statute adjudges it imposes a punishment for some of the acts specified which were not punishable at the time they were committed; and for other of the acts it adds a new punishment to that before prescribed and it is thus brought within the further inhibition of the Constitution against the passage of an ex post facto law."

The statute in question, it is to be observed, takes no account whatever of the character, at the time of the passage, of the person whose previous conviction of a felony is made an absolute bar to his right to practise medicine. The offender may have become, after conviction, a new man in point of character, and so conducted himself as to win the respect of his fellow men, and be recognized as one capable, by his skill as a physician, of doing great good. But these considerations have no weight against the legislative decree embodied in a statute which, without hearing, and without any investigation as to the character or capacity of the person involved, takes away from him absolutely a right which was being lawfully exercised when that decree was passed. If the defendant had been pardoned of the offense committed by him in 1877, he would still, under the statute of 1895, have become a criminal if he continued in the practice of his profession.

It will not do to say that the New York statute does nothing more than prescribe the qualifications which, after its passage, must be possessed by those who practise medicine. Upon this point, Mr. Justice Patterson of the supreme court of New York well said [14 App. Div. 188]: "Assuming, for the purposes of the argument, that the legislature may require for the continuance of the practice of medicine, that the practitioner shall possess professional knowledge and skill and also good moral character, it is obvious that such requirement must relate to a present status or condition of a person coming within the terms of the act. The law under which this appellant was indicted does not deal with his present moral charac-
205] ter. It seizes upon *a past offense and makes that, and that alone, the substantial ingredient of a new crime, and the conviction of it years ago the conclusive evidence of that new crime. It will be observed that this statute includes any and all felonies, not only those committed in connection with the profession of medicine and surgery, but any and every felony in the whole catalogue of crime, whether committed here or in another jurisdiction. Its design is to deprive convicted felons of the right of practising at all. Clearly, it acts directly upon and enhances the punishment of the antecedently committed offense by depriving the person of his property and right, and preventing his earning his livelihood in his profession, only because of his past, and in this case expiated, offense against the criminal law. This prisoner has committed no new crime except that which the statute has created out of the old one. He had absolutely the right to practise medicine the day before that statute was passed. His former conviction entailed the punishment of imprisonment and disfranchisement as a voter, but it did not take away from him his property in the right to earn his living on the expiration of his imprisonment by engaging in the profession of which he was and is a member. His civil rights were not extinguished, but only suspended, during his imprisonment. 2 Rev. Stat. p. 701, § 19; Penal Code, § 710.

I concur entirely in these views, and must withhold my assent to the opinion of the majority.

Mr. Justice Peckham and Mr. Justice McKenna concur in this dissent.

P. H. KIRWAN, as United States Surveyor General for the District of Minnesota, and Thomas H. Crosswell, Appts.,

v.

SIMON J. MURPHY et al.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 205-210.)

Appeal from circuit court of appeals—interlocutory order not appealable.

1. Section 6 of the act of March 3, 1891, giving the right of review by this court in cases where the judgments or decrees of the circuit court of appeals are not made final, applies only to final orders, judgments, or decrees.
2. An interlocutory order for a temporary injunction, affirmed by the circuit court of appeals without direction, is not appealable to this court.

Submitted March 28, 1898. Decided April 25, 1898.

APPEAL from a decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit affirming an order for a temporary injunction of the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Minnesota in an action in equity brought by Simon J. Murphy et al., for plaintiffs, against P. H. Kirwan as United States surveyor et al., for an injunction from entering into any contract for the survey or surveying certain lands in St. Louis county, Minnesota, and to establish the boundaries of the same lands, etc. On motion to dismiss. Dismissed.

See same case below, 49 U. S. App. 658.

Statement by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller:

Simon J. Murphy and others filed a bill against P. H. Kirwan, as United States surveyor general for the district of Minnesota, and Thomas H. Crosswell, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Minnesota, which alleged in substance that complainants were the owners of certain lands on the shores of Cedar Island lake, in St. Louis county, Minnesota, specifically described in the bill; that the township in which the lands lie was surveyed in 1876, and the survey approved by the United States surveyor general for Minnesota and by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; that prior to April 1, 1887, all the lands in the township were sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States according to the official plat of the survey, and patents therefor were issued to the various purchasers and entrymen; that Cedar Island lake is in fact smaller than it is represented to be on the plat, and that several of the fractional lots owned by complainants about said lake contain more land than is represented, while as to some of the lots
